6849. Who makes sacks besides the prisoners?—There is a very large industry in Dundee.

6850. Have you had any complaints from the sack-sewers about taking the bread out of their mouths?—I have not heard of any yet.

6851. Nor from the mat-makers?—They are supposed to make mats in the blind asylum.

6852. Do you compete with blind asylums?—I generally send my mats to the blind asylums.

6853. You make mats for the blind asylums; is that common in Scotland?—Well, it is with me in Perth. I have made mats for Dundee and for the Edinburgh blind asylums.

6854. Do you know what they do in the German prisons?—I have been in some of the large German prisons, but I do not know exactly what their leading industry is. They have a wonderful system of getting almost everything made in German prisons.

6855. But there are great complaints about it from the outside workmen?—I believe that is so. In France, I remember seeing at the Paris Exhibition of 1889 a Prisons' Department stall, and on it there was a wonderful collection of articles made in prison. They make all the ropes for the navy in prison; they make iron cables for ships; and I saw anchors that had been made in prison. In the St. Lazarre Prison in Paris there is, I believe, a tremendous industry in the making of dolls.

6856. You have part of the prison devoted to criminal lunatics; have you any men there from the petty criminal class? If a man, for instance, was brought up for a trifling offence, such as a breach of the peace, or a petty assault or trifling theft, and it were shown that he was insane, would he be sent to you?—He would be sent to me during his sentence.

6857. Would he be sentenced if he was insane?—That often happens: then he is certified as insane, and sent to the criminal lunatic department here. He remains there during duration of his sentence: after that he is handed over to the Parochial Authorities.

6858. Is there any injustice inflicted by this class of lunatics on the prison machinery?—I have one instance of a man who was sent to me from Edinburgh. He was an inmate of the lunatic asylum there, and had committed some small assault, and was certified as dangerous. He was removed to Perth to be confined during Her Majesty's pleasure.

6859. How long have you had him?—Six or seven years.

6860. Do you think he would be better in a Parochial Asylum?—I don't know. I don't think he would. He is a thorough lunatic.

6861. It would be more just perhaps that the expense of his upkeep should fall upon his parish, but, apart from that, you think he is as well off?—Yes.

6862. The only person who has cause of complaint is the Treasury who has to support him. That is an arrangement that could be abused by parishes, could it not?—I believe it could. But this is the only instance I have known of a man who did not commit a serious crime being sent to Perth during Her Majesty's pleasure.

6863. You have not had any other similar case?—I don't think I have had any others.

6864. (By Miss Stevenson.) Perth is a convict prison, is it not?—Yes, but we have all sorts of prisoners in it. We have short sentence prisoners, male and female, and we have male and female convicts.

6865. In regard to the women convicts you spoke of, who had four convict sentences which they had served in Perth prison,—you spoke of them having had other terms of imprisonment?—Yes, they would have them before.

6866. Not necessarily in Perth?—No, I believe it was in Glasgow.

6867. Is Perth the only convict prison for Scotland?—Yes, they come to me from all parts of Scotland.

6868. Do you find that many convicts come back who have been liberated on ticket-of-leave?—Yes, most certainly. Frequently they commit some offence before their license is expired; they are tried in the sheriff or other court, get sentenced to imprisonment, then, of course, their license is recalled, and they have to work out the unexpired portion of their sentence.

Lieut.-Col.
Campbell.

11 Dec. 1894.

6869. (By Dr. Farquharson.) You said your opinion was, that the result of long convict sentences was not reformatory but contaminating?—I think so, most decidedly.

6870. That is from the younger mixing with older criminals?—Yes.

6872. What is the evidence of contamination you judge by?—Well, I can give you an instance. There is what is called a 'Star' Class, which has been instituted for convicts against whom there were no known previous convictions. It was formed with a view to prevent contamination, but it had utterly failed. There were women in that class quite as bad as in any other, who often broke out into fits of bad language, and smashed their cell windows, and who by their conduct proved themselves utterly unworthy to be associated with those who, through misfortune, such as child-murder for example, had got into trouble. Though no previous convictions were recorded against such prisoners, they were apparently as bad as bad could be.

6874. Would you like to have greater variety of prison work?—I should, most decidedly.

6875. Are you restricted in any way as to the variety of work you can give to prisoners?—The Prison Commissioners are the authority who say what work is to be done. I have not a free hand.

6876. Suppose you were to follow the example of Paris, and make dolls?—I don't say that would do here.

6877. You know there is a practical difficulty in connection with the jealousy of outside workmen?—I know there is a strong feeling.

6878. Here in Perth?—No, we have not got it at all in Perth, because we have no manufacturers in Perth of the same goods. There are no mat-makers so far as I know, and very little sack-sewing.

6879. Is it in connection with mat-making that the difficulty has arisen in England?—Yes, I believe so, but we have had no difficulty in Scotland.

6880. Have you any opinion on the respective merits of in-door labour and out-door labour for prisoners?—My great idea about prisoners is that they ought to be kept separate. I am as certain as possible that, if you associate large bodies of these men, they contaminate each other. One bad man will contaminate a whole lot. I should certainly like to employ them as much outside as possible; the great difficulty is that if you employ them outside you have association. I stated that to Dr. Guillaume as one of my objections to the Swiss system, but he said that, notwithstanding that difficulty, it worked very well.

6881. This is largely a system of open-air work?—Yes. For men who have behaved while they were in prison.

6882. Did you go into the question of expense at all?—No.

6883. Do you know if the expense is borne by the state or by localities?—I fancy it is borne by the whole state. I think it must be the state, for they have one central prison at Berne.

6884. Then there are farms attached to it?—Yes.

6885. Do the prisoners get any pecuniary benefit from their labour?—They get marks according to their behaviour, exactly as we have here.

6886. And when they get out they get some money?—Yes, it is kept for them until they are completely liberated.

6887. Was it the experience of your friend, Dr. Guillaume, that these people were reformed by such treatment?—He said so. It has only been in use for the last 10 years, but he said it was the best system that had been tried.

6888. (By Dr. Sutherland.) In answer to the chairman, you said that you have from 450 to 500 cells vacant, and you thought it possible that these could be utilised for the accommodation of petty offenders?—Yes, I believe so.

6889. At the present moment, under your jurisdiction and within your walls, you have got lunatics, convicts, criminals, and the untried, and yet you are going to add another class of people who are to be reformed rather than punished—the habitual offender; do you think it is a desirable thing to have so many different systems of discipline, applicable to these classes, going on within the same walls?—I say that I could perfectly easily keep these men separate. It depends on how many you give me.

6890. Suppose we filled you up?—I could put the whole of my convicts into one block. At the present moment, from having too few warders, I cannot possibly keep the convicts and the prisoners separate.

6891. Is it desirable to have in any one institution such a variety of the derelicts of human society as would be herded in Perth under this arrangement?—I have got accommodation for them.

6892. But is it a desirable thing?—That I don't know.

6894. Suppose you had a separate institution: would it not be more desirable to have them under a separate and distinct kind of discipline and work?—As far as that goes, with the accommodation I have, they could be kept separate. I could put the habitual offenders into one of the halls, and have ample accommodation for the whole of the prisoners, convicts, and untried prisoners in another.

6895. You have expressed a very decided opinion against the association of prisoners. Am I to infer from that, that you believe in separate confinement for long periods of 12 or 18 months?—I do, most decidedly.

6896. For what period would you be inclined to keep a man or woman in separate confinement?—Last October I was over in Belgium, and saw Dr. Morell, the visiting surgeon of the principal prisons there, and he told me that they kept them there for 4 years in solitary confinement in this respect, that they had no access to the other prisoners. They had, however, constant access to the governor, the chaplain, and the doctor. These officials saw the prisoners at least once a day, and, of course, the warders saw them also. It was not the regular silent system, which we know is not a good system. But this is a 'separate' system, in which they were kept entirely separate from the other prisoners, but, at the same time, had the advantage of visits of the governor, chaplain, and doctor.

6897. Then you think it would not be a bad thing in this country to put a man or woman into solitary confinement for two years?—It is done already. It is authorised by law.

6898. Are you aware that medical men in this country, well qualified to form an opinion, and in America, are agreed that such treatment is disastrous, mentally and physically?—I have heard so, but I don't believe it.

6899. But medical men say so: judges of physical and mental deterioration?—Well, I have had many men so confined, and I never saw a man going mad under it.

6900. What time per day would a prisoner undergoing separate confinement for, say two years, have for conversation with the governor, doctor, chaplain, and warder?—I am not advocating the system. I merely stated what Dr. Morell told me. Under our own system they have not very long daily.

6901. Would you be inclined to relax somewhat, under proper precautions, the present system of separate confinement in Scotland for long periods?—No.

Lieut.-Col.
Campbell.

11 Dec. 1894.

*Lieut.-Col.
Campbell.*

11 Dec. 1894.

6902. Why?—Because I have never seen any evil effect from it.

6903. Would you kindly indicate to the Committee what time per day is given to a two years' prisoner with the view of relieving the terrible monotony of prison life by means of conversation with the governor, doctor, chaplain, or warder?—I cannot give you that. Personally, I have not time to visit the prisoners and talk to them. My own idea is that it is not the duty of the governor to do that.

6904. You do not think it is a bad thing, mentally or physically, for a man or woman to be confined 23 out of the 24 hours in separate confinement for two years?—Most decidedly not.

6905. You spoke of the evil of associating prisoners, but would not the same thing occur in a more intensified form when they are thrown out again into the world—after two years of the lives of recluses?—Yes, most decidedly.

6906. The prisoners would simply gravitate to their own kidney?—They too often do.

6908. Are you familiar with the American system—I have read about it.

6909. There they are classified according to their moral, physical and intellectual qualities, and when that classification is made they are so far associated; would you object to an arrangement of that kind here?—The association of criminals is, in my view, a mistake, and that is what I argued with Dr. Guillaume.

6910. Have you any ideas as to what you consider a minimum sentence of detention for petty habitual offenders?—My idea of course is that short sentences have no deterrent effect.

6911. What length of separate confinement would you give to a habitual petty offender, say, who had been 10 times convicted?—It would depend on the length of time over which these convictions extended.

6912. Say within 12 months?—I should make a system of cumulative punishments, and I should say that on the tenth offence I should give the maximum the law allows.

6913. Do you find that women are more frequently habitual petty offenders than men?—I think so. There is a class of women who get very low: they cannot get a living, and are thrown into evil ways.

6914. I understand you suggested also a sliding scale of labour, appropriate to these people?—That is what Dr Guillaume suggested. I said I thought it was very interesting. But, as I say, my difficulty was the fact of associating these people.

6915. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) What is the longest time you have ever had a prisoner with you for the offence of being drunk and incapable?—I am not positively certain.

6916. Have you had them for as much as 14 days?—I think I have had them as long as that.

6917. Have you had them for 24 hours?—I have had prisoners for 24 hours, but very seldom. I have them more frequently for 3, 7, or 10 days.

6920. That is not quite my point. I wish information to enable me to judge as to the proportion of people who get tickets-of-leave who relapse before their sentence expires?—A very large proportion come back.

6921. Before the sentences expire?—Yes.

6922. Can you give me the figures?—Yes.

6923. You mentioned a female who had spent 40 years in prison: for what class of crimes was she sentenced?—Generally, assault and robbery. These are the chief offences for which these women are committed—assaulting and robbing drunken men.

6924. Are these women generally of immoral character besides?—Yes.

6925. Are they usually drunkards?—Some of them are not.

6926. Can you remember whether the amounts that were said to have been stolen were large or small?—They are very often very small.

6927. (By Col. M'Hardy.) About Ghent prison—did you go over the hospital attached to it?—I did not visit the prison.

6929. (By the Chairman.) Can you give us any estimate of the value of the labour of the prisoners in Perth?—Yes, I can do that.

JOHN M'NAUGHTAN M.D., Medical Officer of Perth Prison and Physician Superintendent of Criminal Lunatic Asylum, called in and examined.

*Dr. John
M'Naughtan.*

6930. (By the Chairman.) You are medical officer of Perth Prison, and Medical Superintendent of the Criminal Lunatic Department?—Yes.

6931. How long have you held these appointments?—I have been medical officer of the prison for 18 years and medical superintendent for 12 years.

6932. You consider that the present mode of dealing with habitual offenders is faulty and inadequate?—I do.

6933. That is, on account of the short terms?—Yes.

6934. Do you think that repeated imprisonment for short terms causes the offenders to lose respect for themselves and to go permanently to the bad?—Yes.

6935. In regard to short sentences in cases of drunkenness, what is your opinion?—I believe they really do harm.

6936. In what way?—A short sentence causes them to have more desire for drinking when they are at liberty. It whets the crave for drinking.

6937. (By the Chairman.) Do you think that is the case with female drinkers?—Both women and men.

6938. You state that a large proportion of habitual offenders and, especially females, are weak-minded?—Yes.

6939. How do you propose to deal with them?—I should give them a long period of detention.

6940. But you can hardly punish a person for being weak-minded?—I don't mean in prison. I would deal with them as moral imbeciles.

6941. You say that these cases generally improve, mentally and physically, in prison?—Yes, under long sentences.

6942. And you think that long detention under conditions that they could not get drunk, would assist to do away with their desire for it?—Yes, if they are under proper conditions of treatment.

6943. What treatment?—Dietetic and medical.

6944. You think they would get stronger physically?—And morally too.

6945. You speak of treatment. You have no doubt heard of a number of remedies proposed for drunkenness by different people, such as the Tyson cure?—I don't refer to that at all.

*Lieut.-Col.
Campbell.*

11 Dec. 1894.

*Dr. John
M'Naughtan.*

*Dr. John
M'Naughtan.*
11 Dec. 1894.

6946. Have you formed any opinion as to these?—I have never tried them, but I have no faith in them, though I have no cause to say so.

6947. You say you purpose to treat these habitual drunkards and habitual criminals, who commit crimes associated with drink, as moral imbeciles?—Yes.

6948. On much the same lines as the mentally afflicted?—Yes.

6949. You would detain them 12 months—do you think that would be sufficient?—At least 12 months.

6951. You don't think that would cure in every case, but you believe it would benefit a large number?—It would in any case be best for the individuals themselves.

6952. It would involve expense. How do you propose to provide for that: would the out-door provision of work pay?—I don't know, it might assist.

6953. You have confined your remarks in this summary of evidence to habitual drunkards, but our remit goes over the whole range of habitual offenders. Have you many habitual drunkards in the shape of insane cases through your hands?—I have a fair proportion, specially women.

6954. Have you many of them in the asylum; that is to say, of people who have got into mischief through drink?—I think I may say that 15 to 20 per cent. of the inmates are alcoholic cases.

6955. Have you found that detention in the asylum cures them of that tendency when they get out?—We have had some very successful dipsomaniac cases.

6956. Can you give us an example?—We had one, I remember, 'A.B.' of Glasgow. It was a case of homicidal mania through drink. The person had attempted to shoot a detective officer. He was a couple of years with us, and was then discharged, and he has done very well up to the present time.

6957. That was a man, was it not, of superior education and in a good position; can you tell us whether his drinking habits were of long duration, and whether he was ever up before for crimes committed through drink?—I cannot. But he had been repeatedly taken charge of before by his friends, and put under restraint during bouts of drinking.

6958. That case points to the necessity, does it not, of giving such powers to friends over habitual drunkards who have not been convicted?—If such had existed, it would have probably saved this man from being in a criminal asylum. Fortunately, no murder was committed, but it was a very serious assault.

6959. Do you remember any other case?—Yes, we had a case of 'R,' a sailor from Greenock, who has been at liberty for two or three years. He was a thorough dipsomaniac with homicidal mania.

6960. Was he ever up before for offences connected with drunkenness?—Not that I know of. We have no record.

6961. Any other cases?—We must have had others.

6962. Any women for instance?—Oh yes, we had one very noted case—that of Laing or Paterson, from Cupar. It was a case of child murder. She is now back to us, but not on account of a return to drinking habits, but because she is getting an old frail woman.

6963. Were you obliged to take her back on that account?—Well, she had been under the care of friends on an out license; but she became unable, through failing health, to do the laundry work at which she had been employed.

6964. Just explain that?—Well, all prisoners of that kind are liberated on license, and their friends become responsible for them, and make a return every month to the Commissioners of Prisons. They have in that return to answer certain questions—whether the patients have taken any intoxicating liquor, where they have resided during the month, and so forth.

6965. Is 'A.B.' conditionally liberated?—Yes, and will remain so all his life.

6966. That is supervision by friends instead of supervision by the police?—Yes.

6967. Have the friends any power over the actions of the individual so liberated?—They have no power except what is involved in the report to the Commissioners. They have no actual power.

6968. If a person so liberated took to drink again or went to the bad, what would happen?—It would be reported to the Commissioners who would revoke his license.

6969. Have you many people ordered back?—Unfortunately we have. Not for drinking, but for a return to insanity. We had one case, I remember, for drinking.

6970. And are these liberated people visited at all?—Oh yes, I visit the whole of them twice a year.

6971. How many have you?—At present there are ten criminal lunatics out on license.

6972. In Scotland?—Yes.

6973. If they wanted to go to England, is there any machinery for enabling them to do so?—I am afraid not.

6974. (By Col. M'Hardy.) You have one case in Ireland?—We have.

6975. (By the Chairman.) What of him?—His friends take care of him. I visit him also twice a year.

6976. If it were necessary to recommit him who would do it?—It would have to be done through the Lord-Lieutenant, moved by the Secretary for Scotland.

6977. In the course of your experience I suppose you have had a larger number out?—Not at one time. But we have had a great many through hand.

6978. You mentioned the case of a woman Paterson, was her crime committed under dipsomaniac conditions?—Yes, she was a dipsomaniac. She murdered her child after a fit of drunkenness.

6979. Do you know if hers was a hereditary case?—I believe so, she had a very bad history.

6980. At her trial she was held to be insane?—Yes, and was sentenced to be confined during Her Majesty's pleasure.

6981. We have seen in some of the prisons we have visited, prisoners who appeared to be on the borderland of insanity. It seemed very much a matter of chance whether they would be sent to prison or to an asylum—have you many such?—We have.

6982. Among the vagrant and beggar classes have you many semi-imbecile people?—We have.

6983. Weak-minded?—Yes.

6984. Do you think the prison is a place for them?—I have always felt that a half-way house would be much better for them. They cannot be certified as insane, and yet they are not fit subjects for prison discipline. There is no improvement for people of that kind.

6985. Would you be inclined to relegate them to the poorhouse?—I think not—not as the poorhouses are conducted at present.

6986. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Suppose you got an empty poorhouse, would that be a suitable place for treating them?—Yes, it might. You could then frame your own discipline in dealing with them there.

6987. Does it not occur to you that there might be a practical difficulty in confining some of them to the poorhouse; for example, they would not have walls as a prison has, and would there not be some difficulty in keeping inebriates from wandering?—I don't know, I should think not: many asylums have no walls.

6988. Do you think as a class they could be treated in empty poorhouses?—I think so.

6989. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You look upon this very large class of habitual offenders as moral imbeciles?—I do.

6990. And you suggest diet, medical treatment and discipline suitable to their condition?—Yes.

6991. In doing so, I suppose you recognise that very different forms of insanity arise through drinking?—That is what I am referring to.

6992. In the physical and mental conditions in which you find those people, would you suggest that they should have two years' solitary confinement?—Certainly not.

M'Naughtan.*
11 Dec. 1894.

*Dr. John
M'Naughton.*
11 Dec. 1894.

6993. What is your opinion, after sixteen years of convict prisoners, as to the results of long confinement upon them, mentally and physically?—I should say generally it is bad.

6994. Are you aware that that is the opinion of many distinguished American and French physicians, and that recidivism is the result?—I believe so.

6996. By proper precautions a suitable classification might be made?—I think so.

6997. The evils of association would in that way be greatly diminished?—I think so, under proper supervision.

6998. You would never think of allowing a man or woman who had undergone a long period of separate confinement to be thrown all at once into the world?—I think such cases more susceptible to impressions either for good or bad. I think it would have a bad effect.

6999. In the Lunatic Department with which you are connected, you have a large number of inebriates—dipsomaniacs from Glasgow who have committed homicidal acts—serious or fatal assaults?—We have a number. From 15 to 20 per cent. are of that kind.

7000. From Glasgow?—Altogether, I mean.

7001. The larger proportion are from Glasgow?—Certainly.

7002. Do you classify your 50 lunatics at all?—In what way?

7003. Take those cases where the plea of "insane at the time" of the offence was put forward and upheld by the Court, but who become sane before trial. Do you allow such to mingle with those who are insane?—Yes. We cannot keep them apart entirely; our accommodation will not allow it.

7004. Do you find any harm comes to inebriates from their association with other forms of insanity which exist in your establishment?—I cannot say I do.

7005. If your establishment were bigger, would you think it necessary to adopt a classification and separation?—Certainly. If we had accommodation, and if we had a sufficient number, classification would be necessary.

7006. I suppose even in cases where insanity was pled in bar of trial, the prisoners became sane shortly after they arrived at your establishment: and you say that the result of your experience is that two or two and a half years' detention in your asylum and abstention from alcohol has had the most beneficial results?—Yes. I don't say complete cure in every case. We have had relapses.

7007. Do you think these habitual petty offenders, many of whom you think moral imbeciles, are fit subjects for penal discipline?—They will not be benefited by penal discipline.

7008. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Do you find the health of the prisoners improves on their first admission and for a short time afterwards?—As a rule it does.

7009. What is that due to?—To cleanliness, regular diet, and, gradually as the alcohol gets out of their system, they feel better at first.

7010. After prolonged periods of detention does their health begin to deteriorate?—I could not say that their health deteriorates. They get lethargic and more emotional.

7011. Are there any class of diseases put down to prison treatment or prison detention?—No, not particularly, unless occasionally weakness of mind and delusions.

7012. Is that due, do you think, to solitary confinement?—In some cases.

7013. What shape do the delusions take?—It is melancholia generally. They think that people are trying to injure them.

7014. Is that regarded as a form of insanity?—It is a form of insanity.

7015. What do you do with such cases?—We remove them from the cells and associate them with other prisoners. Dr. John M'Naughton.

7016. Are you in favour, on the whole, of allowing prisoners on long sentences to associate with one another?—Yes, if under proper conditions.

7017. You are not so much afraid of the evils of contamination?—No! We have experience of it in the Perth Prison. Our female convicts associate together.

7018. Are you sanguine, on the whole, of permanent results in the way of cure of prolonged periods of detention in the case of habitual drunkards?—All I can say is that it would do good. My experience on the whole is in favour of it.

7019. Your experience in the Lunatic Department of the prison?—Yes.

7020. What would be your irreducible minimum?—Not less than a year.

7021. Of course you could not very well state what the maximum would be?—It would depend very much on the individuals themselves.

7022. In that case, would you give power to the medical man to decide the length of detention?—I think it should be left very much as it is now, in dealing with Her Majesty's pleasure lunatics. It depends entirely on the individual. If a man does not improve, he is detained for life: if he does improve they may liberate him. The period is left quite indefinite.

7023. Have you any opinion on the much debated question whether habitual drunkenness is a disease or a species of insanity, or both?—I believe it is a disease. Of course it is entirely due to the want of equilibrium in the mental function.

7024. It is a diseased function to begin with?—Yes.

7025. And runs into insanity?—It may run into insanity: dipsomania is an insanity, but it is not entirely alcoholic. You might have dipsomania without alcoholism.

7026. Do you attach great importance to the occupation of habitual drunkards?—Yes. I think it should be out-door labour—garden labour, spade labour,—just as we have our lunatics here working with the spade. I think there could be no better labour.

7027. How would you propose to pay the expenses of any system such as you propose?—It might be expensive, but it would free the police courts and the cities from their habituels.

7028. You think in that way it would pay indirectly?—Probably not made to pay; but good would be done at a moderate expenditure.

7029. Might it not be made to pay indirectly by relieving poorhouses, hospitals, lunatic asylums, and such institutions of that kind of people?—It might, but I am afraid agriculture would not pay very well under present conditions. There would be no great remuneration from that sort of labour.

7030. Is it not the case that General Booth's experiment has involved the expenditure of an enormous amount of capital without much return from it at present?—Yes, I believe it has.

7032. Wherein would the difficulty consist?—Because, as a rule, they have no trustworthy friends one would care to take as guardians for them.

7033. In dealing with habitual offenders, would you be inclined to deal with them in different degrees of restriction: that is to say, some cases who are not so hardened you would give very considerable liberty, while in the worst class of cases the restriction would be greater?—I should deal with them altogether in common at first, and let restriction be settled afterwards.

7034. You would have a reformatory period?—I would rather have a probationary period to begin with, and settle afterwards the period of detention in these institutions. I should deal with them individually very much as, I have said, we deal with Her Majesty's pleasure lunatics.

M'Naughton.*

7035. In proceeding to reform habitual offenders you would put them into an institution for a certain time?—Yes.

7036. How long?—For a period of at least a year.

7037. And then begin to consider how you would restrict them under conditions of liberty?—Under conditional liberation.

7038. What do you think would be a reasonable number to aggregate?—I should certainly not have more cases together than a man could know individually. That is the essence of the whole treatment. In a large institution there might probably be 200 or 300.

7039. Would you go so far as that?—Yes, 200 or 300, so that the man in charge might know each case individually.

7040. You expressed a decided opinion in favour of out-door labour?—Yes.

7041. But possibly a good many of the cases would be women?—Yes, a good number.

7042. Would you employ them in the outside?—You would require to have laundry work for them. But they might be employed outside. It would be the best thing for them. We have tried it: but there are difficulties.

7043. Do you think that laundry-work would be congenial occupation for a habitual criminal woman?—I think so. It might be hard at first.

7044. You said, I think, that these people as a rule were not very energetic either in mind or body?—I should first try to put physical health into them by good diet. You must have a better diet than the penal one.

7045. And you look upon laundry-work as part of any probable scheme for the employment of women?—Yes; what I should look to for good is active physical work, not sedentary labour.

7046. In some places we have heard of, we found that women preferred sewing to laundry work, and that in the higher class institutions they preferred it to washing?—Yes, I believe that is so; but what I say is, that active physical work would be better for the patients themselves.

7047. Would laundry work be suitable for habitual offenders who are often not physically strong?—It might be combined with sewing. They might also do the cooking.

7048. Do you think it would do to have some small amount of machinery in such places preparing material for some of the great industries of the country—yarn, for example?—I think it would.

7049. At any rate it would be something to interest the men and women in?—Yes. But the men I would employ on the land as far as possible.

7050. How many labourers, from your experience at the prison here, could you absorb per acre, say, in market gardening?—Not more than 10 or 12 per acre; we have about 2 or 3 acres, and we can employ 10 or 12 to one acre, that is, spade labour.

7051. Spade labour, we are told, gives more remunerative results than the plough?—Probably.

7052. Do you see any objection to utilising a part of a poorhouse for those people?—Not at all.

7053. A wing?—An entire wing set apart for them.

7054. There is a class of drunkards we have heard of, who do not come before the police courts, but who cause a great deal of trouble in counties; how should you propose to deal with them?—Their case presents very considerable difficulties.

7055. Would you put them on the same footing as those habitual offenders of whom we have been speaking?—If you could get power to detain them.

7056. You think that would be the best way if you had legislative power?—I do.

7057. To return to the ground of employment: you think you could employ 10 or 12 men per acre?—Yes.

7058. What supervision would be necessary? Suppose you had 200 men employed in gardening, what number of warders would you require for them?—You would require a pretty fair proportion to begin with. I think at least 10 per cent. That would be 20 per 200.

7059. At first all these men would be in an unsettled state, but, after a while I suppose, some of them would settle down, and by classification and arrangement might be utilised as a sort of watch upon the others?—I think by classification you could relieve the attendants very much.

7060. You think that would tend to reduce the number of attendants very much?—Yes. You very soon come to know the bad and the good. For the latter few attendants would be required.

7061. Go for a moment to the cases of insanity which appear in prison; is it not a fact, from the inquiries that are made into the cases where insanity appears, that the person has actually been insane before, and been in a lunatic asylum, or else has shown some strangeness of conduct before going into prison?—The great majority of them are of that character. Confinement seems to develop it.

7062. So far as imprisonment is common in this country, are you aware of any moderate sentence ever having caused, in a perfectly sane man, the disease of insanity?—I cannot say I have. Two years' sentences with solitary confinement might have a very prejudicial effect.

7063. (By Miss Stevenson.) You have told us that most of the women are rather weak-minded; and you have said that active rather than sedentary employment is better for them; but would it not be possible, to employ them in less rough kinds of work than laundry work, by giving them intervals for physical exercise; would some arrangement of that kind not counteract the effects of sedentary employment?—Yes, it might.

7064. As a matter of fact, most of the work done in laundries is done by rather a rough class of women?—Yes, it is. I am afraid habituals as a rule would be of a rough class.

7065. But, in regard to those who are rather weak-minded, would there not be some moral effect produced by giving them a superior kind of work?—Not to begin with. We find in the case of our weak-minded female convicts that active work makes them sleep better, and improves them mentally and physically.

7066. Would it not be possible to create in some way a better class of work which might be given as a sort of reward?—I am strongly in favour of active physical work to begin with.

7067. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Is it not the fact that there are a great number of light agricultural operations in which women could be employed. Suppose you had a dairy farm, could they not look after the poultry and the pigs?—We have employed our women in hay-making. I think dairy work is admirably suited for women.

7068. But there are portions of the year—in winter, for example, when nothing can be done on the farm; what would you do with the people then?—Well, in winter we dig the ground and make up the walks. We never want work. Any improvements we do in winter.

7069. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Among the men a certain number would be required making and repairing clothes?—We have that now.

7070. That would be necessary in such an establishment?—Yes, they would require to do that.

7072. Yes. What is the effect of such a sentence on a habitual drunkard after he is let out?—I should not say a curative effect, but I cannot say from my own experience.

7073. Has it not a curative effect?—I cannot say.

7074. Has it any effect the other way?—I think not. But I cannot say I have ever observed a curative effect.

7075. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you come across many habitual drunkards that get 12 months' imprisonment?—No, very few.

11 Dec. 1894.

7076. After what period of separate confinement would you begin to fear both mental and physical deterioration as the result of the all but absolute withdrawal of the normal conditions of life.—I should say after 18 months. I always keep a special watch over two years' sentences.

Dr. Alexander
Reid
Urquhart.

ALEXANDER REID URQUHART, M.D., Physician Superintendent of the James Murray Royal Asylum, Perth, called in and examined.

Dr. John
M'Naughtan.
11 Dec. 1894.

7077. Do you think there could be no improvement on the system of sending men and women right out into the world who have so far suffered mentally or physically from long periods of separate imprisonment?—I should not say they all suffer. [The witness then withdrew.]

Dr. Alexander
Reid
Urquhart.

7078. (By the Chairman.) You are the Physician Superintendent of the James Murray Asylum?—Yes.

7079. How long have you occupied that position?—15 years.

7080. You have always been a specialist in lunacy?—I was first connected with lunacy in this county: then I was for a time connected with asylums in England. I have had to do with lunacy since 1873.

7081. You are aware of the attempt that has been made to deal to a certain extent with habitual drunkards who voluntarily submit themselves to control. Your opinion is, I understand, that that has accomplished nothing?—Practically nothing.

7082. That no progress has been made under recent Acts, at least in Scotland?—No, we have had no institution established under these Acts in Scotland.

7083. In Scotland, I believe, a number of habitual inebriates seek refuge in asylums as voluntary patients?—A certain number come to asylums as they have always done.

7084. Another lot are sent by their friends to board out in out-of-the-way districts where drinking is inaccessible?—That has been a favourite plan.

7085. Do you do much in that way?—I have sent a good many—habitual drunkards into private quarters of that kind.

7086. Do you find that it works?—I think it is better than sending them to the Homes we have in Scotland.

7087. What Homes are there in Scotland except the Queensberry Lodge and the place at Peebles?—Perhaps the most successful is Elswick House near Stonehaven. There is another place, Cornnton Vale, near Bridge of Allan. I visited both of these places, and sent people to them.

7088. Was that place near Bridge of Allan for males only?—They took both men and women.

7089. Did they find it easy to retain men there?—Miss Forbes at Elswick House was very clever; and by her tact and cleverness she could take charge of these drunkards.

7090. Have you sent many patients to Elswick House?—I don't think I have sent more than one or two. I am not altogether in favour of these houses. The money available of course is the difficulty. If a person is able to pay a fair amount, then I think the person is far better treated separately. I look upon these places with suspicion, because you have men and women of that sort crowded together, and their whole lives seem to be spent in an endeavour to avoid the regulations and to get drink. The one contaminates the other, and if one has not a craving at one time, another has, and so the difficulty is intensified.

7091. Take the case of people you did send there; what was the result?—Well, the result was temporary alleviation.

7092. They could not be considered test cases?—I could not say they were.

7093. Take the case of people boarded out privately—have you had success with them?—In a very small proportion of cases. I have figures here with regard to persons who have come into Murray's Asylum. It is easier to give statistics of them.

7094. But apart from statistics: can you give us a general idea?—It is extremely difficult for me to say much about these outside cases. I merely see them. One or two friends come to me in great trouble about an inebriate; an arrangement is made for him to go away; I lose sight of him until, perhaps after all, he may turn up at the asylum in a very degraded state.

7095. Will you give us your experience in the asylum of these voluntary inebriates?—For the purpose of doing so, I looked over the admissions into Murray's Asylum for 15 years—from 1880 to 1894 inclusive. In that time we had a total admission of 229 men and 234 women—that is to say, 463 persons came to Murray's Asylum as certified lunatics, and 57 persons came as voluntary patients. That makes 520 cases received into the asylum in 15 years. Of these numbers there were 37 habitual drunkards who had been certified insane, and 11 habitual drunkards who were voluntary patients. That is to say, the cases in which alcohol played a part in the causation of mental disease were 48 out of 520.

7096. That is a small percentage as compared with that usually given, which runs up to 10 per cent.?—It is 9·2 per cent. I have always occupied this position, that I have endeavoured to keep habitual drunkards out of the asylum. Holding that idea so strongly, it reduces the number of alcoholic cases. Murray's Asylum only deals with better or middle class patients; we have no pauper class. Dealing with these cases one is more familiar with their history than one can be in a pauper asylum. It is an extremely difficult thing to arrive at a proper estimation of the alcoholic cases in a pauper asylum where the history ascertained is imperfect, but even in that case, the numbers are often 15 per cent. of the whole admissions.

7097. Thirty-seven habitual drunkards came in to you certified as lunatics?—Yes; 30 males and 7 females.

7098. What results did you get in these cases?—I have taken the two classes together, and the result up to date is this:—Remaining habitual drunkards 10—(that is out of 48); 12 remain in a state of dementia; 12 are reported as remaining very well, and these are noted as having been discharged 'recovered.' It should be stated, however, that of these only two are really hopeful of permanent recovery; Thirteen died, and one case is reported 'unknown.' The fact is, you can never pronounce an habitual drunkard cured until you know his whole life history. The 'unknown' case went to Australia, and we have been unable to trace it.

7099. How far is insanity to be pre-supposed in connection with the 57 cases who came in voluntarily?—I took voluntary and certified patients together, and classified them. I looked upon them from the point of view of the physician. I did not look upon them from the legal point of view, whether they came voluntarily or were sent. Even voluntary patients are sometimes under compulsion, for it may be that they cannot get money unless they go to an asylum. I have divided them into five classes. The first class may be regarded as the direct result of alcoholism. There were 17 people, who, as far as I could ascertain, owed their mental break-down to their drunken habits. I have called that Class 'A.' Class 'B' represents those alcoholics who were victims to hereditary insanity. They numbered 16. Class 'C' represents a most important class—those who had inherited alcoholism either from the father or mother or some near ancestor—they numbered 11. Then there are some drunkards who require to be classed separately, who become drunkards by reason of physical infirmity. That is Class 'D,' and I have three in it. In Class 'E' I have only one who took to drinking in consequence of

Dr. Alexander Reid Urquhart. mental affliction or domestic distress, and that was a woman. That disposes of 48 cases. The percentage of those upon the total admissions ran thus:—

11 Dec. 1894.

Class A Alcoholism direct,	3·2
„ B Hereditary Insanity,	3·0
„ C Hereditary Alcoholism,	2·1
„ D Physical Stress,	5·8
„ E Mental Stress,	1·9
Total,	9·2

7100. You seem to get a good many more alcoholics in Murray's Asylum than are to be found in most public asylums?—That was perhaps the result of an accident. I had to give evidence in a divorce case, and in the newspapers Murray's Asylum was mentioned as 'Murray's Home for Inebriates.' That had a very significant effect; for the moment it became public that Murray's Royal Asylum was an institution for the reception of inebriates, there ensued a great increase in the numbers seeking admission.

7101. You think there is a public demand for such an institution?—I distinctly think so from that experience.

7102. What are the charges for your patients?—The ordinary minimum charge is £60 a year; but of course it goes up indefinitely. We have patients up to £400 a year, according to the accommodation, and so on. We also act as a local charity, and take middle-class patients from the County of Perth who may be unable to pay the ordinary minimum.

7102A. In these cases do you make any difference in the treatment?—We try to make as little difference in the treatment as possible. No ordinary visitors would know who the patients are—charitable or otherwise.

7103. That is not the case, is it, with those who pay highly?—Practically there are two classes—those who pay under £100, and those who pay over £100. These alcoholic cases usually pay a small rate of board.

7104. Are these cases connected with Perth?—Not specially. We have no district for them.

7105. Have you any other figures on the same subject?—Yes. As a physician I was very much struck by the amount of actual disease accompanying alcoholism in the cases I have already mentioned: 16 suffered from heart disease (cardiac affection); eight from syphilis; nine from epileptiform attacks; seven from paralysis; four from pulmonary diseases; one from cancer; and one from a uterine disease. These drunkards were nearly all diseased, and I put that before you to show the absolute necessity for medical supervision in places for the treatment of these persons.

7106. Surely you must have got hold of a particularly diseased lot?—We examined them very carefully for disease. Many patients came in not knowing that they were diseased. Some of these troubles, especially the heart troubles, might easily be overlooked in ordinary life.

7107. Do you think in the existing houses for inebriates in Scotland, not very large in number, say Queensberry House and the place in Peebles; do you think the inmates of these are diseased to anything like the same extent?—I should not think so. In certificated cases there is more likelihood of disease.

7108. But you had both sorts?—Speaking broadly, the voluntary patients were not so deeply affected by disease as the certificated.

7109. What was the average term of their residence?—The average residence of certificated patients was one year and of voluntary patients three months.

7110. Tell us the conditions under which a voluntary patient comes to you?—A person who desires to be a voluntary patient in a lunatic asylum has to write a letter to the Board of Lunacy in Edinburgh, and state his wish to them. The Lunacy Board in reply to that letter grant sanction, and the person may reside in the asylum he chooses to name.

7111. How long do these formalities take?—Well, they take a little time. I have sometimes sent a special messenger to Edinburgh to get the reply from the Lunacy Board.

7112. And in the meantime can you take in a man who may feel an attack coming on?—Well, it is necessary sometimes to do something with a man until we hear from Edinburgh.

7113. You could put him under supervision?—I have done so: it is inconvenient, but it is found necessary to safeguard the position in that way.

7114. Once they are admitted can they get out when they like?—On giving three days' notice. A person may say 'I have been here a week. I do not like it. I give you notice. I am a voluntary patient and will leave.' In the meantime his friends may be communicated with, but beyond the three days I have no power to detain him; he must be allowed to go.

7115. I suppose the three days' notice is to give you time to detect any development of symptoms of insanity?—He might be certified within three days, but it is not considered good practice to receive a man as a voluntary patient into an institution and then certify him as insane in order to detain him there. It is generally preferred that he should go to another institution when certified, and there is a circular of the Lunacy Board to that effect.

7116. This voluntary system is peculiar to Scotland is it not?—It has been extended to England by the late Act. They are now allowed to take these voluntary boarders, as they are called, in England. The reason that we take these patients into the asylum is a financial one. These voluntary patients are usually so poor that they cannot undertake the expense of separate care, and so it becomes necessary to adjust the difficulties of the situation, and use the power we have for the detention of the habitual drunkards. I should be inclined to suggest that Murray's Asylum should have two separate houses, one for men and one for women, for this particular class of person.

7117. Do you think that the directors and trustees of an institution like yours would care to incur the expense of having separate houses?—I think it would pay the expense.

7118. What could you do it for—what sort of board could you afford to take?—It would do if they could pay £60 a year.

7119. You think £1 a week would pay?—About that.

7120. For the treatment of those people you propose a sentence as long as 12 months?—I should be inclined to have the maximum period extended to two years with a system of probation.

7121. You are aware that under the Habitual Drunkards Acts there is a system of letting out persons who are committed on a sort of license?—But there have been difficulties in dealing with refractory cases.

7122. How do you deal with refractory cases?—If a man is in voluntary confinement, and if he is refractory, he comes and says:—'I cannot subscribe to these rules,' and he leaves. I think there should be a much more stringent arrangement for the proper treatment of these cases. I think although they should pay £1 a week, they ought to be compelled to do some useful work, and that their comfort should be proportioned to the amount of work done.

7123. You think although they pay a reasonable amount for maintenance they should be made to do a certain amount of work?—I think the great failure in connection with the treatment of such cases is that they can shirk work. A large proportion of them are useless, listless men whom one usually finds in the asylum billiard-room, or loafing about smoking, instead of working in the garden.

7124. These are voluntary patients?—They usually begin well, but in a short time they tire of garden work, and then the system of plotting and planning to avoid all wholesome regulations and to get drink begins, and spreads in the place. There is not only objection to these people on the part of the physicians of the asylum, but also on the part of the insane patients residing in the asylum to being brought into contact with these degraded persons.

Dr. Alexander Reid Urquhart.
11 Dec. 1894.

*Dr. Alexander
Urquhart.*

11 Dec. 1894.

7125. In the case of certain habituels do you select their work for them and insist on their working?—We cannot insist upon any work. You cannot insist on a lunatic working, but you can persuade an insane person more readily than an habitual drunkard.

7126. What would you do in the case of a patient paying a large amount—say £200 or £300 a year; you could hardly put that person to work even if it might be good for him?—That of course is a legal question. I say, as a physician, it should be done. How it is to be done must be left to the lawyers. I have all along laid great stress on this question of employment for insane patients; and, looking back on those 15 years, I have only lost one patient because of this wholesome rule of useful occupation. Of course we have amusement in the asylum, but occupation is far more beneficial and far more restorative than mere amusement.

7127-28. What employment would you consider suitable and remunerative for such patients?—The form of occupation that we try to develop is mechanical work in the carpenter's shop, brass-hammered work, wood-carving, and so on.

7129. What do you do with it?—We use it in the institution for the decoration of doors and windows. A great many are employed in the garden and on the farm.

7130. We have heard a great consensus of opinion as to the advantage of out-door occupation—pretty hard work—for all those cases of habitual drunkenness, and so on. Can you give us some information as to what you get out of it. If we are going to deal with that class of people who are poor, do you think that agriculture could be made at all remunerative?—I am not sanguine about their costing the country nothing, but I think the cost might be very much reduced by their labour in agriculture. If you have a suitable place for patients of the lower class, then you could grow many of the things needed for the institution and so save their purchase.

7131. Have you got a farm?—It is only about 50 acres.

7132. How do you work your women?—They do not work outside at all.

7133. Do you think it would be good for them that they should work?—Yes, distinctly; but you cannot find employment which public feeling would sanction. I think all insane persons are better employed, but they often say, 'We did not come here to work. We are 'paying a good board.'

7134. But if you had women inclined to work, what form of out-door work would you consider suitable for them?—For women of the poorer class laundry work has been very much developed.

7135. But all the world cannot live by taking in its neighbours' washing. Your women do not do laundry work?—No.

7136. Have you ever tried gardening for women?—We have never had any of them so employed. We have asked some to help, but they did not care about it. There is a certain stigma about field work.

7137. In your opinion little good will result from the compulsory detention of dipsomaniacs unless useful healthy work is also compulsory in the treatment: now if you are to talk of healthy work for women you must make up your mind as to what it is to be. Do you know how they employ pauper patients in other asylums?—Different occupations. Some are in the laundry, others are picking hair, some knitting ordarning stockings or making dresses: you cannot take them out of the groove in which they have been brought up, you must try to give them what they have been accustomed to do.

7138. Of course there is always a certain sphere of work for the women in looking after the linen of the establishment?—And in the house and in the kitchen.

7139. You say you only admit habitual drunkards when there is no other course open to harassed relations; but you don't regard the results as at all satisfactory?—I cannot say they are. I have mentioned 12 recoveries to-day, but I believe only two of these actually recovered. I think they will do well.

7140. How long were they with you?—I cannot say at the moment.

7141. Were they certificated or voluntary?—Certificated and voluntary. Results vary greatly in regard to each particular case. I have been very much struck, in my experience, with the rareness of dipsomania. There have only been one or two cases of dipsomania in my experience—that is to say, of the very incurable form of irresistible drunkenness which is almost always a hereditary disease. I think dipsomania does sometimes follow on from habitual drunkenness; but, in my experience, the real dipsomania has been extremely rare. Then I had some remarks about the conditions that would justify interference. I think that is an entirely legal question. We have complete machinery in Scotland for dealing with questions of that sort, vested in the Sheriff Court, the Procurator-Fiscal, and the Inspector of the Poor; but there should also be facility for the admission of voluntary boarders into inebriate asylums. There should be a complete system for dealing with these difficult and troublesome cases, where a man may be making an income sufficient to keep his family in comfort, but whose drunken habits make it perfectly evident that he will make a bad end to his life. The question arises whether he should be segregated from the world although he is able to work. —I think that could only be adjusted by a court considering each particular case.

7142. You think that is a sufficiently important matter to be adjudicated on by the sheriff?—Yes, the sheriff, sitting in chambers, should receive medical evidence, and ordinary evidence, so as to enable him to deal with the question. In former days in Scotland the sheriffs used to send habitual drunkards to one of the islands on Loch Lomond or to an asylum.

7143. What former days?—Before the Lunacy Act of 1857.

7144. Under what law?—The sheriff at that time was the supreme authority in lunacy for his district, and he could order, by the earlier Acts of Scotland, lunatics to be dealt with in any way he thought fit. Many of the sheriffs looked upon habitual drunkards as lunatics, and treated them in that way. There was a considerable number of habitual drunkards came from England to Scotch Asylums. Under the stringent regulations imposed by the present Acts the sheriff has no authority now to order the detention of a person whose only symptom of insanity is an uncontrollable desire to intoxicate himself.

7145. Do you think they differentiated in the old days between dipsomania, which you say is very rare, and the ordinary habitual drunkenness we have to deal with?—Well, perhaps it is rather a refinement to differentiate between dipsomania and habitual drunkenness. The practical effect is the same. I think that the attempt to reform these persons comes too late in the day, and that we should look more to education, to the raising of the scale of comfortable living, and to better social and physical conditions to prevent the formation of drinking habits.

7145A. I am afraid that is outside our remit.—But it really is at the beginning of the cure of habitual drunkenness.

7146. You have spoken of the case of habitual drunkards who might be committed to retreats at the instance of their friends; have you anything to say about the quasi-criminal habitual drunkard—the man or the woman who has been convicted again and again of offences before the police or sheriff court?—I think there should be reformatories for these cases. I think if a person is again and again convicted, and if he shows, as nearly all these cases do, marks of degeneration, that he should be sent to a reformatory. I do not think that an hospital is a place for him, and I do not think the jail is the place for him. There should be buildings in Scotland available for the purpose of dealing with these people from a reformatory point of view. You cannot deal with them by boarding them out in the first place, because they ought to come under medical observation and treatment, but if it were found that they could be boarded out with advantage, that would be a far more efficient method of dealing with them than by relegating them to a huge barracks.

7147. Have you boarded-out any of your patients?—I have referred to that under the name of private care.

7148. We have not been able to get the exact powers of detention which care-takers have over lunatics. Can you tell us about them?—If the person is insane the care-taker's house becomes practically a lunatic asylum for one patient, and the patient can be detained in that house and treated as if he were in a lunatic asylum. If a person is not insane, then it would be an offence against the law if anybody interfered with his liberty. I have sent an attendant to see a man through an attack of delirium tremens, and the attendant would have instructions not to allow the patient to get drink, and, as a matter of fact, does his best to prevent it. But he has no real authority to prevent him from getting drink, and it would be quite open to the person on recovering from his mania to prosecute him for assault.

7149. As a matter of fact it is an assault for a surgeon to perform an operation?—But surgeons have the consent of the patient, and you cannot very well get the consent of the insane drunkard.

7150. It is a question whether, in the case where the operation is not successful, consent would be held to be binding. But, not to go into that, have you ever known of a 'D.T.' patient raising an action against a doctor, an attendant, or his friends?—It has been threatened often enough, but I have never known a man do it.

7151. Have you sent many patients to private houses under the rule that, I believe, exists, whereby you can say that so-and-so suffers from an incipient attack of insanity, and would be better to be treated in a private house?—That refers to insane patients.

7152. I am looking for an analogy which we might avail ourselves of, in connection with the treatment of habitual drunkenness?—The law of Scotland runs in this way; that if a person is not in a confirmed state of insanity, under medical certificate he may be relegated to a private house, with the cognizance of the Commissioners in Lunacy, for a period not exceeding six months. That might very well be extended to habitual drunkenness.

7153. What powers of detention has the person, to whom the patient is committed for six months, over him?—You immediately turn the house into a private lunatic asylum for one patient.

7154. And you think the people in the house have the same legal power as you have in a lunatic asylum?—I have always assumed that; I am not aware that it has ever been questioned.

7155. How long has that existed as a provision of the law?—Since 1857, amended in 1866. We are inclined to think that Scotland in various matters of lunacy, and especially in that, is in a very good position. The Commissioners are aware of the detention, but the person so detained is not branded with any particular mark. It is a private arrangement, and does not come before the sheriff. But, on the other hand, you can well believe that the cases for private care, from the point of view of suitability, and also from the point of view of expense, renders this section of the Act applicable to a few well-to-do cases.

7156. Do you think there would be any possibility of putting out any of those habituais to farmers who would receive them, at a low rate of board, on condition of their working about the farm?—I should look with great hope to that, if they were boarded out after having passed through a probationary stage. I do not think boarding out would be at all successful unless it were preceded by medical observation and reformatory treatment.

7157. You would have a probationary period of reformatory and medical treatment, and then give greater and greater liberty?—I would very strongly urge that should be done—that the reformatory should be supplemented by the widest possible distribution of habitual drunkards, instead of keeping them concentrated. I am very chary about laying down a hard and fast period of detention, because some cases do extremely well with a very short detention. Why should a man be detained any longer than is necessary? As soon as he shows that he has regained self-control he ought to be allowed to depart.

7158. Have you anything to say about the relative chances of cure between a patient who comes in voluntarily, from a desire to get saved from his enslaving habit, and the man who is sent to you as a certified lunatic from the results of delirium tremens or other kind of mania dependent on drinking?—It is quite impossible to institute any comparison on that line for this reason; if a person comes in suffering from any of the various acute forms of alcoholism which we treat in asylums—as soon as the more acute symptoms subside, and the patient shows no symptoms of insanity whatever, except an overwhelming desire to be intoxicated, the physician in charge must discharge the patient. He has no authority to detain any person whose only symptom of insanity is the drink crave. Then he is brought face to face with the question, whether this person to be discharged into the outer world can be persuaded by friend or physician that it is better for him to remain where he is for a time as a voluntary patient. They sometimes remain; and so vitiate the statistics of recovery of voluntary patients compared with certified patients.

7159. What I wanted generally was your impression as to the chance of a person committed, in order to be cured of drunken habits, being benefited by his restraint for a good period?—I think there can be no doubt that he will be benefited by abstinence and by proper moral control, whether he comes himself or is committed.

7160. (By Miss Stevenson.) Can you grant a certificate of six months' detention in a private house to a person whom you could send to a certified lunatic asylum?—It is done in order to keep the patient out of an asylum.

7161. Would you grant such a certificate in cases of what might be called incipient lunacy?—Yes, if the disease is not confirmed, it is legal to grant such a certificate.

7162. The certificate is granted, I understand, more for the protection of the person who receives the patient than to give him any power of legal detention?—Yes, it is for the protection of the person receiving the patient, but it is also for the protection of the patient who is received.

7163. But, I understand, that people who receive these patients have really no legal power to detain them?—I should say they have power to detain them. That is my opinion, and I have always acted upon it.

7165. Do you know that horticulture is now a very common employment for educated women, and that there are two colleges in England where they can receive training in horticulture. Would it be possible to introduce anything of that kind amongst the educated women in the asylum?—I understand that women are now entering on very various occupations. Horticulture is only one of many such pursuits. I should be very sorry to shut out women from any pursuit in which they are interested.

7166. Would it not be possible to introduce something of that kind among the more educated women patients?—Well, I have to do with such prejudiced persons, that anything approaching real, hard work out of doors is to them a great difficulty. They have not been accustomed to it.

7167. You think they could not be induced to undertake such work as many educated women are now

Dr. Alexander Reid Urquhart.
11 Dec. 1894.

Dr. Alexander Reid Urquhart.
11 Dec. 1894. engaged in?—I should find it most difficult. A lady might be induced to go into the conservatory and water the flowers, or cut away dead leaves, but that is looked upon as an amusement.

7168. It is not real work?—No.

7169. (By Dr. Farquharson) I think you are disposed to classify cases of habitual intemperance?—Yes.

7170. Some are more curable and some less?—Yes, certainly.

7171. Are a certain number of these cases considered to be incurable from the beginning?—Yes, I think so. A person with hereditary alcoholism is generally an incurable case.

7172. Remedial treatment would be thrown away on a case like that?—I believe such a person is generally incurable; but, on the other hand, in medicine the unexpected often happens, and we cannot say that medicine is in such a perfect state that this case must be declared curable and that incurable. We can only give our opinion according to the best of our experience. For instance, I discharge a patient against all belief that he will do well, and he does well. A great deal depends on the home he is going to and its influences, and upon his social conditions and surroundings. But, I am afraid, that, even if you had reformatories and parliamentary powers of detention, the number of habitual drunkards who would be cured would not be great. At the same time, it has to be considered that you would clear the streets of these people, and that the moral effect of the new system upon people falling into habits of drinking would be extremely deterrent. By shutting up inebriates in a reformatory, you prevent them propagating more unfit descendants to take their place. I do not think it would be a good argument to say that, because 50 per cent. of the lunatics in asylums are incurable, therefore there should be no asylums.

7173. You think it is worth trying the experiment?—I am extremely anxious to see it tried. Those who are connected with asylums know only too well the misery that families have to undergo owing to some drunken member, and it seems to me that the country ought, if possible, to do something to obviate in some measure the evils that arise from habitual drunkenness.

7174. The experiment would have a better chance of being successful if you could get the cases earlier?—I think so. That is why I referred to education as being in the highest degree necessary—education, I mean, as to the physical conditions of life. We should try to prevent a man from becoming an habitual drunkard. Better do that than try to cure him afterwards. The drunkard should also be protected against temptation, and those who give him drink should be dealt with. At present the law in Scotland is, that if persons are frequently seen to issue from a public-house in a state of intoxication, the publican is liable to be punished; but the police manifestly do not so interfere.

7175. You think these cases of organic disease would, at all events, have been saved if they had been taken earlier?—A number of them.

7176. Is it not a difficulty in the way of getting these cases at an early stage, to get sufficient evidence to ensure what you might call protection of these cases?—You cannot interfere with the liberty of a man unless he has done something to permit the law to interfere.

7177. By that time the earlier state might have passed by?—I cannot suggest any means of interfering at an earlier stage.

7178. In those cases of what may be called domestic and unobtrusive drinking, where a man is carrying on his ordinary vocation and supporting his family, but giving way to bouts of drunkenness, what class of evidence would you suggest for bringing him before a tribunal?—It would be necessary for the family or for a public official to direct the attention of the sheriff to such a case. Expert evidence would have to be adduced that the case was one suitable for interference.

7179. Would you contemplate having medical evidence?—Probably the family doctor would know more about the drinking habits of the man than any other person, and, naturally, would be an important witness.

Dr. Alexander Reid Urquhart.
11 Dec. 1894. 7180. Who would support the family if the father were taken away from the household: would you make the wife and children a burden on the state or the locality?—I am not prepared to say.

7181. Have you any faith in medical treatment. I don't refer to gold and other cures, but to what are called legitimate therapeutic means of diminishing the crave?—I think I have rung the changes on them all—The treatment I have found most successful has been the administration of iodide of potassium. But that does not diminish the drink crave except indirectly by its effect on the brain.

7182. I think you stated that an objection to a large reformatory establishment was the tendency to conspiracy among the inmates to get drink?—Yes, as at present constituted.

7183. Don't you think it might operate the other way; that, if all the people came in voluntarily, the stronger among the people might tend to encourage the weaker?—In my experience I have found it the reverse.

7184. But these people all come in voluntarily with a strong desire to be cured?—I do not think repentance is very prolonged.

7185. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Have you ever tried tartar emetic with the view of creating a disgust at alcohol?—No.

7186. You have read, I daresay, that, about 20 or 30 years ago, it was used with pretty good results?—It is the custom of the women in some parts of England to buy a pennyworth of 'quietness' for their husbands on Saturday nights, and thus administer tartar emetic to their husbands when drunk.

7187. It is the only medicine known to create a disgust at alcohol, and is, or has been used for that purpose in England and Scotland?—I have not heard that it has been used in Scotland. I know it is used in England.

7188. You described the physical condition of the 48 inebriates who had been in your asylum, and indicated that they were nearly all in a state of disease; what disease had the larger proportion of them?—Cardiac complaints and syphilis.

7189. Do you find any bad effects from the limited association of inebriates with cases of mania, delusional insanity, dementia, and other forms of insanity?—I think owing to the low moral tone of habitual drunkards association cannot be good. The stories which they retail, and the actions they are guilty of, have been extremely repulsive to other patients, and it sometimes happens that I have to request an habitual drunkard, who is a voluntary patient, to leave as being subversive of the welfare of the establishment.

7190. At present in some quarters, notably in Paris, the idea is that these people should be herded together in what has been termed an asile alcoolique?—If an ideal arrangement could be made, I would have every alcoholic case separate: but, inasmuch as financial considerations rule the treatment of individuals, the next best thing is to segregate these habitual drunkards in institutions by themselves.

7191. What would you indicate as about the proper size of such a house?—I think they should be quite small for the better class of patients. I should be sorry to see more than a dozen in one house.

7192. Are you aware that the proposal now afoot in Paris to have an asile alcoolique three miles from the city, capable of holding 600 patients?—No.

7193. You said that it was difficult to get hold of those people who are known to be swillers and soakers, because they do not commit any offence; but, supposing drunkenness per se were made an offence in law, what then?—I don't think any government would make drunkenness per se or prodigality an offence. I could not believe that such a proposal would enter into the range of practical politics.

7194. Supposing you were told that, in the last 10 years in Scotland alone, 40 or 50 people suffering from delusional insanity or the delusions and loss of control following one or more bouts of drinking, or delirium tremens, &c., committed offences ending in murder or something not far removed from murder, and that these people were well known to go about in a state of drunkenness month after month and year after year; don't you think the state would be justified in laying hold of these people before they committed grave crime?—Well, they might be held to have committed overt acts, such as offences against public decency, or public morals.

Dr. Alexander Reid Urquhart.
11 Dec. 1894.

7195. Have you any objections to drunkenness per se being made an offence?—A man might be drinking at home in the privacy of his chamber, and it would be difficult to make that an offence.

7196. Take the case of a man who had become a secret drinker in his own house, and whose family found it necessary to appeal to the police, in so far as when intoxicated he became violent and dangerous and generally a nuisance?—As soon as he becomes threatening and dangerous it is an offence.

7197. If he be threatening in demeanour he would surely come within the province of the police?—Yes.

7198. What do you think is the effect of the spread of education in regard to lunacy, and even in regard to inebriety: is either lessening or increasing?—I think it has, on the whole, a lessening effect. People take better care of themselves now, and they are better qualified to take care of themselves.

7199. Is drunkenness less common, is insanity less frequent than it was?—I should say that drunkenness is less common. You very seldom see anything of that sort in the better class of society. In regard to insanity, there is no proof of a marked increase of insanity. I do believe there is an increase in nervous affections that tend toward insanity. One, however, must be guarded in such matters not to make rash statements.

7200. You said in reply to Miss Stevenson that no medical practitioner could send a person to a private house for six months unless that house were licensed, and unless the Board of Lunacy had some control over the lunatic or his keeper?—Not exactly licensed. A license is a technical term referring to the reception of more than one case. What I said was this: that, if a person is relegated, as an insane person whose malady is not confirmed, to a private house; then, in order to provide for the protection of the people who receive him for gain, and for the protection of the patient himself, it is necessary that a medical man should certify. It is only in cases where the malady is not confirmed that the person is sent to a private house for a period not exceeding so many months. The medical certificate is sent to Edinburgh, so that the Board of Lunacy may have cognisance of every case so treated.

7201. Are there any cases where lunatics are detained and subjected to methods of control, of which the Board of Lunacy have no knowledge?—If there are, it is against law, subject to the provisions of the Lunacy Acts.

7202. What control have the Board of Lunacy over unconfirmed cases sent by medical practitioners to private houses for six months. Do they visit these cases?—No.

7203. Then the Board of Lunacy have practically no control over the custody of lunatics under these circumstances?—Of course they have control if they like to exercise it. They would visit them no doubt if they had information which led them to believe it was necessary to do so.

7204. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Do a large proportion of habitual drunkards owe their tendency to excessive drinking to a diseased state of their mind or body?—I think so. Of course it is extremely difficult to arrive at correct information in regard to hereditary tendencies. I have just mentioned, in reply to Sir Charles Cameron, that out of 48 habitual drunkards, 16 persons had hereditary insanity in their families, and 11 persons had hereditary alcoholism. It is a most delicate inquiry to make. There are all sorts of difficulties in getting such information.

7205. Still, in a great many cases, drinking is really caused by disease?—There is no doubt about that. In such cases predisposition is an important factor.

Dr. Alexander Reid Urquhart.
11 Dec. 1894.
7206. What do you think of sentences of imprisonment as tending to cure habitual drinking?—I do not think that the prison is a place for habitual drunkards. It would be rash to say that a short sentence might not cure a patient. I know that Mr Mould of the Royal Manchester Asylum, has strong views on that point. He finds sometimes excellent results follow from a short period of residence in the Asylum.

7207. But I am speaking more of periods of imprisonment. Do you think that putting a man in prison for a month or for two months tends to diminish the crave for drink that is in him?—Well, he would be benefited by the abstinence. As long as a person is not drinking, there is a chance of the alcohol being eliminated from his body, and his brain brought into a normal state. I don't say, however, that confinement in a cell is a satisfactory condition for cure.

7208. What about short sentences of imprisonment. Do you think they have any deterrent effect on a habitual drunkard?—I think they only further degrade him to no purpose. He loses his self-respect by successive sentences of imprisonment, and gets no corresponding benefit.

7209. Am I right in understanding that your ideal way to treat them would be to commit them something in the way in which lunatics are committed for an indefinite period?—Lunatics are not committed for an indefinite period. They are committed for a period of three years, and have to be re-certified at the end of that time.

7210. Then, would you regard three years as the maximum period for the commitment of habitual drunkards?—I think two years would be enough. It is really not a question that one could be dogmatical about.

7211. Your idea is, that after a period in a reformatory such cases might be boarded out with advantage?—Yes, I think so. They might gradually gain their liberty again in that way. I believe there have been one or two places in America conducted most successfully in that way.

7212. You have mentioned America: do you know anything about Elmira?—I have one patient from Elmira.

7213. Tell us what you know about Elmira?—This particular person committed offences. He went to Germany but got into trouble there. He then found his way to America. He got into trouble there, and passed two years in Elmira, and, I believe, became manager of the umbrella-making shop. He looks back upon that as a pleasant episode in his chequered life. But of course the statements of all such individuals must be received with incredulity.

7214. Do you know that the rates charged at Elmira are high?—He must have paid nothing. (Dr. Sutherland.) It is a state institution. (Witness.) After the person I speak of was discharged, I believe he worked his way home on an Atlantic liner.

7215. (Examination continued by Professor Dove Wilson.) Have you any information of the kind of treatment that a patient undergoes in Elmira?—They undergo medical treatment and massage, baths, gymnastics, &c.

7216. Do you think that at Elmira people are allowed out on probation?—I think they are. This man says that he had parole at Elmira, but he necessarily makes his statement to tell in his favour here. I have one or two suggestions I should like to make in regard to these degenerates who come under my notice. Some of the men who are sent to prison for crimes are really not fit subjects for prison, and I should like to see the practice here assimilated to that in Belgium, where they have appointed an Inspector of Criminals—a man qualified by his practical knowledge of psychological medicine to weed out those weak-minded persons, and to report to the Government as to what should be their destination.

7217. (By the Chairman.) Where do they send them to?—They send them to lunatic asylums.

7218. But Col. M'Hardy tells me that there is a medical officer who looks after these cases in Scotland in connection with the prisons. There are, no doubt, in prison persons who are on the border line of insanity ; but, if these were relegated to asylums, the difficulty would be not less with them in asylums than it has been in prisons ?—I was not aware that the Government had made such an appointment.

Dr. Alexander Reid Urquhart.

11 Dec. 1894.

7219. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You made a wide distinction between a felon and a habitual drunkard ?—A felon may be a habitual drunkard, a drunkard needn't be a felon, but both are vicious. [Witness then withdrew.]

Dr. Alexander Reid Urquhart.

11 Dec. 1894.

Mr. William Clarke.

MR. WILLIAM CLARKE, Deputy-Governor of the Prison of Perth, called in and examined.

Mr. William Clarke.

7220. (By the Chairman.) How long have you occupied your present position ?—For nine years. Previous to that I was in Greenock and Edinburgh. I have had 30 years' experience of prisons.

7221. What is your opinion on the subject of habitual offenders and their treatment ?—I think that short sentences are very ineffective to prevent crime.

7222. You have tried to do some individual work in the prisons with which you have been connected. You have gone round to see the prisoners, and have tried to instil good advice into them ?—I have done that from the very earliest time. I was a director of the Prisoners' Aid Society ; and I was in touch with ladies who visited the prison, and also with the chaplains, and got them to take an interest in the prisoners.

7223. What is the result of your own work in that way. Do you think you have been able to make much impression on the prisoners ?—I think so. By taking an interest in individual cases I believe good work can be done. I have seen good done by helping prisoners after they get out, especially first offenders.

7224. I understand you have a Prisoners' Aid Society in Perth ?—We have.

7225. But I am told it does not receive any of the Government Grant ?—So I believe.

7226. Why is that ?—I don't know. I don't happen to be a member of committee.

7227. Have you any suggestions to make as to the treatment of habitual petty offenders ?—Well, if you could carry public opinion with you, I should recommend that the sentences should be made heavier. That would be for the benefit of habitual offenders, and would benefit the community as well.

7228. You have been in Edinburgh, Greenock and Perth ; you must have seen different sentences meted out for the same crime ?—Very different.

7229. In connection with drunk and disorderly cases—you have seen them in one prison for as much as 30 days ?—60 days.

7230. And in another for five days ?—Less. For 24 hours.

7231. Do you think long sentences prove more deterrent than short ?—Not in the case of incorrigibles.

7232. Take cases of solicitation—you have probably seen in Edinburgh different sentences given from what you had at Greenock or Perth ?—Yes.

7233. Have you noticed any more reformatory effect ?

—No ; when I was in Edinburgh they tried various means to repress prostitution, but they all appeared to prove equally unsuccessful. In 1866 they got a provisional order, whereby a woman could be sent to prison if a constable swore that she was on the street for the purpose of soliciting ; but that had not the desired effect. They got an act passed later which sent these women over the boundary line into Leith. Now they are all over the town.

7234. If petty offenders could be sentenced to reformatory work on a farm, would you think it should be for long or short periods ?—It should be for a lengthened period.

7235. You would not call 60 days a long sentence ?—By no means.

7236. (By Col. McHardy.) You know a good deal about the Female Home at Greenock ?—Yes.

7237. Was there much done for discharged prisoners in that institution ?—A very great deal.

7238. It is mostly laundry work that is done in it ?—Yes ; at the time I knew it the laundry work almost supported the institution.

7239. Is laundry work not a good thing to use as reformatory work, seeing that these persons might get work in the public laundries afterwards ?—I am afraid they would have trouble in getting work in the ordinary public laundry. The other workers might look down upon them.

7240. Laundries, as a rule, are somewhat roughish places ?—Well, in big towns possibly they are.

7241. In Perth ?—They are rather respectable.

7242. Have you many prisoners just now in Perth for begging ?—Not many.

7243. Is there much of it in the county ?—There is a good deal of it in the tourist season and down to the end of September.

7244. What is the usual punishment ?—Oh, a few days. Seven days, ten days. They are generally short sentences. I have never known a long sentence given for begging.

7245. When sentences are short now, as compared with what they were, you would expect to find re-apprehension much more common ?—I knew of a case of a noted character in Edinburgh who spent 300 days in prison in one year on sentences ranging from 24 hours to 60 days. It would have been much better to have given her nine months straight away. [The witness then retired.]

Rev. John McCallum.

The Rev. JOHN McCALLUM, Free Church Minister, Ardeonaig, Loch Tay, called in and examined.

Rev. John McCallum.

7246. (By the Chairman.) I understand there are a number of gipsies—tinkers, in your district. You have taken a good deal of interest in them ?—Yes.

7247. How many, roughly speaking, are there ?—Well, I got some statistics privately from all the Chief Constables in 1868. They are defective, for I did not get any returns from Argyllshire, in which, I am sure, there are many tinkers. But, from the statistics I got, I find there were at that time 855 tinkers in Scotland altogether. In Perthshire the number was the same as that given by the Chief Constable a month ago—211.

7248. Your own particular district is near Killin ?—Yes, on the south side of Loch Tay.

7249. In your district there are certain gipsy encampments ?—They only pass through.

7250. Do you know much about them ?—I have taken an interest in them for a number of years.

7251. Take, in the first place, the moral difficulty.

Are they members of any church ?—Not so far as I am aware of.

7252. Do you know anything about the nature of their marriages ?—No, except what I read of in books. I have met a minister occasionally who said he had performed the marriage ceremony among them.

7253. You are aware that they have a ceremony of their own before they live together as man and wife ?—I have heard that.

7254. In your district are the children registered as legitimate or illegitimate ?—I am told they are registered ; but I have never been informed whether as legitimate or illegitimate.

7255. You speak of their being in a degraded state ; to what do you refer ?—I refer to the fact that they are living in the open air summer and winter in these frail canvas tents which cannot keep out the rain or cold. They are made of a bit of canvas thrown over a few hazel sticks ; and they sleep under that cover summer and winter.

Rev. John
M'Callum.

11 Dec. 1894.

7256. Are there any complaints of crimes committed by them in your district?—No.

7257. What reputation have they on the whole?—Honest.

7258. The only complaints are regarding begging and drunkenness?—Yes.

7259. Assuming that the women are married according to rules of their own, have they a reputation otherwise of being moral?—I cannot say as to that. I have my own suspicion that things are not right.

7260. But you have not heard complaints about them being loose or immoral women except among themselves?—Well, I cannot say. But I look upon it in this way, that there are so many men, women, and children, and there are only a couple of tents.

7261. That of course is not decent?—No.

7262. Do they give trouble by their drinking habits. Do they, for example, assault the inhabitants of your district?—No. So far as I am aware, assaults only take place among themselves. They fight among themselves.

7263. About the education of their children—what do you say?—It is very defective. It cannot be otherwise.

7264. Is any mission work attempted to be done among them?—No, except what the ministers of the districts through which they pass do, and that is very little.

7265. In your own district have you ever done anything?—I always make a point, when it is at all convenient, to go where they are and read a few verses and pray with them.

7266. Do they accept these visits gratefully?—Very gratefully.

7267. Do you think anything could be done with the parents?—No. I think nothing could be done with the parents.

7268. You think the young could be dealt with?—I think so.

7269. How do you propose to deal with them?—Well, I should be inclined to make it illegal for any one to travel about the country with children of school-going age.

7270. But that might place a disability on a man like the Duke of Argyll. If you lay down a law of that sort it would have to apply to all classes, and could be put in force against a man whose children might be thoroughly well cared for?—Well, of course, if they produced certificates that they were educated, and had passed the standards, I should be satisfied on that point.

7271. Take the case of a tinker with a family. Suppose his children are 18 months or two years older than each other, that would make him settle down for a long time in a place to satisfy your requirements?—Yes, but he ought to send his children to school when they come of suitable age.

7272. We are all agreed as to the fundamental principle of compulsory education, but how are you to carry it out as against the roving tinker?—My way would be this. Let them have their option to settle down anywhere they please, and send their children to the nearest school. But, in the event of their not submitting to that, I see no other way for it but to send the children to some central institution.

7273. With respect to tinker children being sent to school, we have been told that the other inhabitants of Perthshire would strongly object to such children mixing with the children of the parish?—That is a difficulty of course. But, if they were settled in a place, they would have a house, and the objection would not be so great.

7274. Does your School Board do anything for them?—I am not a member.

7275. What endeavours have been made to get at these children?—No endeavours whatever.

7276. Do you know of any place in Perthshire where the School Board has made any endeavours for them?—No place. I have often made inquiry.

7277. Do you not think that the different School Boards might combine to give each other information about these children, so that they might be followed up from place to place so as to enforce compulsion against them in the same way as is done in the large towns against people who are constantly shifting their residences?—I don't think that practicable. They move about from one parish to another so quickly.

7278. You propose that the County Council should deal with the matter?—Yes.

7279. You say you would like if the County Council had power conferred on them to enable them to gather all these children into one central institution which must be industrial: that the children should be received at as early an age as possible, say five years; that the parents might be allowed to visit them as often as convenient, but, if found trying to get them to leave, they should be punished, and that the policemen should have power to bring back such children as might escape to the institution. The current expenses, you say, might be chargeable on the parishes in which the children may be found to have been born. That is your scheme?—Yes.

7280. You would extinguish the class as distinct from the rest of the community?—That is my ultimate aim.

7281. You think it will not be necessary to erect new buildings for such a purpose, as the present Industrial Institutions—one of which is in almost every county—might meet all the wants of the case?—That is my view.

7282. (By Col. M'Hardy.) You have no close or definite knowledge of these people?—I have often spoken to them.

7283. Where do they come from?—I cannot tell. I have heard they originally came from Egypt.

7284. But they are not by any means the largest number of the moving population?—We have a large number of tramps.

7285. How do you distinguish between the two?—They are easily distinguishable.

7286. In what way?—By their appearance. The tinker population are easily distinguished by their features and their dress. They have a wasted woe-begone look as if they were prematurely old.

7287. The tinkers?—Yes. I believe it is owing to their exposure to the weather.

7288. Then is the vagrant and the ordinary tramp fat and sleek?—Their appearance is different.

7289. There are more vagrants than tinkers?—Well, the vagrants we see pass through singly or in couples. They are not liked in the place. They are generally in search of work.

7290. You say the great difficulty about these gipsies is that they move about from place to place?—Yes, but the gipsies have their rounds. The tramps pass to-day and we may never see them again.

7291. Have you taken any interest in the tramps?—Not much. I could not get hold of them. As for the tinkers, if they pass this week I may reasonably expect another visit from them in the course of a month or two; and the tent is pitched invariably. The tramps, on the other hand, sleep in the farmer's barns or any other outhouse they can get into, and in the morning go away.

7292. Have you any objection to the tramps?—Very serious objections.

7293. What are they?—Well, I have not considered the tramp question as I have the tinker question.

7294. Is it not the more serious question of the two?—It is a serious question that such a large number of people should be thrown upon the general community to support. They come to us professing that they are hungry.

7295. I suppose that is true?—I daresay it is.

7296. What more do they profess?—Well, when you question them, most of them confess that it was strong drink which brought them to such a state.

7297. Have you asked them where they came from and where they were going?—Yes. If a railway has been constructed in the east they say they have come from that railway and are going to seek work at a railway in the west. If you believe them they are always seeking work, but that is a mere excuse. That is, however, what they say.

Rev. John
M'Callum.

Rev. John
McCallum.

11 Dec. 1894.

7298. If there was a railway being constructed in the West Highlands, I suppose they might pass along Loch Tay side from the east, going to that railway or to Glasgow?—I have met men frequently who said they were going to seek work at the West Highland Railway.

7299. There was a certain number of them really men going in search of work and no pretence about it?—I think it was all a pretence.

7300. But they could not have gone in hundreds to the west these two or three years past without some of them coming back again?—Well, I met one the other night who told me he had been to the West Highland Railway, but he left because he was not pleased with the work. He went back to Perth and remained a few months, and now he was going back again to the railroad.

7301. He had thought better of it?—Apparently.

7302. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Who is to support these industrial schools for gipsy children?—The country at large.

7303. Local or imperial taxation?—Perhaps both, in the same way as the ordinary schools which are supported by rates and by a Government Grant.

7304. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Do the gipsies that come to your place travel the whole year round?—Yes.

7305. And live in their tents in winter?—Yes.

7306. Have they no parish in which they reside more than in any other parish?—Not so far as I know. [The witness then withdrew.]

Rev. John
McCallum.

11 Dec. 1894.

Mr. James
Garrow.

Mr. JAMES GARROW, Chief Constable of the City of Perth, called in and examined.

Mr. James
Garrow.

7307. (By the Chairman.) You are Chief Constable of the city of Perth?—Yes.

7308. How long have you occupied that position?—About 18 months.

7309. What police service had you before?—I have 21 years altogether.

7310. Where?—In Lancashire, Ayrshire, East Lothian, Berwickshire, and Perth.

7311. What part of Lancashire were you in?—I was stationed in Ulverston and Burnley; in Ayrshire I was at Troon and Saltcoats; in East Lothian I was at Ormiston and Haddington; in Berwickshire I was at Eyemouth.

7313. In Perth, I daresay, you know pretty well about the career of all your petty offenders, and how often they have been convicted; but it is not so easy in the larger towns?—That is possible, of course.

7314. Do you refer to drunkenness, for instance?—Yes.

7315. Take cases of drunkenness in the counties. Do you think the law is not fully put into operation against them?—Oh, that often meant simply driving them home.

7316. That is because they were fined 5s. or 24 hours?—Yes.

7317. But is there any provision in the law for a greater sentence?—No.

7318. In Perth what do you give them under the new Police Act?—We go the length of 40s. or 30 days, and after repeated offences they can get 14 days additional without the option of a fine. We have had only one case of that kind.

7319. What is the usual treatment?—5s. or 24 hours, or 3 days or 7s. 6d., or 5 days.—That is the general treatment.

7320. If you apprehend a drunk and incapable, and take him to the police office, if he has money on him is he let out when he comes to, on pledge?—Yes.

7321. And if he does not turn up next morning at court you don't bother to apprehend him?—No.

7322. Do you take any precautions to see that he gives the right name?—No, we don't do that. We take it for granted that he is giving the right name.

7323. If he was an inhabitant who called himself Smith when you knew his name was Brown?—We should enter his right name.

7324. Do you consider it a conviction against a man when he forfeits his pledge?—No.

7325. That is rather an important point. If you propose to deal with the habitual drunkard more heavily in proportion to the number of convictions, the fellow who can give a pledge has the best of it?—He gets an advantage.

7326. Whereas, if he were brought up and fined, he would have the conviction recorded against him?—That is so.

7327. That is not, as I understand, practised in the county of Perth?—No it is very different.

7328. The practice, as we are informed, is for the Chief Constable to let men out on bail and to cite them if they do not appear?—That is so with all county cases.

7329. You did that in Haddington, Ayrshire and Berwickshire?—Yes.

7330. What is your opinion as to the relative merits of the two systems?—Well, I believe the county system is the better of the two.

7331. You believe it is a good thing for a man to be brought up?—Yes. Penal regulations are to prevent crime, and the more you expose a man or woman whoever they are, the tendency is to prevent them breaking the law again.

7332. You think that if a person puts the public to the trouble of getting him arrested, and the law prescribes a punishment for the offence, it is right that he should be brought up and get his punishment from a magistrate in ordinary course, rather than that he should be let away?—Yes. For of course a man with money has an advantage over a man who has not.

7333. Saltcoats is a police burgh—how did they deal with them there?—Very much the same as we do in Perth.

7334. In Burnley, what did they do there?—At the time I was there, 1873–74, we did not let anyone out on bail. It was the days when the colliers got big wages, and we had to deal with them sharply.

7335. According to the English law, what powers had the magistrate over a drunk and incapable?—They sent them to prison for 14 days for being drunk and incapable.

7336. I am speaking of drunk and incapables. They are brought up in England for a breach of the Licensing Laws. Police magistrates in England who have given evidence recorded in blue books, to which we have been referred, have stated, for instance, that in London the police have no right to interfere with a drunk and incapable man except for the purpose of protecting him?—That was not the case in Lancashire, I assure you. Burnley, which is a police burgh now, was under the county arrangements at the time I speak of.

7337. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) And what punishment did you say they gave to drunk and incapables?—Ten and fourteen days.

7338. (By the Chairman.) Can you tell us what Act that was under?—I don't know.

7339. You say that habitual criminals when they get sharp sentences often reform for long periods or leave the district altogether?—That is my experience.

7340. What class do you refer to?—Thieves, for example.

7341. You think their sentence should increase according to the number of offences?—That is my opinion.

Mr. James Garraway.

11 Dec. 1894.

7342. There appears to have been in Perth between 1880 and 1893 an unusual increase in the apprehensions for breaches of the peace, drunk and disorderly conduct, petty assault, drunk and incapables, as compared with other counties and burghs in Scotland. In Perth during these 13 years there has been an increase of 86 per cent. Can you explain that?—The only explanation I can give is, that we have dealt more sharply with them than they used to be. You find that, if you look the returns from 1891, there has been a very great difference in the increase of offences and convictions.

7343. When did you come?—In 1881.

7344. At that time I see the total number of apprehensions was 480, while in 1893 it had risen to 943. That gives even a greater percentage of increase, because 1881 was less than 1880. That is nearly 100 per cent. How is that?—They have been dealt more sharply with by the police.

7345. What percentage of convictions do you get out of apprehensions?—Perhaps about 60 or 70 per cent.

7346. How does that compare in your experience with other places in Scotland?—I think the counties are quite up to that.

7347. Does that 60 or 70 per cent. of convictions include pledges forfeited?—No.

7348. So that, in that way, you would make out a great percentage of convictions to apprehensions. What is the percentage of pledges forfeited?—20 or 30 per cent.

7349. That would make everyone forfeit his pledge or be convicted. Surely they let off some in Perth. They are not all found guilty?—They do sometimes.

7350. Now you will be good enough to reconsider your figures so that they may have an air of verisimilitude. You say you have 20 to 30 per cent. of forfeited pledges, and 60 or 70 per cent. of convictions?—I cannot give you exact figures.

7351. Can you give any other reason for the extraordinary increase of apprehensions. The population of Perth is practically stationary, and yet there are now twice as many apprehensions as there were?—Well, the practical reason is this. A few years ago all our policemen were nearly on the night shift, but latterly we have divided them between night and day. Under the old arrangement crime was allowed to run riot: it was taken no notice of, or nothing like what should have been. That is the reason why there has been such an increase since the change in the police arrangements three years ago.

7352. Between 1891 and 1893 I see the numbers have risen from 650 to 943?—That is so.

7353. Was there a change in that time in the distribution of the police?—There was a change in the system of working.

7355. But in Dundee there are only 28 per 1000, while in Perth it is 31: that observation will not hold good as against Dundee?—In connection with apprehensions, I may say that our street offences within the last year or two have increased very much under the new Police Act; we have had shopkeepers, for example, who covered the whole pavement with their goods, and they have been dealt with. That would go to swell the statistics.

7356. But you don't apprehend people of that kind?—No, no.

7357. The statistics I refer to are the number of apprehensions per 1000 of the population for breaches of the peace, petty assaults, drunk and incapable, and disorderly conduct?—Well, the only reason I can give is the change in the management of the police.

7358. You don't think the people are more drunken or more disorderly?—No, but they were allowed to escape before, and they are dealt with now.

Mr. James Garraway.

11 Dec. 1894.

7359. Your men uniformly take all who are drunk and incapable to the police office?—Well, yes, unless the man is at his own door. In that case they do not bring them to the office.

7360. Have you any statistics of vagrancy?—The vagrancy in December last year was 127.

7361. That is the census. But what number of vagrants had you up for begging?—27 last year—16 males and 11 females; fifteen males and 11 females were tried; one was not tried. Of these, 12 males and 11 females were convicted, and 3 males were acquitted.

7362. Now, how many drunk and incapables had you?—In 1893 we had 174 males and 112 females.

7363. I see you have got the drunk and incapables under the Public House Acts. How is that?—They were all tried under the Public House Acts until the new Police Act came into force on the 15th May 1893.

7364. What effect has the change of law had on the subject?—Formerly the punishment was 5s. or 24 hours. Now the magistrate can give 40s. or 30 days, with an additional power of imprisonment under certain circumstances without the option of a fine.

7365. What is your opinion as to the effect of the change?—It has done good.

7366. Can you give us the number of apprehensions for three months before the change of the law and three months after the change, and the results: what I want is to get figures for some place now under the greater powers of the new Act, so as to see what effect it has had, and whether longer sentences have brought about any improvement?—From 16th Feby. 1893 to 15th May 1893; 8 males and 13 females were convicted, 16 males and 4 females forfeited bails. From 16th May 1893 to 15th August 1893; 19 males and 12 females were convicted, 20 males and 5 females forfeited bails. I think the question would have been more satisfactorily answered had the first three months been from May to August 1892. Offenders are more numerous in summer.

7367. The average sentences I suppose have largely increased?—Yes. Very much.

7368. You prosecute now altogether under the Police Act?—Yes.

7370. What was the old Act?—The Lindsay Act, 1862.

7371. Is there any other clause gives you greater power?—There is a clause which is a great advantage to us, that for dealing with drunk people in charge of horses.

7371A. That is a comparatively trifling offence?—It is a very frequent offence with us on Fridays.

7372. Can you let us have that also. It would be very important to see the effect of the greater powers of the new Act in putting down certain offences?—Very well. 2 males convicted from 16th May 1893 to 15th August 1893.

7373. As to prostitution, what do you arrest for here,—loitering and importuning?—Yes, in the case of known prostitutes.

7374. How do the magistrates deal with these cases?—Pretty sharply recently. Some of them have been getting the full penalty of 40s. or a month's imprisonment.

7375. Has the decency and order in your streets improved since?—In my opinion, very much.

7376. Under the old Act the full extent to which the magistrates could go was 14 days?—Yes.

7377. You might give us also a month of the prostitution returns under the old and under the new Acts. Take the same month in one year before the Act of 1893 came into force, and the same month in a year after?—I will do so. The prostitutes convicted of loitering or importuning in September 1892 were 6. There were 5 in September 1893.

7378. (By Col. M'Hardy.) In some towns they

Mr. James Garraway.

11 Dec. 1894.

make raids upon certain classes of offenders at intervals. Will you take care that no exceptional statistics consequent upon such raids get into your return?—We never make raids.

7379. (By Dr. Sutherland.) On shebeens, for example?—Yes, on shebeens.

7380. (By the Chairman.) We want to avoid statistics of any exceptional activity in regard to any one class of offences?—I quite understand what you mean.

7381. Can you make any suggestion regarding vagrancy?—It is a delicate problem here. We have a female refuge here, kept up by the town, which gives them a night's shelter.

7382. Tell us about the female refuge?—It has accommodation for 18 females.

7383. Is it well-filled?—Generally it is.

7384. Is it your opinion that it attracts female tramps to Perth?—That is my opinion.

7385. How are they treated at the shelter?—They get supper and breakfast and a plank bed and cover.

7386. When was it instituted?—About three or four years ago.

7387. Have you any means of learning the number of tramps you had to deal with before that date and after it?—There are no statistics available to show if there is any difference.

7388. Is the shelter kept up out of the common good?—No, by voluntary subscription. Two or three gentlemen pay the whole thing.

7389. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Are you sure you are right in attributing any part of the increase in this statistical table to the making of new offences under the Burghs Police Act?—I am certain of it.

7390. Because, what you are asked for here is a return of five different things, viz., breaches of the peace and petty assaults, drunkenness, drunk and incapable conduct, vagrancy and begging, prostitution and petty thefts with sentences of 14 days and under: which of these are new?—Disorderly conduct is, to a great extent. People who shout and swear on the street are dealt with more sharply now. Another reason is my predecessor in office often turned the prisoner to the door as soon as they were brought in, by administering a scolding to them. This was general in breach of peace, begging, loitering, etc. They never appeared in any return as having been apprehended at all.

7391. What was the cause of the increased sharpness?—Well, my opinion is, that they should be dealt with.

7392. That is the reason?—Yes.

7393. Is it since you came into office that the increase has taken place?—It was going on slightly before I came into office.

7394. Who began it?—I did, when I was inspector.

7395. Is it entirely owing to you then that there are double the number of apprehensions in Perth?—I am afraid it is, to a great extent.

7396. Were there any public complaints of the state of the streets of Perth before that?—Yes, continually.

7397. Can you tell us who complained?—The newspapers generally did.

7398. Were there any orders issued by the magistrates that there should be increased strictness?—Yes, sometimes there were.

7399. I don't quite understand how the change in your police arrangements affected the matter?—Until our boundaries were extended, we used to have 34 policemen. Of these 24 were on night duty, and the remainder had to cover the other 14 hours of day duty. Perhaps only three or four men would be on duty at a time, and for that reason it was impossible to deal with the class of offenders I have referred to during the day.

7400. What class of offences escaped in these days?—Disorderly conduct for instance, very much.

7401. Do you really mean to say that half of the offences committed in Perth a few years ago escaped punishment?—Yes, I do.

7402. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Is it your experience that many come back into your hands who have been in the police cells and have left pledges?—Yes.

7403. Do the great bulk of them come back?—Well, I could not say that.

7404. Do you think that the bulk of the people who leave pledges once are deterred from coming into your hands again?—A good many do. I believe the majority do.

7405. If the police cell for a few hours and a pledge is sufficient to terrify a fairly respectable man from getting into your hands again, why should you bring him up before a magistrate and expose him?—I don't know about that.

7406. Suppose he came back a second time, would that be a justification for bringing him up?—Surely.

7407. You would not be inclined to bring him before the magistrates and expose him for a first offence?—I do not know.

7408. But you admit that the vast majority is sufficiently terrified by being for a few hours in the cell and having to leave a pledge?—The majority of them are not habitual drunkards.

7409. How many habituals have you got in Perth—men and women who are constantly passing through your hands?—We have a list of 47 who have been more than twice convicted since 1st January last.

7410. How many have been convicted above five times in that period?—Eight.

7411. You have only eight people who have been five times convicted this year for the specific offences with which we are concerned?—Yes.

7412. So that the law as it stands, and as it is carried into effect, is a sufficient deterrent?—I do not know that.

7413. They don't come into your hands a second time during the year, and is not that the best evidence that the law has a salutary effect: how many came back twice?—Forty-seven came back twice.

7414. Only 47 out of a population of 30,000 have been twice convicted since the 1st January. Is not that a proof that 95 per cent. of the occasional or casual offenders are sufficiently deterred by the punishment that is meted out to them?—That is so.

7415. And they don't come back?—That is so.

7416. What do you consider should be the punishment for being drunk and incapable?—I quite accept as satisfactory the present Act.

7417. Do you give effect to the provisions of the First Offenders' Act?—We have never done it in the Police Act unless with boys.

7418. Why don't you give effect to a valuable piece of legislation like that?—I don't know.

7419. Do you think that severity is at all necessary when you can effect your purpose of keeping these people from coming into your hands by one brief sentence or one night in the police cells?—That is what I have never seen.

7420. But don't your statistics fully bear that out. Do they not show that 95 per cent. of the offenders are only once in your hands?—I believe that is about the percentage.

7421. (By Col. McHardy.) The 127 tramps you mentioned were the number in the town at a particular date?—Yes.

7422. Are these residential and local tramps?—They drift about from town to town.

7423. How many of them do you know personally?—That is a difficult question to answer.

7424. What makes it difficult?—Some of them of course we do know who come into our hands.

7425. Have you any large proportion of them that are local people or are they vagrants?—They are vagrants, so far as we are concerned. They are not local people.

7426. Do they appear some of them again and again?—Yes.

7427. Do your men challenge them?—No, not in the burgh.

7428. Do you ascertain anything about them?—No.

7429. Or take any notice of them?—No.

7430. Do you see that they do not beg?—We do.

7431. Do you apprehend many of them for that?—We had 27 last year. But that does not cover the

Mr. James Garraway.

11 Dec. 1894.

Mr. James
Garroo.

11 Dec. 1894.

number of offences by tramps by any means. We often drive them out of the town if we can manage it: we get them out of the town in that way, if we cannot get people to go against them in the Police Court; we have great difficulty in getting evidence against them for begging.

7432. Why won't people give evidence in such cases?—They seem to have a delicacy in coming to the Police Court.

7433. But the people in the town should not be afraid to give evidence against them?—It is not a case of fear at all. It is because it would annoy them to come to the Police Court.

7434. You think the great majority of these 127 men and women in your census for one day are constantly moving about, and that the great bulk of them are strangers to Perth?—Yes.

7435. You have never taken any particular notice whether they were going north or south?—No.

7436. (By the Chairman.) We have been looking at the criminal statistics, and we find that last year 1349 were apprehended. Of these there were for drunken breaches of the peace, disorderly conduct, petty assaults, and drunk and incapable, 943. Of that number 484 were not brought before the Police or Sheriff Court. 401 bail bonds or pledges were forfeited. That is an enormous percentage surely of forfeitures, being nearly one-third. 848 were brought before the Police Court and 16 were tried in the Sheriff Court. There were 42 acquittals and 822 convictions. That is a very large percentage of convictions and a very small percentage of acquittals?—Yes.

7437. There must have been a lot of the 401 people who forfeited their pledges equally guilty; you cannot say why this exceptional state of things exists?—I cannot.

7438. (By Sheriff Dove Wilson.) Is this right: 1349 apprehensions in Perth. Of these 848 were convicted in the Police Court, 16 in the Sheriff Court; 401 pledges were forfeited; there were 42 acquittals, and the rest were otherwise disposed of?—Yes, I think these are the figures.

Garroo.

[ADJOURNED.]

SIXTEENTH DAY.

Aberdeen, Wednesday, 12th December 1894.

PRESENT :—

SIR CHARLES CAMERON, Bart. M.P. (Chairman.)
Col. A. B. M'HARDY, R.E.
Dr. FARQUHARSON, M.P.

PROFESSOR DOVE WILSON.
Dr. J. F. SUTHERLAND.
Miss FLORA C. STEVENSON.

MR. THOMAS WYNESS, Chief Constable of the City of Aberdeen, called in and examined.

Mr. Thomas
Wyness.

12 Dec. 1894.

7439. (By the Chairman.) You are the Chief Constable of Aberdeen?—I am.

7440. How long have you held that office?—For nearly 15 years.

7441. You had experience previously?—I have been a Chief of Police since 1865; first in Elgin and then in Inverness.

7442. When did you come here?—In 1880. I want till March of 15 years.

7443. One thing has struck me, Mr. Wyness, in connection with the police statistics of Aberdeen—that you are very low in your ratio of apprehensions. I find you have 19 per cent. of the population apprehended for petty offences, including drunk and disorderly, while in Dundee the percentage is 28; in Perth 31; in Greenock 33; in Ayr 44; and in Glasgow 60. That looks well on the face of it; but can you explain the reason?—The reason probably is that we have a smaller proportion of criminal population.

7444. Are the Aberdonians a particularly sober people, or are they less given than others to breach of the peace, and other petty offences?—Were you to remove 100 to 150 habitual offenders, we would have very few apprehensions for that kind of offences in Aberdeen.

7445. Under what Act of Parliament are you?—It is a private Act. There are three different local Acts—the Aberdeen Police and Waterworks Act of 1862, the Amendment of that Act in 1867, and an Extension Act in 1871.

7446. What are the provisions for the cases of persons found drunk and incapable?—There is no provision for such cases in the local Acts. They are dealt with under the 23rd clause of the Public-Houses Amendment Act of 1892, the penalty provided by which is a fine of 5s. or imprisonment for a period not exceeding 24 hours.

7447. When do you consider a person drunk and incapable?—We never interfere so long as they can make their way. If they fall, or become dangerous to themselves or others, we take them in charge. If the man's home is near where he is found he is taken there, and the case reported.

7448. If he is taken to the police office, what do you do with him?—He is released on a pledge of 5s., the highest amount of fine.

7449. Supposing a man lodges this pledge, is it held to purge his offence, or, in case of his non-appearance, do you cite him?—It does not purge the offence; but, as a rule, unless there be aggravations in the case, no more is done in the matter. If the magistrate think forfeiture of the pledge not a sufficient punishment, he can grant a warrant for apprehension.

7450. What was your total number of arrests in 1893?—The total number of arrests and citations in 1893 was 4444.

7451. Of these can you give the number of breaches of the peace and petty assaults?—For drunkenness and disorderly conduct, 557 men and 270 women; total 827. Of drunk and incapable there were 195 men and 94 women; total 289. For breaches of the peace and petty assault, 913 men and 425 women; total 1338. For begging and vagrancy, 11 men and 2 women; total 13.

7452. I observe that in your analysis of the figures you deal with only 289 cases of drunk and incapable, and you have a disproportionately large number of drunk and disorderly, breach of the peace, and petty assault. I suppose a small amount of resistance would convert the case into one of assault?—If a man is able

Wyness.

Mr. Thomas
Wyness.

to resist and make a disturbance, we do not consider him 'incapable.' If a drunk man has a friend with him we do not interfere.

7453. If the friend is drunk too?—Then we do not regard him as a friend.

7454. What is your penalty for being drunk and disorderly?—It is dealt with under the Police and Waterworks Act of 1862, and the maximum punishment is a fine of 40s. or 7 days' imprisonment.

7455. How are breaches of the peace and petty assaults dealt with?—They are dealt with under common law.

7456. I see you have more breaches of the peace and petty assaults than drunk and disorderly?—That is so.

7457. You are aware that the Burghs Police Act gives greater power over drunk and incapable persons. Do you desire greater powers?—It might be advisable, though I do not know that it would do much good.

7458. Have you any record of the repeated conviction of the drunk and incapable, and drunk and disorderly?—Yes. Seven males and five females have been committed five times, six males have been committed six times, seven females eight times, three females twelve times, one female eighteen and another nineteen times, and one twenty-six times.

7459. She must have had very short sentences?—I have three females who of themselves account for a large number. Margaret Lawrence, 32 years of age, made her first appearance on 3rd January 1882, and since that time has been forty-three times drunk and disorderly. She has also been twenty-three times apprehended for using obscene language, fifty-eight times for breach of the peace, and sixteen times for assault with breach of the peace. She has been 149 times convicted, has been sent to prison 115 times, and has been in prison 5 years and 145 days.

7460. When let out where does she go?—Generally to public houses and back to prison in a few days, frequently on the following day.

7461. She does not trouble the Parochial Authorities?—No; when sober she is an active and tidy servant.

7462. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Do you know her history—where and how was she brought up?—She is a native of Peterhead but brought up in Aberdeen. Her father was a respectable man: her mother died at an early age. I do not think she was brought up to any occupation.

7463. (By the Chairman.) Who is your next best customer?—Elizabeth Valentine or Davidson, who made her first appearance on 12th May 1892, and has since then been found 71 times drunk and disorderly. She has also been 20 times apprehended for 'loitering,' and 13 times for breach of the peace. The imprisonment she has undergone amounts to one year and 293 days. While her husband lived she was an exemplary woman: after he died she went wrong.

7464. Has she been to the Poorhouse?—I don't think she has been there. I have made several efforts to get her rescued, but she is rather far advanced in years for an institution. Another case is that of Ann Gray, who came to Aberdeen as a domestic servant three or four years ago. She was led astray by a sister who had previously been living a dissolute life. She made her first appearance in the Police Court on 1st April 1891, and has since then been 22 times in charge for being drunk and disorderly, 35 times for being drunk and incapable, and 18 times for 'loitering.' She has been 343 days in prison on 80 convictions, under 75 of which she was sent to prison.

7465. I see that in a great number of cases she has been found 'drunk and incapable'?—Yes, she is of a quieter disposition than the others, and not so noisy when drunk.

7466. I think you said that removal of 150 habituals would make a great difference?—Yes, but I don't think anything like that number would fall to be dealt with under the scope of this enquiry.

7467. Do you think four times too many to wait for before regarding an offender as habitual?—I think four times too much to wait for.

7467A. Suppose you had people continually coming before the Police Court as drunk and incapable, or drunk and disorderly, might not the police be allowed an opportunity of asking that the case be remitted to the Sheriff as that of a habitual offender, and that the Sheriff should have power to put the prisoner under control, in accordance with proposed legislation?—I think that would work sufficiently well.

7468. That is rather a modified approval. I would like your own idea on the subject?—My impression is, that after three offences of this kind in one year, the magistrate should be empowered to send the prisoner to some place in which he could be made to maintain himself.

7469. Do you think it is easy to make an offender of this kind maintain himself?—I think so: there is nothing like hard work for taking this trouble out of them.

7470. Take the case of a place like Glasgow, where six in every hundred are every year arrested for this offence. Would there not be too many to be dealt with?—I think they should not be dealt with locally, but wherever the Department finds that they can be employed to the best advantage.

7471. I take it that the fact of your being so very much lower—less than 2 per cent. as against 6 per cent. in Glasgow—may be taken to indicate that the Chief Constables to some extent run on different lines?—The Department is quite capable of judging.

7472. I mean that the number under the mild régime in Aberdeen might become increased were harder measures meted out?—That is so.

7473. Under what Act did they deal with these crimes in Elgin and Inverness?—In Elgin drunk and incapable were dealt with under the 23rd section of the Public-Houses (Scotland) Acts Amendment Act, 1862, and in Inverness under an Act giving more power.

7474. What power?—40s. or fourteen days.

7475. You have also had experience of the 5s. or twenty-four hours; which do you think best?—Certainly the 40s. or fourteen days.

7476. Do you think imprisonment has a wholesome deterrent effect?—I don't think it is very deterrent; they are too good to them.

7477. When they get out do they, as a rule, remain sober longer after a severe imprisonment?—I do not think they do.

7478. I notice that you mention one of the offences of the three women as 'loitering'?—'Loitering' or importuning, the penalty for which is 40s. or fourteen days.

7479. Is that the general sentence?—The magistrates have done their utmost to stop that offence, and they frequently give fourteen days without option.

7480. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Is that competent under the Aberdeen Act?—It gives power to omit the fine.

7481. Is there any common understanding among the magistrates as to their severity in dealing with prostitution?—I do not think there is.

7482. You will have one magistrate who is very hard, and another who is very lenient in his sentences?—There is a good deal of that. It is known that when certain magistrates are on the bench there are fewer cases—they keep more off the streets.

7483. When an easy magistrate is on the bench they come out more?—They do.

7484. What may an easy magistrate's sentence be?—Say, 7s. 6d. or three days.

7485. Are you much troubled with vagrants?—Not a great deal; we keep them down as much as possible.

7486. With reference to prostitution charges, what evidence is required?—We never bring up a case without two witnesses.

7487. Are these witnesses usually policemen?—It is difficult to get other than police witnesses.

7488. Do you get other witnesses on charges of importuning?—If it is a case of importuning, policemen are not so good witnesses unless they hear what is said. In many cases the policemen do hear what is said.

7489. In Edinburgh we were told that the constables

Mr. Thomas
Wyness.

12 Dec. 1894.

Mr. Thomas Wyness.
13 Dec. 1894. had orders not to arrest for importuning except in the case of women who had been previously warned the same night?—I would think that absurd.

7490. Have you any system of entering a charge against a woman who is brought up without having been previously warned?—No woman is ever brought in on that charge without having previously been warned although perhaps not that night.

7491. Is any distinction made in a first case?—The magistrates in a first offence give the option, and every endeavour is made to get them to go to a home.

7493. Under what Act do you deal with vagrancy?—Under the Local Extension Act of 1871.

7494. Have you nothing that gives you greater power?—The Aberdeen Police and Waterworks Act, 1862, authorises the apprehension of all persons found begging, and all persons conducting themselves as vagrants, having no fixed place of residence, and no lawful means of gaining their livelihood, within the limits of the Act.

7495. That is precisely the wording of the Barches Police Act. We can with these powers prevent vagrancy from becoming offensive.

7496. The magistrates have no difficulty in dealing with it?—There is just this in it, that they do often get away. They show great penitence when brought before the Court, and, with tears, promise if let off never to come back. On being let off they go, say, to Kincardineshire, and when caught say the same thing, and so they can go from Land's End to John o' Groat's with impunity.

7497. That is the fault of the magistrates?—I think there should be some limit to their indulgence.

7498. You would not make it penal for a magistrate to exercise his discretion?—We take a census of vagrants twice a year, and find that, under the present provisions, we can prevent them from becoming more offensive.

7499. Have you many men on tramp?—A good many.

7500. What provision is there for their accommodation?—Our lodging-house accommodation is not good, and there is not enough of it.

7501. If working men on tramp have no money, where do they find shelter?—We have a House of Refuge here, but it is not up to the mark in my estimation.

7502. Is it a private institution?—It is a private institution. Inmates work in the morning, perhaps a couple of hours, before they go away.

7503. If a tramp comes to one of your men and says, 'I am dead broke and have no money,' what do you do with him?—Send him to the House of Refuge, probably, but they are not admitted there after ten. Our accommodation is neither sufficiently large nor sufficiently good.

7504. In Glasgow we were told that some 5000 per annum sought refuge in the Police Office, and got it?—We do not encourage that; but, in the interest of the community, as well as that of humanity, we will take them into the Police Office rather than have them wandering on the streets or lying on a stair.

7506. Have you district offices?—We have six sub-stations, but they are not of a kind in which people could be lodged. Each consists of a box, with two small cells, in which a man or woman can be kept till brought to the central office. The man in charge of the box has a short beat around it, and is there every fifteen minutes. If called, his telephone bell rings till he stops it, and he can communicate if he wants assistance.

7507. Are prisoners kept at these sub-stations?—Very few. They are cleared out forthwith. The stations are more useful for mustering and dispersing the men.

7508. How many tramps may you shelter in the course of a week?—Not more than half-a-dozen; but I think there should be more provision of shelter—a model lodging-house or two. Mr. Thomas Wyness.
12 Dec. 1894.

7509. Does not a model lodging-house tend to become a permanent residence?—There may be something in that.

7510. Do you think the House of Refuge encourages tramps?—I have known them remain there too long.

7511. Men may take their bed and their breakfast and walk off?—They may make them do something for their breakfast.

7512. What sort of homes have you for women on the streets?—We have a local home, and I am in communication with homes in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and elsewhere.

7513. Have these not inmates enough of their own?—I think it is better to exchange.

7514. How do your homes employ them?—Chiefly at sewing and laundry work.

7515. Can you suggest any other kind of work?—I know several women taken off the street now in good positions as domestic servants, and doing well.

7516. Do your magistrates ever give them the option of going into one of these institutions or going to prison?—No; but I sometimes give them the option of going into one of these institutions or going before the magistrate.

7517. Do you act as fiscal?—No; he is a solicitor or advocate. Edinburgh and Glasgow have the same arrangement. In the other towns the Chief Constable is fiscal.

7518. About public-houses—I am told you have a strict care of them. Do you deal with publicans who supply liquor to drunk men?—Yes, but it is at times difficult to get evidence. We have, however, obtained convictions for supplying drunk men.

7519. Do you employ men in plain clothes?—No; if a constable sees a man staggering into a public-house he follows, and, if he finds the man being supplied with liquor, the publican is brought up on the charge.

7520. Do you find it dangerous to have men engaged to do much about the public-houses—does it put them in the way of being bribed by the publicans?—Not at all; there is no more danger in that duty than in any other.

7521. Can you tell us how many cases you have of that kind?—We have one or two every year. There were thirteen cases in 1893.

7522. Are the convictions endorsed on the publicans' certificates?—No; but I bring before the magistrates at the Licensing Court the fact that they have been convicted, and in my opinion this has a salutary effect.

7523. Have you recently adopted this course?—No, ever since I came to Aberdeen, and before.

7524. Have you more citations than convictions?—We have.

7525. So that the number of convictions does not show the number of attempts?—No; and I believe that is the experience all over the country.

7526. Do the constables of any other town attempt to deal with this class of offences in the same way?—I don't know, but hardly think so.

7527. (By Col. M'Hardy.) I observe that the number of apprehensions has increased largely and almost steadily in Aberdeen for the last thirty years—I think more rapidly than the population. In 1865 the apprehensions for drunkenness and disorderly conduct were 2041, and in 1893, eight years later, they numbered 2950, an increase of about 50 per cent. The population has not increased in this ratio. Then has the population become 50 per cent. more turbulent, or what is the explanation?—It is very difficult to explain. It might have various causes. Prosperity might cause it for one thing. When there are more wages there will be more drinking.

7528. Has the prosperity of the city, then, increased proportionally?—Perhaps some years it has been the other way.

7529. Has the Police Force been extended?—It has; and the area of the burgh has been more than doubled.

Mr. Thomas
Wyness.

12 Dec. 1894.

7530. What increase has been made in the Police Force since 1885?—From 126 to 140.

7531. Do you find that the more constables there are the more apprehensions there will be?—I do not think so.

7533. Do you find the additional fishermen disorderly?—There is a good deal of disorder among them.

7535. In regard to those sent to prison under alternative sentences, is there always sufficient time allowed to the convicted person to pay the fine?—As a rule those sent to prison cannot pay the fine. We cannot keep them for hours in the Police Office; and the only disadvantage from sending them away at once is that their friends must walk over to Craiginchies.

7536. Is there not a disadvantage to the prisoner himself in being put inside a prison?—It is very rarely that a person is sent to prison for a first offence.

7537. Is it not the case that the fine is sometimes paid shortly after they have been lodged in prison?—Yes; nothing brings out the fine more promptly than a sight of the prison gate.

7538. You don't think, then, it would be desirable to allow them a little more time?—That would involve serious expense, keeping the local officers standing about waiting for payment of the fine. It would detain two or three men, and involve the cost of sending the van an extra journey to the prison.

7539. That is without regard to the feelings of the party who has been sent to prison?—Most of those who go there have no feeling about it.

7540. I see you have got 138 vagrants in town; can you classify them in any way?—No, they are continually shifting. We take a census of them on the Sunday after the shortest day of the year, and on the Sunday after the longest; and the number may be taken as an average of the whole year. There are slightly fewer on the longest day.

7541. But you don't know who they are, where they come from, or whither they are going. Are they professional vagrants?—None of them will take with that; they all profess to be something, and the majority of them profess to be in search of work. Others profess to be pedlars and unemployed tradesmen.

7542. You had 25 apprehensions for begging and vagrancy during 1893; I suppose these would be from among the 138?—I think so, but they may have come under another denomination. It is difficult sometimes to determine whether a man should be classed as a vagrant.

7543. The great majority of these people are strangers?—That is so.

7544. Of the 4400 persons apprehended during the year, what is the proportion who were under the influence of drink at the time of their apprehension?—2833 were more or less under the influence of drink when apprehended—about 60 per cent.

7545. In addition to those taken up for drunkenness itself, are there not a considerable number apprehended for petty thefts and other offences which are practically cases of drunkenness?—There are a considerable number of such cases.

7546. Of the 353 petty thefts during the year, what proportion may be regarded as a development of drunkenness?—Perhaps one-fourth.

7547. Not more than that?—I think not.

7548. What induces, in the case of women, thefts of articles that can be of little practical value to those by whom they are stolen?—I don't know that they are more guilty of that offence than the other sex, but there are a considerable number of such cases.

7549. In these three cases that you gave us of extremely frequent re-convictions, the causes appeared to rise in domestic circumstances—in one case the husband had died, in another there was association with a sister who had fallen, and in the third there was the death of a mother. Do you find that in almost all these cases of frequent re-conviction there has been some sort of domestic incident which has induced the beginning of the career of disorder?—That happens frequently, though not always.

7550. In respect of the cost of transferring prisoners from the police cells to the prison, you have remuneration from the Imperial funds through the Prison Commissioners—how much is it?—For city prisoners £75; for Sheriff Court and county prisoners £35.

7551. That includes all charges for escort?—Yes.

7552. You said that a certain number of prisoners arrested for drunkenness or breach of the peace are allowed to get off on their leaving a pledge?—That is so.

7553. You also said that a certain number of convictions should be held to constitute a habitual offender. But, in the case of a pledge, there is no record of a conviction. How would you deal with a person from whom three pledges had already been taken?—It is very likely that fewer pledges would be taken; the police would take care to have convictions recorded.

7554. Does not a system which allows one man to get off on paying a pledge, which another man is unable to pay, produce inequality of justice?—It is the same thing where fines are imposed.

7555. Is there any advantage in allowing a penalty to be received, except the saving of trouble?—It may be an advantage to the offender, inasmuch as it enables him to get to his work. In some cases it is a great advantage to an offender not to have to appear before the magistrate.

7556. You would try, if you consistently could, to prevent a young man from having his character more or less degraded by having to appear at the bar of the Police Court?—Certainly.

7557. Would you take a pledge in every case?—No, I am not anxious about pledges; but I would take one even from a stranger, according to circumstances.

7558. There are very great differences over the towns of Scotland as to the percentage of the inhabitants apprehended. Is not that governed by the mind of the Chief Constable?—I do not think so.

7559. In what way then do you account for the variations?—The community may have a smaller proportion of criminal population in some towns than in others. If it were dependent on the mind of the Chief Constables, some of them must be seriously neglecting, and others perhaps as seriously overstepping, their duty.

7560. From your acquaintance with police matters do you not think that there are duties which are regarded differently by different Chief Constables?—I do not think so, not to any great extent.

7562. You said you would like a house for the reception of tramps; would you give them that accommodation free of charge?—Certainly not.

7563. Are not most of them penniless?—No, not most of them, though a good many are. I have often found men begging with money in their pockets.

7564. Supposing a vagrant is without money, how would you treat him?—It is not likely that any Local Authority would provide a house free of charge. If that were done, none of them would be found to have money.

7565. Are you aware that such a house has been

Mr. Thomas
Wyness.

12 Dec. 1894.

Mr. Thomas
Wyness.

12 Dec. 1894.

provided free of charge?—I am not aware; but, if so, they should be required to do some work.

7566. You don't think such a house would induce tramps to come to Aberdeen?—I don't think so—not more than the present lodging-house. I think the house could be better regulated by the local Authority.

7567. How would you deal with the actually penniless man? Would you apply a labour test to a man honestly in search of work?—You would be supplying him with work, and that is what he professes to be in search of.

7568. You have taken a certain amount of trouble with getting girls into homes; what steps have you taken to watch over the future career of these girls?—I have a list of a few who are doing well.

7569. Does your attention follow them so far as to inquire after them?—I generally inquire through the matron of the home; a half, at least, have done well.

7570. You have a local home?—We have a local home in King Street Road. I have also sent to the Grove Laundry in Edinburgh, to a place in Portobello, and elsewhere.

7571. (By Miss Stevenson.) You stated that about 60 per cent. of the persons who come under the notice of the police are drunk when apprehended—is that the percentage in regard to men?—That includes both men and women.

7572. Can you tell us whether there is as large a proportion of women?—There is fully a larger proportion of women.

7573. In the case of women brought in on a charge of solicitation, are they often found under the influence of drink?—Frequently, but not always.

7574. Are these women ever in the first instance taken to the sub-stations you mention?—No, they are brought directly to the head-office.

7575. Have you, in connection with the police station, any women turnkeys or police matron?—We have a matron who is on duty when required.

7576. Is it not the case that these women are frequently incapable, violent, and so on; would it not be desirable that the matron should always be there—you have not always a police matron on duty?—Not always, but if there is any illness or other necessity she is always at call.

7577. These women prisoners are left in charge of the lieutenant on duty and the men under him without any women officials being in attendance?—I have never seen a necessity for having a matron in constant attendance. In many cases the accommodation would not admit of it.

7578. Does not the law require that in prison women prisoners shall be solely under women?—Temporary detention is a different thing from confinement for days, weeks, and months. They are never in the police station for more than 24 hours.

7579. From a woman's point of view, do you not think there is a necessity for the constant attendance of a female?—If they express any desire for a female attendant there is one got forthwith.

7580. Does the Prisoners' Aid Society take any interest in summary trial prisoners?—Their interest is chiefly confined to women liberated after long sentences.

7581. Do they come to the Police Court to get hold of these women?—I send them word, and take the women myself to the home.

7582. Have you found them coming back after having been sent to the home?—I have.

7583. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Of the 150 habitual offenders you have mentioned, what proportion would be females?—I daresay fully more than half.

7584. There would be some of them, both males and females, not able-bodied?—A good number.

7585. Could you give the proportion?—Perhaps a fourth of them. But the cause is generally the treatment to which they subject themselves.

7586. Suppose you got a reformatory for grown-up people, would you prefer to have it in the country?—In the country, as far as possible from public-houses. They should be established about the Highlands of Scotland where there is plenty of land to reclaim.

Wool-mills might be erected to manufacture the wool where it grows, and keep the workers as far as possible from temptation.

7587. (By the Chairman.) Do you mean to provide for the employment of the men or of the women?—The women inside, and the men outside, chiefly.

7588. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) You mentioned that there is, under the Act of 1862, power to give imprisonment without the option of a fine for loitering or importuning; does not the section of the Act authorise the same punishment for washing a tub, for flying a kite, or for playing football on the streets? Can you give any reason why there should be so severe a power in Aberdeen? Is the power put in force?—Yes; as regards loitering or importuning.

7589. Has there been of late years an increase in severity with which such cases are treated?—I daresay these has been, during the past seven or six years.

7590. Has that increased severity led to any diminution in the offence?—I cannot say that; but it has had a salutary effect in this way—that when the women know the presiding magistrate is likely to exercise that power, they are not seen so much on the streets. I don't know that there is much diminution of the evil as a whole.

7591. Is time allowed for payment of a fine?—Not except in contravention of public-house licenses, or cases of that kind, in which the law gives time.

7592. Have you never respectable and generally law-abiding men who would pay their fine if allowed time?—It would be a serious matter to let off such people on a mere promise.

7593. Would it involve anything more serious than re-apprehending the prisoner?—I daresay not.

7594. Is there power to take payment by instalments?—No.

7594A. Can you give me the number of women who have done well after having been sent to a home?—I have a list of twelve who have done well since 1886; I have the names of 13 who, so far as I know, are still doing well.

7595. How many women may have been sent to the homes since that time?—I think about a third more than that.

7596. So that there would be two-thirds reformed?—I think so.

7597. What is your objection to the House of Refuge?—They will not admit after ten o'clock at night.

7598. Is there anything objectionable in the work test?—No; I think that is right.

7599. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You ascribed the increase of apprehensions largely to the prosperity of the city and an increase of the population; but, while the increment of population is only 53 per cent., that of apprehensions is 141 per cent. What effect has the increase of apprehensions had on these petty offences?—I don't think it has had much. I don't think it has made fewer criminals.

7600. You distinguish between criminals and petty offenders?—Yes.

7601. How many were at the police bar in 1893 for the first time?—3156 appeared for the first time out of a total apprehended, for all offences, of 4444.

7602. Do you give effect to the probation of First Offenders' Act?—None get the benefit of that Act except those charged with serious offences, such as dishonesty.

7603. If it is a first offence for drunkenness?—It is disposed of by an admonition or a small fine.

7604. Do you find that these people come back often?—A good many of them do.

7605. And a good many—the vast majority—do not come back?—Certainly.

7606. What do you infer from that?—It is an indication that they have taken warning.

7606A. Then severe punishment of several days in a police or prison cell is not a necessity in the case of a first offence?—No.

7607. What is the usual penalty for being drunk and incapable?—The maximum fine is 5s. and the maximum imprisonment 24 hours. If it is a Saturday the prisoner gets away in the afternoon.

Wyness.

7608. Do you find this mild treatment beneficial in its results?—No, but it is quite adequate for a first offence.

7609. In your return you state that, during 1893, 50 habitual offenders for the five petty specified offences were apprehended 420 times. That is to say, out of 2950 apprehensions for these petty offences, 15 per cent. are accounted for by these 50 people?—What would you propose to do with these repeaters to rid the streets of them?—I am strongly in favour of sending them to a suitable reformatory.

7610. Do these fifty people differ in their dispositions and temperaments?—Yes, very much.

7611. Would this make it difficult to treat them in confinement?—Not many of them would be refractory, if kept sober and under proper discipline. But I think there should be power in a reformatory to deal with a refractory person, and knowledge that there was such power would be wholesome.

7612. Supposing a man or woman is certified to be an habitual drunkard, would you put a restriction on the pawnbroker?—I have had occasion to warn the pawnbrokers, and have always found them willing to do what is right.

7613. It must be in your knowledge that these parties do sell their bedding and clothing for drink?—Yes, but it is often difficult for the pawnbroker to know with whom he is dealing. They send others to do business for them.

7614. Cannot the pawnbroker insist upon the name?—That has not been much enforced here.

7615. Have not pawnbrokers been useful in cases of felony?—They have.

7616. Then why not in cases of habitual drunkenness?—I know the pawnbrokers are willing, but it is often difficult to reach the facts.

7617. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Is it according to your experience that increased prosperity leads to increase of drinking?—That is my experience.

7618. May it not be the other way—that people drink to drown their cares and troubles?—They must be able to get something to drink before drowning their troubles.

7619. Do you think the large increase in these offences is real or only apparent?—I don't think our drunkenness is greater. It is more brought to the surface.

7620. Is it partly due to increased vigilance on the part of police and magistrates?—That may be so.

7621. I understand that you are in favour of taking pledges?—I don't like them, but we take them as a kind of necessity. It may be an advantage to the offender.

7622. Have you a free discretion as to the parties from whom you accept pledges?—Quite.

7623. The offender cannot claim right to leave a pledge?—No.

7624. Do you let him go home on his promising to pay the pledge?—No, it must be ready money. I would send notice to his friends.

7625. Is a prostitute female offender allowed to leave a pledge?—Sometimes, but rarely.

7626. Is 'loitering' a purely female offence?—We apply it to males as 'obstructing,' and we are zealous in dealing with men who molest females on the street.

7627. Do you run in women on this charge without previous warning?—I do not run in a woman unless she has been warned, but she may be run in without having been previously warned on that occasion.

7628. How do you know what has been said in a case of 'importuning'?—If we see a woman of that class addressing a man it is part of the evidence of 'loitering.' As a rule we have three or four or more cases in which she accosts men on the street before arrested.

7629. They might be missionaries?—Her character is against her.

7630. How do you prove a first offence?—By direct evidence—say, of the person who has been importuned.

7631. Do you find him willing to give evidence?—As a rule he is very unwilling. Mr. Thomas Wyness.

7632. Would you regard confinement in such an institution as you propose as a deterrent or reformatory agent, or both?—I would have it both. If they knew that such treatment had been provided for, over a period of two or three years, or more, it would have a salutary deterrent effect.

7633. You think that three convictions in a year should be sufficient to warrant a magistrate in sending an offender to such an institution?—I would leave that to the discretion of the magistrate, having regard to the previous record of the offender.

7634. A proper subject for that kind of treatment may be a person who remains at home?—I would deal in a different manner with the person who can afford to drink at home. I would empower his friends to make a representation to the magistrates, and to lead evidence proving that he is a habitual drunkard, liable to be dealt with under the provisions of the Act.

7635. Have you had evidence of working men drinking at home?—We have, but it is not within my knowledge that working men with 20s. a week drink at home.

7636. (By the Chairman.) Would you take a wife's evidence in such a case?—I think a wife's evidence should be available in such a case, and I would have the inebriate subjected to medical evidence in the same way as a man of unsound mind.

7637. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Who would pronounce final sentence?—Two magistrates or the Sheriff.

7638. Would you have any expectation that your reformatory farms would be self-supporting?—They might have to be subsidised, but as well spend money on that as on keeping them in prison.

7639. Would you lay the charge on local or on Imperial taxation?—I think it should be Imperial. Drunkenness of this kind is an imperial calamity.

7640. Do you think many of the tramps in Aberdeenshire spend the winter in Aberdeen?—Some of them go to the poorhouse.

7641. (By the Chairman.) Can you give us any idea of the cost of taking up habitual offenders and bringing them to trial?—I cannot give that.

7642. You cannot give the cost of that woman Lawrence, for instance?—No; it is included in the cost of the police machinery.

7643. You mentioned that you had dealt with males on the charge of obstruction; how many cases of that kind had you last year?—I should say we had four or five cases of that kind.

7644. What penalties were imposed?—I generally imposed the penalty myself—£10, as a rule. A good proportion of them paid the £10. It is not the lower order who do that sort of thing here.

7645. It seems a large amount of money to be carried in the pocket?—They paid it or got it paid for them before being long in custody.

7646. What is the penalty for the offence?—The penalty is only 40s. or fourteen days. We have had some brought up and so sentenced.

7647. Can you tell me the amount of money received by you in pledges last year?—The whole sum of fines and pledges for last year was £1968, 1s. 6d., of which was recovered £1381, 3s.

7648. What is the authority under which this pledging system is carried on?—There is statutory provision for myself or the officer in charge accepting a pledge under the local Act, 1862.

7650. We have evidence that, in Glasgow, a man gives the name of, say John Smith, and walks off. We have been told that a man is supposed to leave his true name, and that if he leaves a wrong name his pledge is forfeited and he is prosecuted?—I don't care what name I get. I bring them up for trial under that name. But we generally know with whom we have to deal.

7651. Assuming that we were to recommend some uniform system, would you favour taking the pledge and letting the prisoner go about his business, or not accepting it as an expiation?—We do bring them up when it is thought necessary. I would leave it, as at present, to the discretion of the magistrate.

Major D. F. Gordon.

MAJOR D. F. GORDON, Chief Constable

7654. (By the Chairman.) How long have you been Chief Constable of Aberdeenshire?—For two years.

7655. Is there much vagrancy in the county?—There is a considerable amount, but not more than in other counties.

7656. Of what character is your vagrancy?—It is mostly of the ordinary character. There is a class of tinkers wandering through the country; they are as a rule an inoffensive lot; but they occasionally get run in for quarrels among themselves.

7657. Are they poachers?—They do not come under my notice as habitual poachers; I would not say positively that they do not poach, but they are certainly not habitual poachers.

7658. Do they drink a good deal?—Yes; and fight among themselves.

7659. They do not use the knife, or anything of that kind?—We have had a case of assault by a vagrant; but such assaults are as rare among them as among other classes of the population.

7660. Do they neglect the education of their children?—They do.

7661. Could the police assist in enforcing that duty upon them?—I think they are too migratory for that to be possible. The great object of the parish authorities is to get them to move on.

7662. Do the School Boards look after them?—I do not think the School Board authorities take much trouble with them.

7663. You will also have the ordinary tramp and workman in search of employment?—With that class we are not much troubled here. We are so far north that comparatively few men come here seeking work.

7664. How many vagrants have you in all, over the county?—In June 1893 there were 652, and in September 382.

7665. You have a great decrease in winter. I suppose that number is all of the casual stamp?—It is. We have a great many tramps who come across the hills from Perthshire in summer, and disappear in winter.

7666. Have you many complaints about these people from farmers?—We have very few complaints about them from farmers. They occasionally set the turf on fire. We have more complaints about them from proprietors than from farmers.

7667. Have you any complaints about masterful beggars?—Very few. The licensed pedlars are a greater nuisance than any other vagrants. The license is at times simply an excuse for begging, the stock in trade consisting, perhaps, of a few boot-laces or a few sheets of paper.

7668. What is the cost of a pedlar's license?—Five shillings.

7669. That gives them an extensible but not a real occupation?—That is so. We have complaints of thieving on the part of pedlars; they are also had up as drunks, and for assault. They give much more trouble than the tinkers.

7670. Then there is the ordinary vagrant, ostensibly in search of work?—Some of them are dishonest men; but we would be better if fewer pedlars' licenses were granted. I may refuse a license, but the applicant goes into a neighbouring county and gets a license which is current all over the kingdom.

7671. How many pedlars' licenses have you granted?—Fifteen last month. There are 240 licenses in force 7652. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do many well-dressed prostitutes come before the police court in Aberdeen?—Not many; we have no great number of them.

7653. Take it that from pledges and fines 5s. per apprehension is added to the police exchequer in Glasgow, and 9s. per apprehension in Aberdeen; can you explain the difference?—No farther than that perhaps our fines and pledges are a little stiffer. [Witness then withdrew.]

Mr. Thomas Wynnes.

of Aberdeenshire, called in and examined.

Major D. F. Gordon.

in Aberdeenshire; besides which we had 11 convictions for peddling without a license.

7672. You have half as many pedlars as vagrants. Can you tell us anything about the gipsies; they are said to marry according to some rite of their own?—I don't think there is much rite about it; but they keep to each other.

7673. Well, according to Scotch law, contract makes matrimony. Do you know whether their children are registered as legitimate?—I am not aware.

7674. It has been suggested to us by the Chief Constable of one county that there is great need for extension of the powers of the county police in connection with such offences as drunkenness and vagrancy; and he proposed to extend to the counties the provisions of the Burghs Police Act?—I think the Burgh provisions should be extended to the counties.

7675. You are aware that you have power to pass bye-laws regarding vagrancy—has that matter been before the County Council?—It has, but the bye-laws somehow broke down in consequence of a magisterial decision.

7676. Is there any other kind of petty crime in the county?—No, except drinking. In burghs there are always some habitual drunkards; in the county there are very few.

7677. Does your authority extend over the burghs in the county?—Over all the burghs except Aberdeen.

7678. Have the powers of the Burgh Act been taken advantage of as regards drunkenness?—I think not, as regards more drunkenness.

7679. Has any higher penalty been given than 5s. or 24 hours?—Not so far as I am aware.

7680. Do you know whether there are complaints in the other counties regarding these pedlars; this is the first complaint we have heard against them?—I am not aware.

7681. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Your evidence goes to show that the tinkers are a comparatively respectable class of people—they do not drink much? I cannot say that, as regards drink. The country people are seldom given to drink except when they go to a feeing market.

7682. Do the tinkers' children go to swell the criminal population?—No; they stick to the same line of business, and become tinkers. I have known one or two enlist in the militia, passing from that into the army, and so on.

7683. Are the tramps increasing or diminishing on the whole?—They are slightly more, but it is not a large increase. In 1889 there were 914, and the census of last year 1084, but I am not having more complaints than formerly.

7684. About the pedlars—are they any grievance to the small shopkeeper?—I have no complaint in that way; but it is found a convenient cover for begging.

7685. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Have you found that those who go into the army remain there—or do they come back?—I am not aware.

7686. Have any boys been sent to the Mass Training Ship?—None from the county.

7687. Are these vagrant children so filthy in their habits that respectable people would not allow their children to sit beside them in a public school?—I do not think they would like it. I think they should be taken at five or six years of age and sent to an industrial school.

7688. (By Miss Stevenson.) You say that a pedlar's licence given anywhere is available all over the country. Would it not be possible to make an arrangement by which a licence would have to be checked on entering a new county?—I believe that was done formerly, but it was given up for some reason, I don't know why.

7689. In regard to tinkers' children, I understand you to say that the School Board has made no efforts whatever to have their education enforced?—The inspectors all report to me that no effort has been made to enforce the attendance of tinkers' children at school.

7690. And I suppose that is because they do not remain long enough in one district. Has anything ever been done to deal with these children under the Industrial Schools' Act?—I think not. As long as they have parents the sheriffs are unwilling to relieve their natural guardians from the duty of looking after them.

7693. There seems to be an average of 517 migratory poor; I gather from what you have said that these individuals exist practically by begging—that they use their trades for a blind?—That is rather sweeping; there are some respectable people among them.

7694. What proportion of them do you suppose to exist by real labour?—Well, none by real labour.

7695. Therefore they are almost entirely supported by the population?—They are, certainly, in a way, but it is very inappreciable.

7696. I suppose the allowance for the sustenance of each of these individuals could not be less than 1s. or 8d. per day, including housing?—A great many of them are well known; they get a piece here and a cup of tea there.

7697. Yes, but their keep could not be put down at less than 8d. per day?—I am not prepared to say what their keep would cost per day.

7698. You would readily believe that, if it were only 8d. per day, it would come to £6000 per annum?—If you have worked it out, I have no doubt you are right.

7699. Is not that a considerable indirect taxation on the county? Why should there be few complaints while the county is supporting half of a whole regiment in this way?—People have got accustomed to it.

7700. Do you suppose that the population are in any way frightened by these vagrants?—There may be an occasional case, but it is very exceptional. There is little masterful begging.

7701. Do you know whether these 500 migratory persons are looked upon by the farmers as in any way of assistance to them in the reaping of their crops?—No; they are as a rule not manual labourers. A number of them go to Fraserburgh and Peterhead in the herring season. A lot of tramps come into the county on their way to these places in the herring season.

7702. Have you ever analysed these people, to discover whence they come and whither they are going?—I began to try it, but found it impracticable.

7703. Can you distinguish between those who are regularly in the county and those who come into it from other counties? There is in summer an increase of 270, of whom there are 50 found in common lodging-houses, so that there would appear to be 200 extra vagrants in summer?—That is so.

7705. How do you deal with a man found drunk and incapable?—The man is locked up in the police station, and next morning he is liberated on a Justice of the Peace order, without pledge or anything else, unless there has been something more than drunkenness against him. Therefore, drunkenness pure and simple figures little in the return.

7706. (By the Chairman.) Generally up to this time we have found that the man is brought before a magistrate?—We do not think that necessary if he has been locked up for his own safe keeping more than anything else—merely to protect him and the community.

7707. I see you apprehend one woman for every three men?—The women don't drink as the men do.

7708. Have you anything of the nature of the pledges that obtain in the city of Aberdeen?—We take bail for certain offences. We do not take pledges in drinking cases.

7709. If you cannot get a Justice of the Peace order on which to liberate the man in the morning?—Then we just let him go.

7710. (By Dr Sutherland.) How many have you liberated without an order in the course of a year?—I cannot say. If a man has any one to take care of him we let him go. [Witness then withdrew.]

Major D. F.
Gordon.

12 Dec. 1894.

Mr. Archibald
M'Kenzie.

Mr. ARCHIBALD M'KENZIE, Aberdeen, called in and examined.

Mr. Archibald
M'Kenzie.

7711. (By the Chairman.) You are an ex-Bailie of Aberdeen?—I am.

7712. How long were you a magistrate?—For four years, till about three weeks ago.

7713. I think you have heard what the Chief Constable of Aberdeen told us to-day: is there any point on which you dissent from what he said, or is there anything in his evidence that seems to you to require comment?—Nothing, except that I am surprised to learn that prisoners are sent to prison without being allowed opportunity to pay their fines.

7714. But you have no doubt that he is correct on that point?—I have no doubt he is correct.

7715. It is your opinion also that short sentences are of no use as a deterrent?—That is my opinion.

7716. You think there should be some agency seeking to reclaim criminals on their being released, and endeavouring to save them from the influence of former associates?—I do.

7717. You are aware that Government gives grants to Prisoners' Aid Societies?—Yes, but I think they are more dead than alive. With reference to drunkenness, breach of the peace, prostitution, vagrancy, and begging, I am of opinion that, in the great majority of cases, and certainly in the case of those who are frequently before the Court, the present powers of the magistrates are insufficient to cope with the evil. Imprisonment has little or no terror for them, and certainly it has the opposite of a reclaiming effect. Each time they are sent to prison seems to decrease their self-respect, harden them in sin, and make them troublesome and dangerous to the public. My experience is that the interval between the periods of imprisonment gradually grows less, till, on being released from prison in the morning, they, in many instances, find their way to the Police cells at night, and are sent back to prison next morning. If imprisonment is to continue to be the only mode of dealing with habitual offenders, there should be some agency under the auspices, if not the control, of the Government, for seeking to reclaim the prisoners on being released, and to save them from the pernicious influence of their former associates. It is not an uncommon thing to find those associates waiting the dismissal of the prisoners at the prison gate, armed with the strongest temptations to lead them astray. I am of opinion that a large establishment, such as the present prison at Perth, or three or four smaller ones throughout Scotland, should be set apart as retreats, under the direct superintendence of Government, and conducted much in the same way as the reformatories for boys and girls are at present; and that, after, say three or four convictions in any one year, any two magistrates in burghs, or Justices of the Peace in counties, should have power to send such offenders to the retreat for a period not exceeding three years. The retreat should be made self-supporting, so far as possible, by the work of the inmates, and those willing at the expiry of their term to emigrate should be allowed to do so out of Government funds. The same liability of relatives, as in the case of paupers, should be enacted, and contributions from friends should be encouraged, but, where neither is available, the cost of maintenance should fall on the state.

Mr. Archibald M'Kenzie.

7718. You speak of the whole prison of Perth being used for the purpose; don't you think it would be better to start on a more modest scale to see how it would succeed?—In all the large towns of Scotland there are many habitual drunkards, and, unless they are all dealt with, I do not think much good can be done.

7719. What sort of work would you suggest for their employment?—A great many of the men have occupations, and for the women there is laundry work or sewing.

7720. As to the men, would you not be open to expostulation on the part of the Trades Unions as to unfair competition, if you propose to employ these men, subsidised by the state, to enter into competition with tradesmen?—At present the prisons and reformatories are doing the same thing.

7721. But the prisons have been compelled to resort to unremunerative work, such as picking hemp?—It would be better even for the Trades Unions than having to support these people in the poorhouse.

7722. Take the case of the women you talk of washing and sewing; don't you think that could be overdone?—Other things could be started.

7723. For instance?—Cooking. A large proportion of the female inmates could be employed cooking and cleaning for the other inmates. In the poorhouse of Old Machar the female inmates are required to work in that way.

7724. But you have got sick people and others who are not able-bodied, and you can employ the able-bodied in attending to them?—On the female side.

7725. You would have a population to deal with not much more promising than you have to deal with in the poorhouse, and you cannot make the poorhouse of Old Machar self-sustaining?—On the contrary, I think the people are more promising in every way as to work, &c.

7726. Can you tell what it costs per head to keep the inmates?—Three shillings without deducting earnings. A large number of them are old and in the hospital: and there are children. But I believe that, for such an institution as that proposed, employment would be found.

7727. I don't like trusting to Providence in the matter. We want to have some distinct views, and I should like if you could give us something more definite?—I have studied the subject, and have no doubt that occupation would be found for the women. There is sewing.

7728. We know that, and laundry work, but a fair objection to both of these is that they are overstocked. Cooking might employ some; but you are not to give three course dinners?—No, but you would require a few cooks, and the place must be kept clean.

7729. Have you got any remunerative work in the poorhouse?—There is no productive work for the women.

7730. Would you have a man sent by Her Majesty to a reformatory, and compel his son or his wife to maintain him there?—I would compel his son or his father, and I think they should be required to do what they can.

7731. They would try to defeat you, would they not?—I have no doubt they would.

7732. And this would make it their interest rather to shelter the accused?—They do so in any case.

7733. As to habitual drunkards of the better class, what do you propose?—In the case of habitual drunkards of the better class, who have not been convicted before the Court, and where friends are willing to contribute towards their maintenance, powers should be given to magistrates or Justices of the Peace on application by the person himself or two respectable householders—if two medical practitioners certify that he is a habitual drunkard and a fit person to be so treated—to send the person to a retreat of a better order, where he or she should be required to perform only such work as they had been accustomed to.

7734. These are private retreats that you now speak of?—Yes, but to which the magistrate should have power to send.

7735. Would you have them erected by public or private funds?—It would be better to have them controlled by Government.

7736. If power were given to local Authorities to contribute towards erecting such retreats, would Aberdeen contribute?—I have no doubt that Aberdeen would contribute largely. If it had power, I have no doubt that the Town Council would contribute.

7737. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Is there a general feeling that something should be done in the way of dealing with habitual offenders and inebriates?—A very strong feeling.

7738. Is it thought a proper matter for restriction of the liberty of the subject?—Yes, in suitable cases.

7739. Your view is that the offender should be kept in a reformatory and treated in a scientific way? Should the institution be under local or Imperial management?—Imperial.

7740. Do you think there is a great necessity for individual contact between the person to be reformed and those in charge of him and his relatives or friends?—I find a good many do not get a fair chance, because their relatives drag them back into their evil way.

7741. What I wanted to imply is, that it is desirable to have a sort of individual treatment. Are you of opinion that a Government Department would be better for that purpose than any merely local municipal body?—A large proportion of the municipal constituency is in the east end, and it is found that they try to put in men who will, as magistrates, look on offences of this kind in a light way.

7742. Therefore you would like to have such an institution entirely in the hands of the Imperial Government?—At least under control of Government, as the reformatories are at present.

7743. What number do you think there should be in each of these establishments?—As many as might be sent by the magistrates.

7744. Would you prefer a gigantic establishment or a number of smaller ones?—I would prefer a larger number of smaller reformatories, but there is less chance of making them self-supporting if they are very small.

7745. Because, in the larger, you could have organised labour with machinery?—Quite so, instead of having all done by the hand.

7746. Do you think that some textile work could be introduced in these institutions?—It could not be wholly textile, though a number of these fallen women have been factory workers.

7747. You were speaking of institutions for inebriates who do not come under the notice of the police. Would you consider that labour should be enforced in connection with these institutions?—Yes, providing that allowance be made for incapacity for work.

7748. Where inmates pay, they consider themselves exempted from work. Would you provide that they should be compelled to work?—I would.

7749. (By Miss Stevenson.) When you speak of such institutions being under Government control, do you mean that they should be public institutions, or private institutions carried on for the benefit of the person who conducts it, but, at the same time, under

Mr. J. J. Bald public inspection?—I would prefer to have them put on the same footing as the reformatory.

Mr. J. J. Bald 12 Dec. 1894. 7750. I am not referring to pecuniary assistance but to management? I suppose it is your opinion that the institution should not be carried on in the interest of a single person?—Yes.

7751. In regard to the difficulty of finding employment for women, I suppose that arises from the fact that there are very few employments in which women alone are engaged?—That is so: there is no exclusive employment for women, but there are occupations, such as type-writing, which is in demand.

7752. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you know whether the Probation of First Offenders' Act is given effect to in this city?—I have given effect to it very largely.

7753. Why do you prefer Government control for the proposed institutions?—I mean Government supervision.

7754. You think that in the case of habitual drinkers of the better class it is a bad thing for their friends to have access to them?—If the friends are well disposed, I would think it an advantage that they should have access to them. A discretion should be given to the governor of the place.

MR. JOHN RUTLEDGE, Governor of Aberdeen Prison, called in and examined.

Mr. John Rutledge.

7762. (By the Chairman.) How long have you been in the prison service?—For about 43 years; in Aberdeen about 33 years.

7763. How many prisoners have you?—Our daily average last year was 67.

7764. Have you any convicts?—We have, but they are removed eight or ten days after conviction.

7765. Have you all the police prisoners from Aberdeen, city and county?—We have.

7766. Are there many of them on short sentences?—A good many. We have them for 24, for 6, and for 4 hours; for breaches of the Aberdeen Police Act, and drunk and incapable cases.

7767. On Saturdays, I am told, those sent in for 24 hours get out at 5 o'clock?—At 6 or 7 o'clock.

7768. Do you find them take advantage of the short day?—I don't think the idea ever comes into their heads.

7769. Have you many juvenile offenders?—Very few. We have more facilities for getting them away promptly than formerly.

7769A. Have you any boys and girls just 16 or over?—We have a few; fewer than in most places.

7770. Are these often children who have been in reformatories?—I think I have six old reformatory boys in the prison just now.

7771. Do you judge that the reformatory system is not so perfect as you would like?—It is impossible to make any system perfect.

7772. I understand that, your prison being a small one, you have better opportunity of knowing the views of the prisoners. Do they appear to like it?—I don't think that either short or long sentences make much difference in the case of old offenders. The subject has been repeatedly before the old Prison Board. It was complained that it would be awful to give long sentences for petty offences, but the difficulty was, What was to be done for the protection of the public?

7773. Do you think whipping could be extended?—I think it would be better if their friends were to do it. The other boys know about their whipping in prison, and it sticks to them.

7774. Have you many young girls in prison?—Very few.

7775. What are their offences?—Petty thefts; but the Act of 1862 gets them so readily into prison for frivolous offences that it loses its deterrent effect.

7776. Does that mean that they find themselves better in prison than at home?—They think the prison not so bad a place after all.

7777. Do you ever find comparisons drawn between yours and other institutions?—Girls say they would rather be in prison than in institutions such as that of the Salvation Army or the Discharged Prisoners'

7755. (By Dr. Farquharson.) You say that you do not think short sentences are deterrent?—My opinion is that imprisonment is not deterrent at all.

7756. In the earlier stages of crime, might not the prospect of being shut up in prison scare a person from the edge of the precipice?—In first cases I have sent them off for a few months' probation, and in only two or three cases at most did they come back.

7757. Then it is the idea of punishment that is the deterrent?—That is so. When they have been sent two or three times to prison it loses its effect.

7758. Is it not the case that many of these criminals regard the prison as a home?—They lose their liberty, but they come out much improved in health.

7759. Do they prefer the prison to the workhouse?—They prefer the prison: they know their term there.

7760. Are they better fed in prison?—Much about the same.

7761. As regards these proposed institutions, would you utilise existing buildings or erect new ones?—Where existing buildings are sufficient I would use them. A good many of the prisons would be set free for the purpose. [Witness then withdrew.]

Society. They come back and tell us that they prefer the prison.

7778. Are they treated too generously—would you suggest that they should be treated more severely?—By no means; that would be retrogression.

7779. Do you think the habitués of the prison prefer it to the poorhouse or the reformatory?—Some do; it makes a great difference to them to get clean lodging and clothing and food.

7780. Do you ever have people sent to you for kite-flying? Professor Wilson read to us a list of offences including that, in the Act of 1862, under which the number of commitments appears to have nearly doubled in 1863, the numbers being, in 1862, 781, and 1149 in 1863?—No; that was largely for petty offences, but there was also an increase of other offences. There were 31 more breaches of the peace, and an increase of 19 in breaches of the Public-Houses Act.

7781. Do the women complain that, under the charge of importuning, they are taken up for no offence?—They do, and respectable people have been taken up in that way by mistake.

7782. We have heard that after they have been once convicted they have no chance, and are run in when they have not been importuning at all?—That is too true. Any of these unfortunate girls, if they have been in prison on a few occasions, are not allowed to be seen on the street. If one of them is seen speaking to a man on the street the man is allowed to pass and the woman is run in.

7783. What is the penalty for that offence?—It runs up to fourteen days.

7785. A sheriff may take a particular view? We found a sheriff in Edinburgh who took a view of his own?—One magistrate will give 14 days for 'loitering' or importuning, while another will give 2 or 3 days.

7786. You have a society for the aid of discharged prisoners?—Yes, an excellent society.

7787. Does their officer work well with you?—He does. He is allowed to see prisoners about to be discharged, and, along with the lady visitors, looks out for the reclamation of prisoners.

7788. You have some inveterate cases. What about that woman Margaret Lawrence?—Margaret Lawrence is one of the quietest prisoners we have in the jail.

Mr. J. J. Bald

12 Dec. 1894.

Mr. John Rutledge.

Mr. John Rutledge.

12 Dec. 1894.

The worst of them behave there. They know that they will be punished if they do not.

7789. Have you many punishments in the prison?—Very few.

7790. What have you done for this woman Lawrence?—She has been two or three times sent to institutions, but left saying that she would rather be in prison than in such places.

7791. You are not a member of the Prisoners' Aid Society?—No.

7792. Do you pay the gratuities earned by the prisoners?—I pay the gratuities, and the Prisoners' Aid Committee is empowered to apply them to the best advantage.

7793. Do you know people who have got good work from your prison?—Seldom direct from the prison. I have all the sack repairing of the whole trade in Aberdeen—all done in prison.

7794. What sort of work do you get for your discharged prisoners?—We seldom get anything except a few days at breaking sticks until better employment is got. It is one of the greatest difficulties to get men into work out of jail.

7795. How much do you earn in a year?—We perhaps clear about £100 or £120 a year.

7796. If you had to deal with an institution for habitual criminals, could you get work out of them appreciably to reduce the cost of their keep?—Not to any appreciable extent.

7797. Suppose you had them in hand for a couple of years, could you make them self-supporting?—Not self-supporting, or anything like it.

7798. What occupations have you for your prisoners?—Sack-making, repairing sacks, tailoring, picking or dressing hemp hair-sewing, and a good deal of stocking-knitting for the convict prison at Peterhead and others.

7799. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Is not the payment of fines in the prison somewhat frequent?—We have sometimes fifteen and twenty in a month.

7800. How does this come about?—These are fines paid by prisoners who have been hurried over before they had time to pay.

7801. Are there thus about 150 cases recorded against the town which are only nominal imprisonment?—That is so.

7802. You said it is an advantage to have boys and girls sent to the reformatory direct. Does it not take some little time to arrange matters before they are sent?—I understand they are sent direct from the bar to the reformatory. In Aberdeen there is no difficulty in sending them straight to the reformatory.

7803. I would like to know your estimate of the effect of short sentences on prisoners?—They are of no effect. I speak of "Recidivistes." Prisoners think nothing of short sentences, and soon come back. I am familiar with their faces.

7804. When you find residents in Aberdeen coming into prison every month, do they not show dislike of the restraint?—They express no dislike. So far as their sentences are concerned, there is no salutary effect.

7805. On what line of policy do you think the treatment of such prisoners should proceed?—I think the only line of policy along which prospect of success would lie is that of long sentences for adult offenders, to keep them off the streets, and for young persons treatment in reformatories.

7806. (By Miss Stevenson.) Would the shutting up of these old offenders remove an evil influence from the younger generation?—It would.

7807. To shut up the old offenders would be to remove a power for evil from the young people?—It would do that and save the community from annoyance.

7808. In respect of these charges in connection with which women are brought in, I suppose it is the only case in which mere suspicion is allowed to suggest a charge?—It is evidently so.

7809. If a woman is found loitering on the street she is run in, though there is no evidence of the offence with which she is charged?—That is so. She may be loitering although not importuning. They are taken in at times for really little or nothing at all.

7810. And there is no other offence dealt with in the same way?—There is not.

7811. (By Dr Sutherland.) Why do you object to whipping? For children is it not preferable to imprisonment?—Because the stigma of having been whipped sticks to them.

7812. Does not the stigma of the prison stick closer and longer to them? Do you see any objection to their being whipped in the police cells?—I do not like it.

7813. I presume you are aware that Solomon recommended it?—I do not object to the whipping in itself, but merely to public whipping. I would like to have it done by parents or guardians.

7814. Can you give us the proportion of persons who were imprisoned during the year for first offences?—The total commitments for the year were 1850, and the number who had been previously imprisoned was 461, so that about 1400 went to prison for the first time.

7815. Do you find, then, that a slight imprisonment is sufficient to deter most of these people from coming back?—Yes; it is when they have been committed two or three times that they get hardened.

7816. You express an opinion unfavourable to the police method of dealing with prostitutes. But is it not the case that this is the occupation of the woman—that she is making her livelihood by it?—If they have been run in once or twice, they are run in as a matter of course when found on the street at night. If I speak to a woman, she is taken up and I pass on without challenge.

7817. Do the 'showy' class of prostitutes ever get run in in Aberdeen?—They are visited in their houses I presume.

7818. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Is the morality of the town improved as compared with thirty years ago?—I cannot say that it is. The evil is driven into houses instead of being left on the street.

7819. (By Dr. Farquharson.) I suppose the reason why the swell women are not run in is that they do nothing to bring themselves under the notice of the law?—That is so.

7820. You think the common prostitute is unduly harassed? What is meant by 'loitering'?—'Loitering' is understood to be for purposes of prostitution. That is assumed to be their purpose if they are seen speaking to a man.

7821. You say that the success of the reformatories has not been so great as you would like?—They cannot be expected to succeed in every case.

7822. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Is it not the case that a bad reformatory boy is always particularly bad?—That is so.

7823. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Why should that be?—It seems somehow to be ingrained into them. I regard about three-fourths of our prisoners as more or less insane, especially when they get drink—often new run adulterated stuff that drives them mad. Methylated spirits was consumed largely till within a year or two ago.

7824. Have you ever had a boy sent in for kite-flying?—No; a judicious magistrate would dispose of such a charge by a reprimand.

7825. Do you think whipping spoils a boy's character?—It sticks to him as much as imprisonment.

7826. What is the difference between whipping at a police court and whipping by the head-master at Eton or Harrow?—It is more like putting a person through a form of execution. [Witness then withdrew.]

SEVENTEENTH DAY.

Aberdeen, Friday, 14th December 1894.

PRESENT :—

Sir CHARLES CAMERON, Bart. M.P. (Chairman).
 Lieut.-Col. A. B. M'HARDY, R.E.
 Dr. FARQUHARSON, M.P.

Professor J. DOVE WILSON.
 Dr. J. F. SUTHERLAND.
 Miss FLORA C. STEVENSON.

MR. DANIEL MEARNs, Merchant in Aberdeen, called in and examined.

Mr. Daniel
 Mearns.

14 Dec. 1894.

7827. (By the Chairman.) You have been for a long time a member of the Town Council of Aberdeen?—For 18 years continuously.

7828. You have also been for sometime a magistrate of the city?—For eight years.

7829. You know the range of this inquiry, and I understand you have prepared some information regarding habitual offenders?—Last year we had 39 females and 16 males almost continuously before the Court. The 16 males were convicted 85 times, and the 39 females 345 times.

7830. Then, if you could be relieved of these habitual offenders, you would be greatly relieved?—Very greatly.

7831. Would you give the Committee one or two specimens, and then the detailed list can be handed in?—I put in a detailed list of 54 cases.

7832. I see you frequently have parties dealt with for abusive language—what is the penalty for that?—We can fine them or send them to prison. I don't think there has been any sentence of imprisonment without a fine, but such offenders generally go to prison because unable to pay the fine.

7833. The first man on your list has been 75 times in prison—13 times during 1893—you have no details of the total amount of imprisonment?—I will fill that into the return.

7834. You have got other habitual offenders who run this one pretty close?—We have.

7835. If you could deal with this lot it would be a great relief?—It would. You see the same face come up at the police bar week after week and month after month.

7836. What is the practice in connection with the trial of these repeated offences? In trying the case, is evidence submitted as to the repeated convictions?—We are not told about that till the charge before the Court has been proved. Then the previous convictions are stated. But, being familiar with the face, we cannot help recognising an habitual offender.

7837. Do new bailies give more lenient sentences?—There is very little difference.

7838. You have no consultation among yourselves as to how you shall deal with any particular class of cases?—No; each magistrate is left to his discretion.

7839. Will you please state your method of treating drunkenness?—Drunkenness accompanied by incapacity is dealt with under the 23rd clause of the Public-Houses Act Amendment Act, 1862, by which a fine of 5s. may be imposed, or 24 hours' imprisonment; but in cases of a first offence, or where the offenders have been in the police cells from Saturday night to Monday morning, they are generally admonished and dismissed.

7841. You are aware that the Burghs Police Act gives more stringent powers—up to 40s. of a fine, and, in the case of aggravation, 14 days extra without the option of a fine. Do you think such power would be an improvement?—In some cases it would be an improvement as putting the offender away for a longer period where he would not be able to get drink, instead of being out soon and at it again.

7842. Are you aware that, under the Burghs Police Act, you have power to adopt any section of it?—The matter has never been before the magistrates, and we have never felt want of power on that point.

7844. So that, even with the aggravation of disorderly conduct, you cannot give so much as is allowed under the Burghs Police Act for being drunk and incapable? How do you deal with breach of the peace?—Breach of the peace is dealt with under the Common Law, which limits the fine to £5, and the imprisonment to 60 days; but, by the Aberdeen Police and Waterworks Act, 1862, in addition to the 60 days' imprisonment, the offender can be ordained to find caution for a sum not exceeding £20 for his good behaviour for a period not exceeding 12 months, or suffer 30 days' imprisonment.

7845. The most of these cases are associated with drink?—All of them, practically, are the result of drink.

7846. Do you remember any case that has been dealt with on the principle of caution?—We have had two cases: in filling up the returns I will give the particulars of these cases.

7847-48. Has it ever been suggested that it would be desirable to apply this principle of caution to habitual drunkards?—It has never been before the magistrates. Offenders of this class would seldom be able to find caution.

7849. How do you deal with prostitution?—Prostitution is dealt with under the 134th clause of the Aberdeen Police and Waterworks Act of 1862, in which the fine is limited to 40s. and the imprisonment to 14 days.

7850. Do any magistrates go the whole length of the sentence?—Very seldom; it is generally 15s. or seven days in prison. Where there is recurrence of the offence I have known the full penalty given, but only in extreme cases.

7851. Are you able to cope with the evil?—We are not able to cope with it in the lower districts.

7852. The crime here, I understand, is principally 'loitering,' and the parties are of the lower class?—Yes; I don't think any of them are able to pay a fine.

7853. We have heard that it is the lower class of prostitutes chiefly who come before the magistrates; have you any explanation of that?—The others, who would be able to pay, seldom bring themselves under the notice of the police.

7854. The drunken and reckless prostitute soon drifts to the lowest grade?—They come down steadily. As they return they give evidence of falling lower and lower.

Mr. Daniel
McAra.
14 Dec. 1894.

7855. How do you deal with vagrancy and begging?—Vagrancy and begging are dealt with under the Municipal Extension Act of 1871, which gives the magistrate power to send the person to prison 30 days for the first offence and 60 days for subsequent offences.

7856. Have you many vagrants?—A considerable number.

7857. What is your experience as to the result of dealing with vagrant offenders?—We find that little good comes of sending them to prison, and very often, if they do not belong to the town, get a promise from them to take themselves off, and let them go. That is just getting rid of them ourselves, and we think if they could be sent to a reformatory it would be a benefit.

7858. Would you deal in that way with a beggar who had been only once or twice up?—That would depend on his appearance, and on the question whether it was only an incidental case of begging or going about making an occupation of it.

7859. Do you ever come on a tramp who only begs as a last resort while seeking work?—I have not seen such a case, and would dismiss it.

7860. What means have you of relieving necessitous and deserving cases?—We had at one time a magistrates' box, supplied by money received for the stances of shows in Castle Street, and we now replenish it from the common good of the city. But we have few cases in which help can be given.

7861. We are told that there is want of accommodation for men on tramp who come to the city?—It has become necessary for the city itself to deal with that question, and I understand it is to be done in connection with the clearing away of the slums over there, by providing creditable lodging-houses.

7862. We find that lodging-house keepers rather prefer the regular customer?—We generally find that from the lowest class of lodging-houses we get most of our Police Court work.

7863. Have you considered the possible encouragement of vagrancy by the erection of shelters?—We have not had that question before us.

7864. Are you inclined for the stronger powers of the Burghs Act?—We think our law sufficient for breaches of the peace caused by drunkenness.

7865. With regard to prostitution cases, what is your opinion?—When the offender is old in sin, I find the punishment has little or no effect, but the younger ones sometimes seem to feel their position, and many of them take advantage of going to a Rescue House. Some of them, when got in time, have been rescued, and are now leading better lives. The class of offenders, however, who come before the Police Court are not the sort of persons that there is much chance of good being done with. They are generally the lowest of the low, and I know of only two cases in which good has been done among them at the shelters.

7866. What is your experience with vagrants and beggars?—They are a source of great annoyance to the community, but I think imprisonment does them little good. If they were confined in a reformatory, and made to work for their living, it might be a means of curing them from their wandering and idle habits.

7867. How would you solve the problem of the education of these vagrants' children?—That question involves a serious responsibility, but at present I can make no suggestion. It is an important question in connection with the proposed reformatory institutions.

7868. Have you any difficulty in getting children into the existing reformatories?—We have no difficulty, and they are always ready to admit. When the reformatory was found unable to pay its way, the city gave £600 and the county £600 out of the rates.

7869. Do you contribute to one reformatory only?—We give the Roman Catholic Institution and several others smaller sums which help them along.

7870. Are there many delinquent Roman Catholic children?—Very few.

7871. Do you give to the Rescue Home?—I don't think we do. Mr. Daniel McAra.

7872. Have you any suggestions as to the treatment of habitual drunkards?—I am of opinion that compulsory retreats or reformatories should be provided where these habitual offenders could, on the third or fourth conviction within twelve months, be placed for a period of not more than two to three years, so that their desire, which is a physical disease, may receive such curative treatment as may be found most suitable to each particular case. In these reformatories work of all kinds could be carried on, so as to make them partly self-supporting, if possible. Good conduct should be recognised either by giving a pecuniary recompense on liberation or by procuring work of some suitable kind for the party. There could also be in the reformatories better rooms for those inebriates whose social position would enable them to pay for their maintenance, and who, on that account, would only occupy themselves in such pursuits as they had been accustomed to, thus taking away any feeling that might be in the minds of the better classes in applying to get friends placed under charge.

7873. You would have the whole lot, quasi-criminal and non-criminal, dealt with in the same way. On whom would you throw the expense?—I think the state should meet it. So far as Aberdeen is concerned, to provide for the 55 habitual offenders who are continually appearing before the Court, at, say £30 each yearly, would cost £1,650 for keep. Then to provide a house of 55 beds, at £200 a bed, would cost £11,000, which, at 3 per cent., would cost £330, and, adding the same sum for sinking fund, would make £660, in all £2,310, equal to a penny in the pound on the taxation of the city, which would provide for the whole of these individuals.

7875. What would you do with habitual drunkards of the poorer class who do not come under cognisance of the police?—I would, on application of their friends or the Poor's Inspector, and on hearing evidence, give the magistrates power to deal with the case as already stated. Voluntary detention is of no use for these classes.

7876. It has been found that female habitual offenders submit themselves voluntarily to detention, either under dread of long periods of imprisonment or under the compulsion of starvation facing them?—I don't think many such cases would be found in Aberdeen.

7877. Would you send prostitutes to these homes?—It is a difficult question. You could not get the better class of prostitutes unless they were kept separate.

7878. Have you many weak-minded criminals in Aberdeen—'softish'?—I have not seen many of that kind.

7879. I suppose soft-headedness is not a common thing in Aberdeen?—When they take too much drink it is soft enough sometimes.

7880. I mean the class of silly, hardly responsible persons, on the border line between imbecility and insanity?—The habitual drunkard, as he gets older, becomes 'soft,' but few come before the Court that could be called 'silly.'

7881. (By Col. M'Hardy.) There has been a considerable increase in the number of apprehensions in Aberdeen. Is that due to the instructions of the magistrates to the Chief Constable?—No; there are a great many more petty cases brought up now than formerly, especially as breaches of the peace. If two women make a disturbance at their stair-head, it is a breach of the peace. A higher standard of order seems to have been set up.

7882. With reference to the question of caution, might it not often be found by a poor man among his friends, who would thus become his guardians?—They often pay his fine for him, but the caution system is

Mr. Daniel
McAra.
14 Dec. 1894.

Mr. Daniel Mearns. seldom applied, and only when we find a party lapsing. It tends to make him take care of himself.

14 Dec. 1894. 7883. Suppose a lad finds caution for 12 months, if he lapse after three months I suppose the money of his friends is forfeited?—If they have it.

7884. Suppose your sentence is to find caution or go for 30 days to prison, and that he lapses after a month, does the 30 days' sentence revive?—I don't think we have ever had a case in which the party was brought back within the period of caution. Probably more could be done in that direction.

7885. As to the retreats or reformatories, what would be your idea of the lines on which they should be managed—would you have them under local control with Government inspection?—Yes.

7886. Then you would probably secure best reformatory results?—No doubt.

7887. If the management were in the hands of local authority the expenditure might come from local sources?—A portion of it might.

7888. I suppose you have occasionally stayed in the county on holiday; have you had much experience in meeting tramps?—No, there are not many in our county, and there is no difficulty in dealing with them.

7889. What is the restriction on boys and girls selling things on the street?—Just the Education Act. We have no powers as magistrates.

7890. Then a little child of 10 or 11, who has passed the 5th standard, may sell without restriction. Do you find bad results from children so young selling things on the street?—We have never had a case brought up. Keeping children out at night can do them no good, but there are few on the streets of Aberdeen.

7891. Oldmill is subsidised to the extent of £600. Is the female reformatory subsidised?—The grant of £600 covers both the reformatories and two industrial schools, under a local Act of Parliament.

7892. You would think it necessary, in the proposed new institutions, to keep the numbers as low as possible to secure individual attention: have you thought how high the numbers might be allowed to rise consistently with effective treatment?—I have not thought out that question.

7893. Do you think a person sent to such an institution might, after a time, be boarded out, to begin him with ordinary life without the routine of the institution?—I think that would be well.

7894. In making your calculation as to the cost of maintenance you take it at £30 per inmate?—I wished not to understate the cost.

7895. Having regard to the fact that maintenance in a prison, which is a more elaborate kind of establishment, costs only £20, is not £30 a high figure, especially as the labour might remunerate up to, say 40 per cent.?—In the lunatic asylum they charge as high as £30, and I based my calculation on lunatic treatment.

7896. What is the cost per inmate of the keep in Oldmill?—I think it is about £16.

7898. There is a class of persons you have to deal with sometimes in poorhouses and sometimes in prison—people who are either aged or not able-bodied—how would you deal with them?—The institution would be just the place for them.

7899. Would it be an advantage to keep such people in the poorhouse?—If we had the power, which I think we should have, many cases would be sent to the poorhouse instead of the prison.

7900. (By Miss Stevenson.) Do you think the Parochial Board authorities or Parish Council authorities should have power to deal with prostitution cases?—I think it would be better if they could be taken charge of and detained.

7901. You find the same women coming up again and again, and yearly going down in the scale?—We do.

7902. Have you ever given them the chance of going to a shelter?—Yes: one or two went and ran away.

7903. You say the reformatory is always ready to receive children sent to it?—Yes, but we ask the parents to contribute towards their maintenance if able.

7904. (By Dr. Sutherland.) In giving your calculation, which you admit to be a high one, you indicated that, if the Government did nothing to help to provide for these people, it might be beneficial for the city itself to do something. I suppose the city would have still less objection if the cost of the institution were undertaken by Government?—Certainly.

7905. You say that there are 55 people costing the city about £300 a year: to provide for these people would be so far a relief to the city?—It would.

7906. A number of these people are common to the poorhouse and the prison. The Parochial Board might be expected to do something in respect of them?—I don't think half a dozen who have ever been in the poorhouse have been sent to prison.

7907. With regard to these men who are so continually in prison, what becomes of their wives and children?—We generally find in the class of persons who go constantly to prison that it is the wife who maintains the family.

7908. So that the wife and family would be better able to provide for themselves when the husband is in confinement. Do you think you could find out the history of the 55, and let us know how many of them are now, or ever have been, chargeable to the parish?—I will.

7909. What results have you had from boys sent to the Mars Ship?—The results in the Mars Ship boys have been good.

7910. Yet the Mars has some 400 boys?—I have no objection to large numbers in an institution where they are being trained for after life.

7911. Did you say that you had not much objection to inebriates of the well-to-do and poorer classes being treated in the same institution?—The expense of two such institutions would be great.

7912. Were you aware that in America the well-to-do and poorer inebriates are in the same building though they do not mix?—I was not aware.

7913. The Aberdeen police statistics show 2165 cases of disorderly conduct, and 285 of drunk and incapable, the proportion of drunk and incapable being about one to eight of the others, while in Glasgow the two categories are nearly equal. Can you explain the large proportion of disorderly cases in Aberdeen?—There are many cases of trifling quarrels that should not be brought up at all.

7914. Does the disproportion arise from the fact that, under your local Act, you can only give a sentence of 24 hours or 5s. for being drunk and incapable, and the constable on slight pretext of resistance makes the charge the more serious one of disorderly conduct which carries the bigger penalty?—I do not think so.

7915. Are Aberdeen drunkards more riotous than those of other towns, or do the police select the offence to be charged?—An incapable man cannot resist. He has to be carried by the police.

7916. I see that in Aberdeen 3156 persons were apprehended once, and did not come back. Does that not go to prove that, in 90 per cent. of cases, the slight penalty of a pledge or the police cells, or a small fine imposed by the magistrate, has sufficed to deter?—Perhaps 20 or 30 cases in a month are those of strangers who do not belong to Aberdeen.

7917. What would you consider the definition of an habitual drunkard?—Four convictions in one year.

7918. Should not that to some extent be regulated by the opportunity of committing the offence and the intermissions between offences?—The magistrate should be allowed more power.

7919. There are three poorhouses in this district—St. Nicholas, Old Machar, and Stonehaven: in Stonehaven there are 75 inmates, and in the other two there are 200 vacant places. Could an arrangement be easily made to set aside the Stonehaven poorhouse as a reformatory for habitual offenders, its present inmates being sent to Aberdeen and Old Machar?—If Government granted powers to the other two parishes to take the Stonehaven inmates, and set that building free, it might be done, though I think there would be considerable difficulty. It would depend on the payment of the keep for the 75.

7921. Do you think that 30 days in prison would be enough to take away the appetite for drink?—I think it would cure some of them, and it would have a deterrent effect.

7922. If a man is not deterred from drinking by the knowledge that he is bringing social and industrial ruin upon himself, will imprisonment be likely to deter him?—When an individual is kept from drink for a considerable time he has not the same longing for it.

7923. We are told by medical men that it is a matter of months, not of days?—I would put them in prison first for a week, then for a fortnight.

7924. Does not that cause them to lose their employment?—Persons of this class seldom have regular employment. They generally get their employment from day to day, as it comes to the harbour.

7925. Are you aware that, if you send them to prison for 30 days, you give their families a legal claim on the Parochial Board?—There is something in that.

7926. Do you think it would deter other prisoners to put a few of them in prison?—I think it would be beneficial to have the power.

7927. Have you power to give them time to pay the fine?—No; but I think we should have it.

7928. You use the First Offenders' Act?—We do.

7929. Do you ever impose caution without a fine?—We frequently for the purpose of giving the party a chance, ordain him to find caution for £1 or £1, 10s. for his good behaviour for 6 months, and order him to appear then for sentence if called upon.

7930. Is it not the case that you often send vagrant children to industrial schools?—We do.

7931. Do you propose to give free accommodation in the new lodging-house?—No.

7932. Do you propose to exact a labour test?—It would be better if we could.

7933. Would not lodging-houses without a labour test be apt to bring a large number of vagrants?—I believe they would.

7934. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Would not the prospect of loss of his employment be a moral deterrent?—It would help.

7935. Is it not the case that an inebriate has practically lost his self-control?—Some have; some have not.

7936. When the drink is in front of him, does he reflect on the consequences of indulgence?—No; but I think prospect of a longer imprisonment would have a deterring influence.

7937. We are told that it clears the drink out of a man's tissues and makes him ready for more?—In some cases that may be so.

7938. When a man has been 73 times in prison, it may be concluded that the punishment has no deterring effect, and that the imprisonment has no reforming effect?—Certainly not.

7939. By a long period of seclusion could you reform the vagrant class?—Yes, if they were made to work.

7940. Would not the instinct of vagrancy revive when they were set free?—I think it might be eradicated.

7941. Is the contribution to the reformatories paid without grumbling?—At first there was some grumbling, but not for years past.

7942. There would be grumbling if you proposed another tax?—No doubt of it.

7943. Do you think you could make out a strong enough case to overcome the reluctance?—It would have to be put to them that they are paying the cost at present, though they do not realise it, and that money would be saved from existing rates.

7945. As to prostitution cases, is there any absolute definition of 'loitering'?—The magistrates differ very much in their ideas of dealing with this question. My own opinion is that no one should be convicted unless the party alleged to have been importuned appears and gives evidence that he has been importuned, but such parties are not willing to come up. If the charge is 'importuning,' the individual importuned must be there to give evidence or I do not convict. I want evidence as to the language used by the woman to the man.

7946. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) You mean that if you take the unsupported evidence of the police constable, you are really making him the judge of the case?—Quite so.

7947. (By Dr. Farquharson.) As to the deterioration of the prostitute class—do you think they become lower from police supervision and prison discipline?—I don't know, but if you are on the bench you find the same person, when brought up again and again, visibly sinking in caste.

7948. Would not the deterioration be the same without the police supervision?—I have no evidence on that point.

7949. (By Col. M'Hardy.) With reference to the relation between the magistrates and the Chief Constable, is not the Chief Constable an officer of the magistrates?—Not altogether.

7950. Is it not competent for the magistrates to issue instructions to the Chief Constable as to how the Act is to be administered?—He may take suggestions from the magistrates, but he is independent of them. He has full charge of the constables, and the magistrates cannot dismiss him.

7951. (By the Chairman.) You never send a person to prison for 'importuning' unless there is evidence that there really has been importuning—that is on the same principle that you would not send a man to prison for robbing unless there was evidence of the offence?—Just the same.

7952. You take month about in the Police Court?—We do.

7953. Could you let us have a record of several months' cases, distinguishing your own?—I will. [Witness then withdrew.]

Dr. J. C.
Ogilvie Will.

J. C. OGILVIE WILL, M.D., F.R.S.E., Prison Surgeon, Aberdeen, called in and examined.

Dr. J. C.
Ogilvie Will.

7954. (By the Chairman.) How long have you been prison surgeon in Aberdeen?—For 18 years.

7955. In the course of that time you have seen a large number of habitual offenders?—I have.

7957. After the first imprisonment, has that punishment much deterrent effect?—Very little.

7958. Do you agree that petty theft is largely associated with drunkenness?—I do.

7959. You have a large consulting practice, in which your advice is taken as to private cases of inebriety—would you give us your idea as to whether it savours of disease?—Undoubtedly the brain and nervous tissues of the inebriate become deteriorated, and his moral sense becomes blunted.

7960. What would be the object of proper medical treatment under these circumstances?—To restore the patient's general health, and let the tissues recover their normal condition.

Dr. J. O.
Ogilvie P.W.
14 Dec. 1894.

7961. You have seen proposals as to so-called remedies—what is your opinion of them?—I think they are utterly useless—the ‘gold’ cure the ‘Tyson’ cure, and all the others.

7962. When you are called upon to deal with a private inebriate how do you manage?—I am in a helpless position. I prescribe total abstinence, but it is seldom followed out; I am at a great loss in treating such cases.

7963. We were told of people in the remote Highlands and Islands to whom inebriates can be sent?—I have never made much of these private homes. I prefer voyages in temperance ships, or under control of a responsible nurse.

7964. Have you found that the inebriate stands the nurse?—Yes; but I cannot say that much good has come of that treatment. It does not last long enough. I think the disease is incurable except by prolonged detention. A great deal depends on the individual constitution. Where the malady has been inherited that plays a great part in the matter.

7965. Is there an intimate connection between insanity and drink?—There is. There are diseased conditions which give rise to drinking habits, and which admit of being curatively treated. But I have known only rare instances of people pulling up.

7966. Have you many weak-minded prisoners under your charge?—We have weak-minded prisoners—I would not say a large proportion—people who are hardly responsible for their actions, and who would be better dealt with otherwise.

7967. Are these people habitual offenders?—Some of them are habitual.

7969. Is prostitution connected with drunkenness?—It leads to drunkenness, and becomes associated with it.

7970. (By Dr. Farquharson.) You say prostitution leads to drink and not the other way round. If we had no drink should we have no crime? Are Oriental countries free from crime?—I don't know that the comparison is quite fair. I think the connection between drink and crime is as clear as is usually stated. Dr. J. O. Ogilvie P.W.

7971. How do you account for the difficulty in curing inebriety?—Partly from its being treated too late. If we could get such cases earlier, the chance of cure would be better.

7972. Would it not be difficult to get sufficient evidence at the early stage?—Often great difficulty.

7973. By the time these cases come under public notice, is not the hope of cure practically gone?—That is why I am so pessimistic in the matter. But I would certainly make the experiment of a prolonged period of seclusion.

7974. Have you faith in any kind of special drink treatment?—None.

7975. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you find that prisoners convicted of graver offences are habitual drunkards?—No.

7976. It does not conduce to the efficiency of the felon in his career of crime. As to the assumed connection between drink and serious crimes, not including drunken assaults ending fatally, take the case of Italy and France, both sober countries as compared with this, if you found that in these countries serious crime is more rampant, would not that help to change your mind?—I don't know that the statement is correct. I know that absinthe and things like that are used in France.

7977. But, as a matter of fact, you do not see on the streets of Paris, Rome or Naples, the drunkenness that you can witness in the large cities of this country any night?—That would not affect my opinion founded on what I know. I have seen the one thing and not the other.

7977A. You have not much faith in the reclamation of inebriates?—I have had experience of people remaining total abstainers for years—three years say—and then breaking out and becoming as bad as before.

7978. We have been told that in many of the Magdalene asylums 30 per cent. turn out well?—I would like to know how long the reform continues. I would be afraid of their breaking out again.

7979. Would not seclusion for a year or more be not only for the good of the individual but for his family?—I have said that I approve of it. I incline to the opinion that inebriety is incurable, but seclusion for a considerable period would be good for the individual and for society. [Witness then withdrew.]

Col. Thomas
Innes.

COL. THOMAS INNES of Learney, called in and examined.

Col. Thomas
Innes.

7980. (By the Chairman.) I understand you are Chairman of the Joint Committee of Inquiry into the financial position of the local reformatories?—I was Chairman of the Committee which resulted in the promotion of the private Act, under which the reformatories receive a subsidy of £1200—£600 from the county and city respectively.

7981. Did you find that payment of the subsidy was borne patiently?—It is levied in the county under the Local Government Act, and is included in the general county rate—what used to be the rogue money.

7982. Had you any revolt or expression of dissatisfaction against the payment?—No; it is an annual vote by the County Council. The city contributes an equal amount. All the private Act did was to make it legal to give the money. The contribution is given cheerfully both by county and town. It has been frequently discussed, but there has been no serious opposition.

7983. Is there anything you would wish to state with reference to the subject of this inquiry?—If I were allowed to make an observation it would be with reference to the casual poor, and especially the claims of the unemployed. There is an association for the poor, the secretary of which is, I understand, to be put before you. That association was formed a few years ago to organise public charity for the deserving poor, and arrangements were made by means of workshops and otherwise to offer employment that the deserving poor might be distinguished from the undeserving and habitually idle. So far this worked well. But latterly it has appeared to me that the distinction between the deserving and the undeserving has been made a little too broad. There is a considerable number of men dependent on casual employment, who are not undeserving of assistance, and when such men are offered employment at breaking firewood, and find that they can do better going about begging, the arrangement seems rather a failure. It was suggested by a reverend gentleman of some experience in Perthshire, that it would be a good way of meeting this difficulty if some proprietor were to offer land for a fruit farm, upon which, when there is lack of employment, such men might find work that would not be in competition with ordinary labour, but might be a sufficient answer to their demand for employment. Mr Milne says the great difficulty is that a fruit farm would only provide employment when it is sufficiently offered elsewhere.

7984. (By Dr. Farquharson.) The work on a fruit farm would be too continuous?—Or not continuous enough. The unemployed would only come occasionally, and sometimes in large numbers.

7985. What is the character of the tramps to be found in Aberdeenshire?—I don't think you can class tramps in one category. I have sometimes admired a man struggling with adversity; and I have known a man give me an honest and consistent account of his earnings; but they will only accept employment when they cannot do better. Mr. Milne told me of a young woman who frequented a neighbourhood playing an accordion. Some philanthropic ladies thought they would like to find her employment, but her answer was: 'Do not trouble yourself; I never go home without 2s. and sometimes 10s. a day.' I don't think a man who is a habitual vagrant, if he has grown up in the habit, will ever become a steady workman.

Col. Thomas Innes.
 14 Dec. 1894.

7986. How do the farmers regard these vagrants?—They are suffered and treated with consideration by the farmers. Perhaps it is the remains of the old feeling against incurring ill-will. I have not heard of masterful begging, but I have no great experience.

7987. (By Col. M'Hardy.) There is a large number of these people in Aberdeenshire—about 517 of an average daily population of them during the year—how are they sustained?—I have no special information, though I have seen them in my own neighbourhood. The worst of them pillage a little and poach a good deal. They have a little traffic in hardware and crockery, and may do something for their shelter. [Witness then withdrew.]

Col. Thomas Innes.
 14 Dec. 1894.

Mr. George Milne.

Mr. GEORGE MILNE, Secretary of the Aberdeen Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society, called in and examined.

Mr. George Milne.

7988. (By the Chairman.) You are Secretary of the Aberdeen Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society?—Yes; the society has been in existence for about 20 years, having received the approval of the Home Secretary in 1875. It is carried on as a branch of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, without cost to the society.

7989. Of what do its funds consist?—Of donations and subscriptions, amounting to £40 or £50, including payments from the prison authorities.

7990. How many prisoners are assisted?—The average yearly number is 30 from local and 4 from convict prisons. There has been an increase to 47 since the convict prison was opened at Peterhead.

7991. What is your experience with habitual offenders?—The proportion of habitual offenders to the total number convicted seems to be large in Aberdeen, and the lady visitors, who are authorised to visit the wards of female prisoners, have often to report that the women in prison at given dates are almost entirely composed of chronic cases, whom they are unable to help in any way that would be of permanent value. Impressed with this condition of affairs, the committee of the society embodied its views in a memorial to the Secretary for Scotland, about five years ago, offering the following suggestions:—(1) 'That the law be so altered as to make repeated previous convictions an aggravation of the crime or offence charged, so that offenders may be convinced that only increased misery can result from persistent disregard of the law; (2) that, alike in the interests of the criminal and the community, some provision should be made for establishing Adult Reformatory Institutions of an industrial character, and, as far as possible, on a self-supporting basis, for the compulsory detention of inebriates and such other cases as threaten to become chronic; and (3) that those who have been placed under compulsory restraint be detained for such period of time as might give a reasonable prospect of their tastes and habits being so improved as to admit of their being set at liberty consistently with their own interests and the good of society; while, in the event of those detained, again lapsing into bad habits, it might be competent for the magistrates to recommit them to the reformatory for a further extended period.'

7993. Would you let us know what you mean by special treatment for first offenders?—It is found that, associated with other prisoners, they become accustomed to their surroundings, and find the prison not so terrible a place after all. I know that in this county habitual offenders do work through the prison, and become associated with younger prisoners.

7994. Have you any experience of certified cells apart from prison?—No.

7995. There is another punishment for juvenile offenders—whipping?—I think if that is to be done it should be by the parents, but it is better than putting in prison.

7996. What is your idea of the most reformatory mode of dealing with a young offender?—I think prison should be the last resort, and, as a choice of evils, would prefer whipping.

7997. Have you come across many who are mentally defective?—I have found many not fit for the fatuous ward of the poorhouse, but so weak as to be unable to defend themselves amongst certain classes of society. I would give powers to detain them in the poorhouse. Unless they can be detained compulsorily, they leave.

7998. There would be difficulties of settlement?—They would have to be dealt with as in the case of other paupers.

7999. The result would be that you would have a person under a quasi-criminal charge in a place where he could not be detained?—The mentally weak must become a charge on the country, and there is no more economical mode of dealing with them than the parochial system. For weaklings our poorhouses are quite suitable, and for those in full possession of their faculties the existing prison system might be adapted so as to include an adult reformatory branch, under prison discipline, but with distinctly remedial aims and methods. The period of detention of a habitual offender should be lengthened, but should be coupled with the adoption of a system of hiring out on probation, which would act as a strong incentive to diligence and good behaviour, and would give opportunities for testing the permanency of any apparent change for the better.

8000. Do you think people would be willing to take them on probation?—The condition usually is to remain 18 months to two years under voluntary detention, and situations are generally found for them out of those Voluntary Homes.

8001. What do you do with the prisoners in the Aid Society?—My work is chiefly in securing employment for them. As a rule, I wish to encourage prisoners to look for work themselves. If I have personally to approach an employer, I feel that I am bound to tell in confidence the history of the person. I seek labour work mostly for the men, and household work for the women. We have tried to deal with habituels repeatedly, but find that, while they are willing to accept any proposal when in prison, they are unwilling to remain in a home, and seldom stay in it for any considerable time.

8002. What do you give them when they are released from prison?—We give clothes if necessary. Convicts get a suit before they leave prison.

8003. Is there anything about it recognisable?—No, it is a tweed suit. I have to provide working clothes.

8004. What is your average expenditure per prisoner?—About 25s.

8005. You try to get a released prisoner away from his old haunts?—I usually look out lodgings for them.

Mr. George Milne.

14 Dec. 1894.

8006. What does that cost?—The last one I lodged cost 9s. 6d. a week for board and lodging.

8007. You want to get the convict away from Aberdeen?—In some cases I urge them to leave Aberdeen. I have just seen a convict's wife away to another place, where I think they will do better, and the convict follows in a few days.

8008. Do you find families willing to receive female convicts?—Many are not inclined to receive them.

8009. Are the prisoners willing to go to homes?—Not usually. As an example—two women, sisters, who had been frequently convicted, when in prison expressed earnest desire to change their habits, and willingness to go into a home. I made arrangements for their admission, and sent a person to convey one of them from the prison to the home. She reached the home, and went off within ten minutes. After that I sent to the other sister, still in prison, but she also changed her mind and refused to go.

8010. Have you any success with habitual offenders?—There is one case in which a woman, classed as an habitual offender, has been for nearly a year without an offence. That is a rare experience. Those who have been in a first time generally turn out best.

8011. Do you find occupation for them?—Mostly at labouring work: but in a recent case a prisoner who had been a packman asked me to retain his gratuity till he got his licence. That was done, and he is now doing well.

8012. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Do you visit the prison?—I visit the prison, but I have access to the prisoners only by their being brought out. I would like greater facilities.

8013. Have the visitors perfect freedom of access?—They have. Mr. George Milne. 14 Dec. 1894.

8014. What do you mean by a separate system of confinement?—I mean a system under which each prisoner would be separately confined.

8015. Is not that what they have?—I mean that the prisoners seem to get too familiar with their surroundings, and that even long imprisonment ceases to have a deterrent effect.

8016. (By Dr. Sutherland.) What would you call a deterrent punishment?—A sufficient period of solitary confinement—say a week.

8017. If you learned that 90 per cent. of the first offenders are deterred, by a few hours in a police cell and leaving a small pledge, or a penalty of 5s. or 24 hours inflicted by a magistrate, why should you wish severer penalties?—It seems to have wrought with the 90 per cent.

8018. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) So far as you can you require labour before giving any advance?—We do.

8019. Do you find that your labour department pays its expenses?—No, there is a loss of £100 to £150 a year, which we consider one way of giving relief.

8020. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Have you difficulty in getting employment for discharged prisoners?—In some cases we have.

8021. Are you ever short of funds?—Our funds have hitherto been sufficient for our needs. [Witness then withdrew.]

Professor Matthew Hay.

MATTHEW HAY, M.D., Professor of Forensic Medicine in the University of Aberdeen, and Medical Officer of Health in Aberdeen, called in and examined.

Professor Matthew Hay.

8022. (By the Chairman.) You are Police Surgeon and Medical Officer of Health in Aberdeen?—I am.

8023. You see a good deal of the habitual criminals of the town?—I am only called to see them when there is difficulty in dealing with them—when they are ill or requiring professional attendance.

8024. Are the people of Aberdeen unusually riotous?—I have no means of comparing them with others.

8025. The proportion of arrests on the charge of being drunk and disorderly is enormously greater than anywhere else?—I am not aware, of my own knowledge.

8026. Have you any theories as to the deterrent effect of ordinary modes of dealing with habitual criminals?—I do not consider the ordinary treatment of any service. I have prepared some notes on the subject. (MS. handed in.)*

8027. Do you know anything of Elmira?—I have not personally visited it. I am aware that some difficulties have arisen recently in connection with the institution, but they appear to have no bearing on the principle of treatment.

8028. You speak of dealing with the reclaimable class on farms, and think the cost would be less than on the present system: did you work that out?—I have no special information.

8029. It has been suggested that, after a certain number of convictions, during life or a shorter period, the police might be authorised to bring a complaint, aggravated by the consideration that the accused was a habitual offender, and that it should rest with the Sheriff to decide who should be considered a habitual offender?—I think something might with advantage be done in that direction.

8030. How would you deal with the habitual drunkard who does not come before the police?—I think there should be some means of dealing with such persons. I have often been appealed to about them by their friends, and my advice has been that, where they cannot deal with them domestically, they should be declared insane, and treated in an asylum. But I have generally found that medical men decline to certify for an asylum in such cases.

8031. Do you know of any cases, which might properly have been treated as those of habitual drunkards, having been certified and sent to lunatic asylums?—Yes.

8032. (By Dr. Sutherland.) As a medical jurist you have come across cases in which habitual inebriety has been well-known, but has not come under cognisance of the law?—I have, and I think there is great need of provision for such cases.

8033. Your purpose would be served if such persons could be brought before the Sheriff, and an inquiry conducted on the evidence of friends and neighbours and medical testimony in addition?—Yes: in such cases probably the inquiry should be private.

8034. (By Dr. Farquharson.) You have told us of one or two cases in which habitual drunkards have been put as lunatics in an asylum. How long would they be detained there?—Till the superintendent of the asylum considered the patient fit to take care of himself when released.

8035. Would the superintendent of the asylum be warranted in keeping the person for a long time on that footing?—I think not, and that some other provision is needed.

8036. Do you think it is possible in this way to cure inebriety?—I am fairly hopeful, from my experience, if the detention is at a sufficiently early stage, and I would give all cases a chance.

8037. Is there not this difficulty—that the evidence in an early stage might be insufficient to satisfy a magistrate?—I hardly think so: even in men of the age of a university student it would at times be possible to give evidence showing the desirability of their being so treated.

8038. In more advanced cases there is not so much hope?—In later cases structural changes occur in the system: it becomes both a moral and physical condition. If the case is got early enough, and treated promptly, I believe that, in a majority of cases, good results may be achieved.

8039. Would confinement for a period of, say a month, serve any curative purpose?—A period of one month would probably be of no use. It would have to be not less than three or six months, and, if brought back again, then for a longer period. That should be left largely in the discretion of the institution superintendent. There should be a maximum and minimum, within the range of which those in charge of the institution might be at liberty to choose.

8040. How would you treat habitual offenders?—As to general offenders, I have faith in detention if accompanied by education, moral and physical. I judge from the good effects in the Elmira and kindred institutions, from which about half have been sent out on parole, with the result that only 15 or 17 per cent. have lapsed into their former ways.

8041. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) In the case of habitual drunkards, do you think short terms of imprisonment do any good?—No, they tend rather to confirm the person in his drunken habits, and he loses his work. Matthew Hay 14 Dec. 1894.

8042. (By Dr. Sutherland.) What is your opinion of the 'Tyson,' the 'metabolic,' the 'gold' cure, and such like?—I have not analysed them, but I think them utterly useless. I am not a believer in medicinal remedies for intemperance. [Witness then withdrew.]

Miss Addison.

Miss ADDISON, Matron of Aberdeen Home for Fallen Women, called in and examined.

Miss Addison.

8043. (By the Chairman.) You are Matron of the Rescue Home in King Street?—I am.

8044. How long have you been in that position?—I came eight months ago.

8045. Have you any reports of the operations of the institution?—I put in the two last reports.

8046. How many inmates have you?—Eleven: There were 13 admissions during the year, 9 left of their own accord, 2 were placed in service, and 2 it was thought necessary to send away.

8047. With what kind of cases do you deal?—Young girls that have been astray, or who are in danger of going astray.

8048. How long do you keep them?—For two years. We don't admit them unless they make up their mind to remain two years.

8049. How do you occupy them?—In laundry work and housework.

8050. If they change their minds they can leave at any time?—If they leave they get back their own clothing, but if they remain two years they get a nice outfit.

8051. I see you sent off two; have any others left before the expiry of their term?—They all remained.

8052. Two were placed in domestic service last year: how many this year?—Two; one to domestic service and one to mill work.

8053. I see your collections and subscriptions amount to £187: how much do you make by work?—We have made £263 by washing.

8054. (By Col. M'Hardy.) How are your inmates accommodated?—Each has a little room to herself, with a bed. We have 16 beds.

8055. How do you regulate their work?—So many in the laundry and so many at housework. They get up at six in the morning and leave off at six in the evening. Those who light the fires are up at half-past five. They make all their own clothes and the outfits that they receive in going away.

8056. (By Miss Stevenson.) Before coming here you were engaged in the Industrial School at Ayr and in Dr. Guthrie's School in Edinburgh—for how long?—For three and a half years in each.

8057. Had you charge of boys or of girls?—Of both. I was for eight months matron of the girls' school.

8058. Did you find that they were already familiar with vice?—Some of them were already familiar with such things as lead to the need for Refuge Homes, from the way in which they had been brought up.

8059. Had you any experience with the unfortunate class of women before coming here?—I had not.

8060. Are you in charge of the institution?—Yes; there is a ladies' committee. The ladies take month about, and come regularly and go over the house.

8061. What is the routine of your day?—One girl gets up at half-past five for work in the kitchen, and another for housework: the rest at six. Breakfast is at eight, and worship after breakfast, lunch at 11, then to work. Dinner at one, and work again at two. After six they have tea, and do their knitting or sewing. There is an evangelistic meeting every Thursday. In the summer time, instead of going into the class-room, they go out and play. When tired they have books out of the library, and games occasionally.

8062. What is the average age of the girls?—From 15 to 27.

8063. Have any of them been in homes before?—One has been.

8064. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Do you get many who have been long on the streets?—No; our committee object to taking them when advanced in vice.

8065. Is there no chance of reclaiming them at a later stage?—We have one 26 years of age; she has been well-behaved.

8066. Do they complain of having been harried by the police?—No.

8067. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Have any of them been habitual drunkards?—One of them has been; more or less they have all taken drink.

8068. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you find that all, or nearly all prostitutes, are drunkards?—Yes, they could not live the life without the drink.

8069. Do you recognise among them different types of disposition and temperament, as well as different degrees of vice?—Yes. I think it is desirable to have them classified.

8070. Is there a risk of those old in vice having a bad influence on the younger?—We make it a rule that they are not to speak at all of their former lives. [Witness then withdrew.]

[ADJOURNED.]

EIGHTEENTH DAY.

DUNDEE, Saturday, 15th December 1894.

PRESENT :—

Sir CHARLES CAMERON, Bart, M.P. (Chairman).
Col. A. B. M'HARDY, R.E.
Dr. FARQUHARSON, M.P.

Professor DOVE WILSON.
Dr. J. F. SUTHERLAND.
Miss FLORA C. STEVENSON.

LORD PROVOST LOW, called in and examined.

Lord Provost Low.

15 Dec. 1894.

8071. (By the Chairman.) You are Lord Provost of Dundee?—I am.

8072. How long have you been Lord Provost?—Since November of last year.

8073. And how long have you been in the municipality?—I have been a councillor for 18 years, and I was a magistrate for 5 years previous to my being appointed Lord Provost.

8076. We will deal first with the case of those who would support themselves?—Yes, I have thought of both classes; in fact I divide drunkards into what I would call three classes. I call the first class drunkards pure and simple, who appear before the Police Court—that is to say, those who are not charged with or convicted of crime other than drunkenness. Then the second class I call habitual drunkards who are frequently convicted of other offences—of other petty offences—along with drunkenness; and the third class I call habitual drunkards who don't appear at all before the Police Court, but who, nevertheless, are great sources of trouble to their families and friends.

8078. Then let us have the case of pure and simple drunkards?—The pure and simple drunkard is he or she who is brought to the Police Court and convicted of being drunk and incapable of taking care of themselves, and so taken up by the police, and dealt with by the magistrate. The principle which pertains now is to fine or imprison for a very short period as the law allows. They either pay the fine, or, more generally, go to prison for a few days. They leave prison raging for drink, and the very first thing they do is by hook or crook—even by selling the garments off their backs—to obtain more drink, and the result is that, in a very short time, they are back again at the Police Court, and back again to prison.

8079. You spoke about imprisonment for a very short time. I believe you have power here to imprison for 30 days?—I will give you the maximum penalty. The maximum is 40s. or one month.

8080. But, practically, such a high sentence is seldom given by the police magistrate? That is the same penalty as in the Burghs Police Act?—The same penalty. Two years ago we practically adopted that. Previously we were not able to give such a long sentence.

8081. In passing—you have been a magistrate under both of these conditions?—No. I have not served on the police bench since we adopted the general Police Act clause, but I am familiar with the work.

8082. Could you give us any statement of your own experience as to the comparative results of your lightest penalty—5s. or 24 hours—and the system under which your maximum penalty in ordinary cases is 40s. or one month? I don't know whether you have power to add 14 days in cases of habituals?—No, I think that the maximum for 'drunk and incapable' is 40s. or one month.

8083. Still, there is a great difference between that and 5s. or one day. Can you tell us whether there is any marked improvement?—I cannot give you a comparison, because I have not served on the police bench since we adopted this particular clause.

8084. Have you anything further to say about that class?—Well, the question now is how to deal with that class—I mean what to do with them other than what we are doing. Generally, my idea is that in order to deal with drunkards, it will be necessary to have a separate retreat, or, what I would prefer to call, reformatory, for this class altogether. We will no doubt deal with that a little further on; but I would say, with regard to those convicted of being drunk and disorderly, I would be inclined to recommend that that class be sent directly to such a reformatory. That is to say, I would not in the first place send them to prison. I would send them directly to the reformatory, and my idea of the length of time of detention for habitual drunkards is that it should not be less than 12 months. I have arrived at that opinion from many conversations during several years which I have had with medical men and others, who believe that, in order to get the alcohol poison thoroughly removed from the blood of those miserable creatures, 12 months is the shortest period in which such cure may be expected to be effected; and I would therefore consign the habitual drunkard 12 months to this proposed reformatory—habitual drunkards who were not convicted of any other crime.

8085. And your next class of habitual drunkards?—Well, the next class are those who are convicted of habitual drunkenness with other petty offences, such as assaults, breaches of the peace, and disorderly conduct. I would deal in exactly the same manner with that class, plus punishment in prison for the other offences, and I would do that on this ground, that I think it would be a dangerous precedent in law to say that a drunkard convicted of the other more serious offences in the eyes of the law should simply be consigned to this, what you might call, asylum. I have arrived at this conclusion because, if a drunkard were admitted to a reformatory pure and simple, without paying the ordinary penalty for ordinary crime, then it might very well be asserted that a drunkard committing a very grave criminal offence might plead that drunkenness was the sole cause of this, and therefore he should not be punished otherwise than being consigned to this asylum in a similar way to lunatics. I think that would be a dangerous principle, and, in my opinion, the drunkard who commits crime other than drunkenness,

Lord Provost Low.

15 Dec. 1894.

Lord Provost should first be punished by the magistrate for that offence—I mean, sent to prison—and then be consigned
Low. 12 months to this reformatory.

15 Dec. 1891.

8086. There is a practical question arising here. What do you consider a habitual drunkard?—I have also thought of that, and I think that any one appearing during a year, and being convicted of drunkenness, with or without any other crime, for four times or more, should be held as being a habitual drunkard.

8087. That proposal, as you know, has been very much before us, and we had it objected to in Glasgow, for instance, and in other large manufacturing towns, that a considerable number of decent working men who support their families getting drunk, on pay nights would find their way into the hands of the police four or five times in the course of the year?—I know the point. It has not escaped me. I have no doubt we have the same class in Dundee.

8088. Do you think that could be obviated by committing these men, say to the sheriff, as guilty of such and such a crime, aggravated by habitual drunkenness and repeated convictions, and asking him to pronounce against them as habitual drunkards or habitual offenders? Would you take other evidence than the mere number of commitments?—I would not be inclined personally—I have thought of the subject exactly on the lines which you have stated—I would not be inclined to make any difference between one class and another class convicted at the Police Court. My experience is that the hard-working wage-earning men who simply get drunk on Saturday do not appear at the Police Court with such frequency as that. There are some occasionally getting into a scrape and appearing now and again, but by no means with any sort of regularity. I don't think I could say from my experience that I remember of any working man appearing twice in the year. I am perfectly satisfied he has not.

8089. So you think four would be a safe margin?—My objection to making differences is this, that, if you do make a difference, then that very class would not have the same fear of being committed for 12 months to this asylum, which I think would be a very deterring thing, particularly to that class. It is the very thing that is wanted. We must not forget that that very class sometimes go and spend large portions of their wages before they go home. They then proceed home drunk, and make a perfect pandemonium of their homes, to the total destruction of peace and quietness there, and I feel that if those men—who, mark you, are all very intelligent men—felt that there was a danger of being consigned for 12 months to this asylum, they would think twice—because they are capable of thinking—before they permitted themselves to get into that condition; and I think if we wish to deter we must force on the minds of that class the danger of being sent away for a long period.

8090. We know your views regarding the two classes of Police Court habitual drunkards, and we come now to the habitual drunkard who does not come into that distinction?—Well, of course they cannot be dealt with in the same way—I mean they cannot be committed in the same way, and the question is, how to remove them when they ought to be committed. Well, on full consideration of this matter, my opinion is that the simple certificate of two medical men and a Justice of the Peace or magistrate should be sufficient evidence that these people are fit subjects to be consigned to a reformatory.

8091. Would you have them consigned to a reformatory to keep themselves there? Would you have them consigned to a public reformatory?—I would have them consigned to a public reformatory where they would have to pay for themselves, just on the same lines exactly as lunatic asylums, where we have paying patients and non-paying patients.

8092. At whose instance do you expect them to be committed?—At the instance of their friends.

8093. Would you allow the police to take action in such cases?—I don't think it would be necessary.

8094. About the expense of these reformatories—do you think that Dundee would care to contribute at all towards that?—I think these should be national institutions.

Lord Provost
Low.

15 Dec. 1891.

8095. But there is this difficulty, you see, that, assuming that any legislation were to result in the direction you indicate from the investigations of this Committee, it would probably be confined to Scotland?—Yes.

8096. Because the machinery in Scotland is different from that in England, and our remit is simply as to Scotland. There would be some little difficulty in asking England and Ireland to set up a big system of reformatories at their expense, if they did not participate in them?—Well, you will observe that the local public do not in the meantime have to pay for criminals who are incarcerated in jail.

8097. That is quite true?—And I think it would be a burden thrown on the local rates which would not be warranted in the circumstances, because, in my opinion, if this plan were adopted, it would very soon be felt that Government would have much less to pay for their ordinary prisons than they have now.

8098. Well, of course, we have not overlooked that consideration, but I think the result of the evidence placed before us has been to this effect, that the habitual offender—the habitual drunkard—is a burden on the state for his maintenance in prison, on the municipal rates for his handling by the police, and very often on the parochial rates for his sojourns in the poorhouse in the intervals of his imprisonment?—I quite perceive that; still I am of opinion that this ought to be a national movement, supported as ordinary prisons are, from the national purse.

8099. Then we got evidence in Aberdeen yesterday from one of the leading magistrates to the effect that they have there in the city and county both contributed largely—£600 a year at least—towards the maintenance of the reformatory and Industrial School, and he thought they would be prepared there to give a local subsidy in the event of any such institution as you speak of being erected. You don't think that would hold good in Dundee?—I don't say Dundee would decline to do so, if Parliament in its wisdom thought it was the right thing to do; but I am stating broadly in my opinion that this is an institution which ought to be maintained entirely by the state.

8100. Well, of course, probably the Chancellor of the Exchequer might consider the matter from another point of view. But, assuming that powers were given to corporations and County Councils to contribute to such schemes, do you imagine that there would be any likelihood of Dundee availing itself of these powers?—Well, I don't know whether others who have given evidence have considered as to the probable number of such institutions which might be required in Scotland. My idea is that very few indeed would be required, and that one or two central institutions would, at least in the first place, be all that would be required.

8101. Well now you want, when you get the people in, not merely to be locked up, but to be employed. Have you any ideas on the subject of employment during the reformatory period?—Yes. First they ought to be employed—of that there is no doubt—both paying and non-paying patients. I would make them work. As to the nature of the employment, I know that is a most difficult problem, especially in regard to indoor employment. The prison authorities find that to be so, and, other than the ordinary prison work, I don't know I could suggest anything for indoor employment, but I should greatly advocate the idea, in connection with such reformatories, of having some land attached to them, which I should strongly recommend to be worked by spade labour. I think that what you might call very large gardens—if I might use the term—rather than farms, would be a very right thing.

8102. We have also had that brought under our notice, and I think there is not so much difficulty in suggesting work for male inmates, but take the case of females?—Let me say further as to males that, in my opinion, this garden idea would pay, if fruit were cultivated largely, which is done almost entirely by spade. That is a business that pays, and in that way they could to a certain extent pay their own way, and the burden, whoever it fell upon, would be less, so far as males are concerned.

Low.

15 Dec. 1894.

8103. In connection with the Scottish prisons, there is a considerable amount of sacks made in Dundee, is there not?—I am not aware. I know that many mats are made, and one great objection to that is that the industry seriously interferes with industries carried on by certain charitable institutions, such as Asylums for the Blind, which are seriously crippled in their efforts for that very reason, and hence I said a minute ago that there was great difficulty in connection with indoor employment for prisoners.

8104. We have heard about that. We have also heard it suggested that some of the charitable institutions derive their supply of blind men's mats from the prisons?—That is not so, so far as regards the institution for the blind in Dundee, which is a splendidly organised and well-conducted institution. I had occasion quite recently to speak to the Secretary for Scotland on that subject, and I explained the matter to him, and I can assure you that, so far as Dundee is concerned, the mats are made in the institution.

8105. Now about the females. Of course we know about washing and sewing, but all the institutions may be turned into washing and sewing, and if you are to turn in a large number of habituals—I see the number of drunk and incapables in Dundee last year was some 1600—?—Yes, the females are largely in the majority.

8106. That would be a difficult job—you could not turn them all out to washing and sewing, and you cannot turn them on to spade work. There are 1600 apprehensions for drunkenness. You deal with that very considerable number of habitual drunkards, and the secretary says there are some 60 or 80 women up before you constantly. Would not that necessitate finding some other means of employment? Is there anything you can suggest?—I entirely disagree with those who think that those women cannot be employed at outdoor work to a large extent. I would, most assuredly, both for profit and cure, employ them in the open air as much as possible.

8107. That is a desideratum. But how?—At fruit culture again. Why, in the Blairgowrie district, where so many strawberries are grown and other fruits, raspberries and so on, the women do the most of the labour. Women, as a matter of fact, in agriculture perform a very large amount of ordinary farm work, as we know; and in garden work, which this would practically be, those women would do it first-rate. I should have, in this connection, a considerable poultry farm, which again would pay, and could be managed very nearly entirely by women.

8109. Men of good character?—Men employed by the authorities.

8110. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) You would require very few?—Very few. I maintain this could be done well by women.

8111. (By the Chairman.) There is another suggestion that has been made to us. It has been suggested that, a number of these female inebriates being mill workers, possibly a small textile factory might be erected, where they could be employed in making materials for the prisons. What do you think of that?—What materials?

8112. Well, such things as rugs, and so on, and bedding?—Well, of course, there would be no difficulty whatever in putting up looms. For instance, hand-loom would be very easily put up. I don't know that I could recommend anything of the nature of a factory.

8113. What I wanted to know was your opinion whether that would be likely to excite opposition among the people who are employed by private firms carrying on similar factories?—I should say this, that, if these people were made to weave common stuff, such as is made in Dundee in such immense quantities, with the view of keeping them employed on the one hand, and of earning something on the other hand, all they could produce of such goods would be so infinitesimal that it would never be felt, and would not raise any trouble amongst the operatives, but it would simply require to be weaving—spinning would be impossible—the object would be to get them employed.

8114. Yes, and employed at trades they have some knowledge of?—Yes; the one difficulty is that I am afraid the people who would be sent from Dundee would not be able to weave even. The weaver in Dundee is, as a very general rule, a very respectable citizen. I don't know that in all my experience I ever had before me a weaver. We find that it is a lower class of the community that come before the Police Court. I should not like to name any particular branch of industry from which these poor women come, but I should say generally that I am afraid very few of them would even be fit to be weavers, because of course it requires some technical knowledge. It is a business not learned now, and I am afraid that not much progress can be made in what I would call the textile industry in any department, unless a factory were erected, which, I should think, would be what would not be approved of at all.

8115. The suggestion was that those girls who turn out drunken women have been brought up to some trade—many of them as millworkers—and that the knowledge thus acquired might be utilised in employing them usefully, giving them habits of industry, and launching them out again on their own lines of industry?—Well, I doubt that there would be practical difficulties; but I would make this suggestion. In Dundee we have a home for women who go wrong. They are drawn from the lowest strata of society. When they go to that home they do not really know anything about the work done there, but they very soon learn it, because these women work, and the work done there exclusively is laundry work.

8116. Well, but we have got laundries wherever we go, and reformatories or Magdalene Asylums. It is always laundries; and what we should like to have is a suggestion regarding something apart from laundries and sewing. We know the beneficial results and everything else?—I cannot suggest anything else, other than—in the summer weather and at suitable seasons—out-door work—fruit culture and poultry farming; and I think that these, combined with laundry work and sewing, would be sufficient to keep these women in full employment, and would elevate their minds and train their eyes and hands as well, and they would come out better citizens than they went in.

8117. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Have you any notion what number of habitual drunkards might be sent yearly from Dundee to this institution?—Well, last year—the year 1893—we had convicted of drunkenness, combined with other offences, more than four times, 12. But then we had an immense number of convictions of one kind or another, a vast proportion of which, I have no doubt, was due to drunkenness—I should have said habitual offenders, who appeared frequently before the Police Court last year. They were charged not with drunkenness, but with the more serious offences.

8118. It is just an idea of the number?—Well, I was to point out how difficult that was from tables which are in our possession. One can only make a guess. Here is how I have put it. I say a proportion of those convicted of other offences induced by drunkenness, more than four times, 15. Then importuning, induced by drunkenness, more than four times, 16, making in all 31. I have no hesitation in saying, therefore, that last year there would have been sent from Dundee not less than 31, and very probably more. If this plan were adopted, the police authorities in charging these offenders would take care to charge them with drunkenness, plus the other more serious offences. Just now they are charged only with the more serious offences, and thus any statistical information we have is not accurate on this simple point of drunkenness; but I should say that last year we should have sent at least 31 from Dundee.

8119. And these people you propose to send for two years, or for what number of years?—The people who were convicted of other offences, along with drunkenness, I would send first to prison for the usual period—I mean for assault or breach of the peace—they would be sent perhaps 14 or 28 days to prison for either of these offences, plus 12 months to this reformatory to cure them of drunkenness.

8120. So that, one way or other, there would have been about 30 last year?—There assuredly would have been 31, but very probably many more, because I cannot tell you definitely. I merely guess the proportion.

8122. Now, about the question of rates. Do you not think it possible that if a rate were put on for the whole of Scotland, the counties might object to pay for habitual offenders who come so largely from the cities?—Well, of course, the way I look at it is, that it is in the interests of the country at large, and they might object, but I think it would be a very narrow-minded view to take of the subject.

8123. Is it not the case that the cities vary very considerably also in the proportion of habitual offenders?—I don't think so. I think the numbers, according to my experience, are pretty regular.

8124. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Do you think that the habitual inebriate class are on the increase, generally speaking, or rather from your experience?—I would not like to say.

8125. Then your desire for legislation is not based on the increase of that class?—My desire for legislation is based on my present knowledge—on my knowledge of present conditions, I should say.

8126. Then your idea is to send the habitual inebriate who is not a criminal, except as an inebriate, to a reformatory without preliminary detention in prison?—Yes.

8127. How would you manage in that case? Would you send a man like that to a reformatory on the first conviction?—No; I would not send to a reformatory until he was convicted four times.

8129. Then would he not have a long period of enjoyment of drink before going the length of a reformatory in that case?—You mean after the third conviction?

8130. Between the first conviction and the fourth. He would be practically enjoying the drink without much check or hindrance except fined?—Well, that is true; but we must arrive at some period at which the authorities would be warranted in confining a man for such a long period as 12 months, and I think it would be reasonable to say that a man was not a habitual offender until he habitually appeared for a certain number of times before a Court. That is what, in my opinion, would constitute him a habitual offender, and this institution will be put up only for habitual offenders.

8131. What do you expect the result of long detention to be? Do you expect reform, or only seclusion?—I would expect reform.

8132. You are hopeful of that?—I am.

8133. And are the medical men you have consulted hopeful of reform?—They are.

8134. After a certain long period?—Yes.

8135. Now, as regards cost, your opinion is that the cost would not be very great at first?—My opinion is that the inmates would, to a considerable extent, earn what would defray costs, and that the deficiency should be paid out of the Imperial Exchequer. At the same time, if that was found impracticable, then as an individual, I would not hesitate to say that burghs and counties should join hands and erect and maintain such institutions.

8136. Do you think that the idea of institutions of that kind would act as such a deterrent to the inebriate class that it must?—I believe it would terrify them. In that way the cost would not be great, because they would take care to keep out of the reach of them. My opinion is, that it would have a splendid effect on the drinking class.

8137. Then your view is, that if Government declined to take any part—in that case do you think localities would willingly bear the burden?—I would strongly recommend it.

8138. Do you think your recommendation would be likely to be successful in Dundee?—I believe it would be successful; but I wish it to be clearly understood that, in my opinion, this thing should be done by the state, because it is to relieve the state of much costs in connection with their prison expenditure.

8139. By the state you mean a purely state contribution? You don't mean the general rates, as the Professor indicated, throughout Scotland?—I mean a state contribution from the Exchequer. I don't mean a purely Scottish contribution.

8140. Or a definite rate of any kind?—Or a definite rate of any kind.

8141. Just merely a plunge into the Imperial Exchequer?—That is my view, but I would not let that stand in the way of erecting this institution.

8142. Now, you expressed an opinion with which I entirely agree, that women might be largely employed in open-air agricultural work?—I did.

8143. It is the case that they do this now?—Yes. I think it would have the effect of improving the physical health of these women, who, we must not forget, are all taken from the slums in the cities, or very nearly so, and whose physical condition is not good; and I think it would strengthen their physical condition, and so, at the same time, in all likelihood, strengthen their moral condition.

8144. But, as regards the fruit industry, would there not be a danger of too many people going into it, and of profits coming down to vanishing point?—No. I think that the demand for fruit is growing enormously every year, so much so, that a very, very large proportion of the fruit required for industrial purposes in this country has to be imported from foreign countries.

8145. Not strawberries?—Not strawberries? Well, I beg your pardon. There is an immense quantity of strawberries now imported from Holland for the simple reason that, as a matter of fact, there are not enough strawberries grown in this country to supply the necessities of the people. But it would be a great advantage to the consumers of this country if more strawberries were grown, because home strawberries are so much better than the foreign strawberries which arrive here always in more or less bad condition.

8146. But in my part of the country it is found that, when the English crop is abundant, the price of the strawberries grown in Scotland runs down to a small price indeed—that the market is entirely dependent on the state of the English crop?—We don't find that here. That is not the case. Last year there was a glut of strawberries in England at a certain period, and yet the price of strawberries in Scotland was maintained—in fact, at a high figure, considering the large crop.

8147. Then you think that industry is eminently adapted for female labour?—Yes, and raspberry growing, of which fruit there is never enough.

8148. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) And currants and gooseberries too?—Yes. Both these are crops which are uncertain in the Scottish climate. Therefore, I would not promise that they would be always so profitable. It would depend of course where the institutions were set down, and that would be a very important feature in selecting sites for the institutions. I mean this, that if it were resolved to put down an institution where a fruit-farm could be connected with it, care should be taken to select a site where fruits more generally come to good crops and perfection, and that is easy to be achieved in Scotland.

8149. But then that would take up only a very short time in the year. How would you employ them after the fruit season is over?—Ah; but the fruit requires cleaning. There is a great deal of work in connection with strawberries during the season, cleaning, and weeding, and hoeing, and digging manure in the ground, and replanting patches, because strawberries have to be taken up and replanted periodically.

8150. Would you have a jam factory too?—Well, I would not approve of that, because I think that would be going into an industry that would require a great deal more skill than you could possibly expect from prisoners. You would in that case have to employ skilled labourers at very high rates, and go into details which, instead of yielding profit, would yield loss.

8151. Is there much skill required in making jam?—Oh, yes.

8152. Would you include dairy-farming as part of women's work?—There again, I think there would not be sufficient skill. Dairying requires great skill.

8153. You just put in your milk and turn your handle and there's your butter?—It requires such skill that in this country they have had frequently to bring people from Denmark to teach them. That, in my opinion, would not do at all for this particular class.

8154. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You favour a sliding scale in awarding punishment to petty offenders?—Yes.

8155. I find that, from your annual returns, practically 7000 people were apprehended by the police during the past year, and of these 5100 were only before the Police Court on one occasion?—Yes.

8157. Then you look at 30 days or 40s. to a casual offender not as an oppressive sentence?—Oh yes, I would.

8158. I think in answer to the Chairman, you said you looked on prostitution as synonymous with drunkenness?—No, I did not. I said that out of a certain number of these women who were brought before the Court I took it that they were there consequently upon being at the same time drunk. Drunkenness was the immediate cause of their being before the Court, plus this other offence.

8159. It practically comes to this—that the kind of prostitution that goes on in Dundee is closely identified with drunkenness?—Oh yes.

8160. As a magistrate have you had any experience of well-dressed prostitutes coming before the bench?—We have not much of that in Dundee. Some of them are tawdry dressed, but to say that they are well-dressed would be altogether a misnomer.

8161. In adopting a sliding scale how would the magistrates, changing from month to month, know to award cumulative sentences and penalties?—Well, the previous convictions are notified again. That is again permitted. It was stopped, you are aware. It was found that it was most unsatisfactory—entirely unsatisfactory, that the magistrate did not know anything about the history of the prisoner, and if a man is convicted of drunkenness or any other offence; and the court officials state whether it is the man's second, third, fourth or other time.

8162. In the returns I see it is stated that 79 women have been convicted five times and upwards of drunkenness, drunk and disorderly, and prostitution. Their presence would no longer be required in the city?—Well, you will observe this, that the principle on which I have been proceeding all along has been that when a person is convicted four times in the course of 12 months he or she shall be held to be a habitual offender. We have not had 79 so convicted in one year four times. We would not therefore require accommodation, in my opinion, for a large number. It might be that as time went on we would, but I have told you that, in my opinion, taking last year for example, 31 would appear to me to be the number which we would have had to send to this institution.

8163. Well, the return of the Chief Constable gives the number of 79 women, and only three men convicted five times and upwards for the offence of drunkenness?—Not during the past year.

8164. We have the returns here?—Oh, well, that may be. Of course, you explained that you took a certain proportion of those offences as being related to drunkenness. It may be that all the 79—every one of them were also drunkards, but I should think not. I have taken the proportion, and you have stated that, in my opinion, 31 would be the number.

8165. In regard to the cost at the present time, those people and their dependants in many instances are being maintained in prison out of imperial taxation, in the police cells by the police rates and a Government subvention, and in workhouses by the Parochial Board out of the poor rates. That being so, do you think it would be a fair thing now to come on the Imperial Exchequer for the cost of these people, which, at present, comes from three sources?—I think it would be the best thing to do.

8166. Have them maintained by the State, and the institution solely a Government institution?—Certainly.

8167. And you would have no local interference?—Just as prisons are—just have a board. I would just have a board to be drawn from various quarters just as now.

8168. (By Miss Stevenson.) In the case of those habitual drunkards whose drunkenness never brings them under the notice of the Police Court, on whose evidence and by what authority do you propose to have them certified as habitual drunkards in order that they might be sent to the proposed reformatories?—You may be satisfied with the certificate of two medical men and a magistrate. I mean I would not have them to be brought before any public court. I would hold that just as in the case of a lunatic, this certificate was sufficient, and I would incarcerate them accordingly.

8169. And on the evidence of a man or woman although an immediate relation?—These medical men would satisfy themselves that they were justified in granting such certificate before they did it, and I would be satisfied that they would so satisfy themselves.

8170. Then you attach great importance to the medical certificate?—I do.

8171. And you think it would be sufficient to have this done not in open court but before a magistrate?—I would not have it done before an open court. In my opinion there is no necessity for a court at all. I should say that if two medical men and a magistrate—if these three were convinced that any given person was an habitual drunkard from evidence privately placed before them, that would be sufficient.

8172. In the case of those retreats or reformatories, do you propose that they should be under public management?—Public management entirely.

8173. And you would not approve of their being carried on for the profit of any individual?—I would most assuredly disapprove of any retreats managed for private profit or for private individuals. I have a strong objection to that.

8174. (By Col. McHardy.) Have you a general acquaintance with the views of the people in Dundee. Do you think that the county is quite prepared for

Low.*

16 Dec. 1894.

- Lord Provost Low.* adopting some change in the system of dealing with the small offender?—I am quite sure of it.
- 15 Dec. 1894. 8175. Do you think they would be quite prepared to support some measure devised for their detention?—I have no doubt about it.
8176. In regard to the reformatories of which you speak, you said you proposed to set up two or three for Scotland?—I would have two to begin with—I mean one for males and one for females, separate and in different districts.
8179. It has been explained to us that for effecting reformation amongst the persons of whom we are thinking, that it is extremely desirable to deal with them individually. Would you think that an unimportant matter, rather in the gross, as it were?—I don't see how it could be done individually, other than by the managers and those with them taking an interest, as I believe they would do in each individual case. For instance, no question has been put to me in regard to this point, but I think it would be highly desirable that there should be such an arrangement as would enable the authorities of such a retreat to trace as far as possible the history of the patients after they leave the retreat.
8180. We will think of patients while still in the retreat. I suppose it would go without saying that if you had 50 people in any institution they could be more personally looked after than if there were 300?—It depends on the number you have looking after them. I should say 300 could easily be looked after.
8181. But you could only have one governor, I suppose, or head?—One head.
8182. So that, at any rate, each of the 50 could get a fiftieth of his attention, and 300 only one-three hundredth of it?—But I don't think one man would be insufficient.
8187. Can you suggest what would be the easiest method of overcoming the difficulty?—The only possible system of introducing any kind of textiles, in my opinion, would be hand-loom. If they could learn to do it during the 12 months they are in the reformatory it would injure no outside industry. I am sure of that.
8189. And that is the only thing you can think of?—I would say I can at this moment think of nothing else.
8190. In talking about the drunks who do not come before the police—those who don't come to the police court at all—some of them are rich and some poor. The rich, I suppose, you would suggest that they should pay for their own maintenance in the retreat?—Certainly.
8191. What would you do with the poor?—They would have to go in as free patients, just as in asylums.
8192. Then, would you charge that to the State?—Oh, yea.
8193. To the Imperial Exchequer?—Oh, certainly, just the same as in the others. There is no other way of getting over it that I can see. You could not charge it to the Parochial Board under the present law, and there is no other method I can see of defraying the expenses.
8194. Well, I have put down a question here as to what you would do with those persons who were in retreat or asylums for a year. Is a year your maximum or minimum, to begin with?—Minimum. Well, as at present advised, it would be both maximum and minimum.
8195. Would you do anything in the way of procuring a guardianship for those persons when discharged?—It would be an excellent thing if it could be done.
8196. A very desirable thing if you could do it?—Yea.
8197. (By the Chairman.) In the case of a man, for instance, who is an habitual drunkard and came home frequently and beat his wife and was cruel to his family, but never fell into the hands of the police, if his wife brought him up on a charge of habitual drunkenness, would you have him supported—and he was not, of course, unable to earn any wages—by the State out of the Imperial Exchequer?—No matter in what way, if he was found to be one who should be sent to this institution, either in open court or by certificate, I would send him there, and if his friends were poor and unable to pay, then he would be supported just as other unsupported ones are, and it would be the greatest relief that his family could get, and the best thing done for himself and society.
8198. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Supposing the sentence passed on those people was not actually fixed, who would determine, or on whom would you place the responsibility of determining, whether it would be an advisable step to detain this man or woman for 12 months or longer in the reformatory?—You mean after discharge?
8199. No; after they have been in for 12 months, and it is considered necessary that they should be detained still longer, on whom would you place the responsibility?—I would not give anybody the power to retain any one longer than 12 months. In the first place, I should make a trial of that period and see the result of it. Then it comes to be a question whether, if these people relapse again, you would not give the magistrate discretion to incarcerate them for a longer period than 12 months.

Low.

15 Dec. 1894.

8200-1. Do you look upon them as diseased?—I do.

8202. And you are strongly of the belief that medical men should have a considerable say in the destination of those people?—That is, of people who don't come before the Police Court. The medical men would have nothing to say of those who go before the Police Court.

8203. Well, but if you look upon them as diseased, would you not think it advisable to have medical opinion about them?—No; because while no doubt it is a disease, yet it is a disease brought on simply by too much drinking—a disease of the blood I think it comes to be, which, in order to cure, the people must be kept a certain considerable time from getting any more of this poison.

8204. And treated?—Well, the only treatment I conceive is to be kept away from it and given food suitable for it, and, as I have said, give them work to do; above everything, keep their minds and bodies employed, and keep them away from drink, and I think a cure would in all likelihood take place.

8205. Do you know anything about the 'Tyson cure' tried in Dundee?—I don't know much about it, except taking an interest in it—reading about it; but, so far as I understand, the results have not been very satisfactory. [The witness then withdrew.]

Lord Provost
Low.

15 Dec. 1894.

Lieut.
A. L. Scott.

A. L. SCOTT (late) Lieutenant, R.N., Captain Superintendent of the "Mars," called in and examined.

Lieut.
A. L. Scott

8206. (By the Chairman.) You are Captain of the Mars Training Ship?—I am.

8207. How long have you occupied that position?—For 2 years; but my father was captain of her for 23 years before, so I more or less know of and have been connected with the institution for all that time.

8208. Would you just please explain to the committee the cases of boys that are sent to your ship?—The majority of them are sent under section 14 of the Industrial Schools' Act—that is when they are found wandering, without having any home, or place of abode, or proper guardianship.

8209. We have not had a statement on the whole thing, so I think you might read the section?—(14) 'Any person may bring before two justices or a magistrate any child apparently under the age of 14 years, that comes within any of the following descriptions, namely:—

'That is found begging or receiving alms (whether actually or under the pretext of selling or offering for sale any thing), or being in any Street or Public Place for the purpose of so begging or receiving alms.

'That is found wandering and not having any home or settled place of abode, or proper guardianship, or visible means of subsistence.

'That is found destitute, either being an orphan or having a surviving parent who is undergoing penal servitude or imprisonment.

'That frequents the company of reputed thieves.

'The justices or magistrates before whom a child is brought as coming within one of those descriptions, if satisfied on inquiry of that fact, and that it is expedient to deal with him under this Act, may order him to be sent to a certified Industrial School.'

8210. What are the other clauses of the Act setting forth the description of children to be admitted?—

'(15) Where a child apparently under the age of 12 years is charged before two justices or a magistrate with an offence punishable by imprisonment or a less punishment, but has not been in England convicted of felony, or in Scotland of theft, and the child ought, in the opinion of the justices or magistrate (regard being had to his age and to the circumstances of the case), to be dealt with under this Act, the justices or magistrate may order him to be sent to a certified Industrial School.'

'(16) Where the parent or step-parent or guardian of a child apparently under the age of 14 years represents to two justices or a magistrate that he is unable to control the child, and that he desires that the child be sent to an Industrial School under this Act, the justices or magistrate, if satisfied on inquiry that it is expedient to deal with the child under this Act, may order him to be sent to a certified Industrial School.'

(We do not take boys under section 16 except under exceptional circumstances.)

'(39) The parent, step-parent, or other person for the time being legally liable to maintain a child detained in a certified Industrial School shall, if of 'sufficient ability, contribute to his maintenance and training therein a sum not exceeding 5s. per week.

'Note.—Boys from any part of the country, or of any religious denomination, between 12 and 14 years of age, if physically fit, coming under the above clauses of the Act, are eligible for admission to the 'Mars.'

8212. You told us that you don't take those boys who are under the control of their parents?—There is one very good reason for that. The Government Grant now given is only 2s. a week, and we find that is not enough. The reason is, we imagine, to prevent people getting rid of their children.

8213. But I suppose they are sent to other Industrial Schools?—They can be, but the managers don't care to accept them for that reason.

8214. But they are also sent to other training ships. I had a case brought under my notice of a father having had his boy sent on the plea that he was beyond his control. Is that an exceptional case?—No. For instance, on board the Mars we have four of those special cases.

8215. Well, we come to the next thing. 'The parent, step-parent, or other person for the time being legally liable to maintain a child detained in a certified Industrial School, shall, if of sufficient ability, contribute to his maintenance and training therein a sum not exceeding 5s. per week'—do you manage to get the 5s.?—We don't get it at all. It is collected by the Government to recoup them for the grant.

8216. The Government give 6s. a week for all boys sent under sections 14 and 15?—And 2s. a week for all sent under section 16.

8217. They don't make any difference in the age of the boys, as in reformatories, as to the grant?—No, not in Training Ships.

8218. Do they in the case of the Industrial Schools?—Yes, but I am not quite certain what it is.

8219. We come now to your work. What is the total number of boys?—We are licensed for 400, and we have 395 just now.

8220. And you pass through your hands in the course of the year?—We admitted 118 last year, and discharged 125.

8221. How many boys have altogether passed through the institution?—There were 2564 up to the 31st of last December. That is not counting the boys at present on board, so it would be about another 120 on to that.

8222. Say 2700 roughly?—Yes, roughly.

8223. In the course of 25 years?—Yes, and that is not counting the 400 boys now on board.

Lieut.
A. L. Scott.
15 Dec. 1894.

8224. Can you tell us the result in all these cases?—No. We trace them for three years after discharge.

8225. Let us have the result of your last three years' boys?—364 boys left the ship during 1890, 1891, and 1892; 12 have since died; 26 cannot be traced; 15 are reported upon unfavourably; while 311 are reported as doing well.

8226. There has been some change recently in the law as to the admission—the regulations for admission—what was that?—We are allowed now to take them at 11. Previously it was 12.

8227. Is that an advantage?—It is.

8228. In what way?—We get a better hold of them, and there are many boys—big boys—of 11 knocking about the streets, who, if they remained there till 12, would lose a year.

8229. How long are they committed?—Till 16.

8230. Do you keep them till that time?—Yes. We generally keep them only four years. In the case of a boy committed at 11, if he was doing well he would be allowed to go at 15. Otherwise he would be kept.

8231. You don't let out on licence?—Very seldom. We have tried it, but it did not answer as a general rule.

8232. Would it not give you a hold of them if they got it?—Yes, if we could bring them back. But we never have brought them back. We have only done it in two or three cases.

8233. What do you do with your boys?—We try to get them all to go to sea—all who are physically fit and big enough, but of course a great many won't go, and parents object to their going. We sent 44 to sea last year.

8234. Out of 125?—Yes. And three into the navy. And we send a good many into the army bands. We have a lot of musical training. Besides that three to the navy and three to the army bands, 70 went to shore employment, which is practically back to their friends; and three were discharged on account of disease, and two died.

8235. Is not that rather a waste of raw material—that out of 125 trained for the sea for four years you should only be able to give —?—It would be far better if we could get more to go to sea, but there is difficulty in finding ships.

8236. Even in the Navy?—It is almost impossible to get them in there at all.

8237. Why?—They have a prejudice in the first place against Industrial School boys. In fact it exists almost everywhere. People will not take the trouble to distinguish between Reformatory and Industrial Schools. They don't realise that our boys have done nothing wrong.

8238. But the fact that a number of your boys have erred is against them, though prosecution is not proceeded with?—Yes; well, of course that might be said, but we maintain that all our boys are free from criminal taint.

8239. They are all under 12, the boys brought for theft?—Yes, they are.

8240. Well, a number of those small boys are sent to reformatories, are they not—or only after second conviction?—I would not like to speak on that.

8241. Now tell us what you do with the boys—what you train them at?—Well, when they go on board, the first month we put them with the tailors, learning to mend their own clothes. After that they go to the drill instructor for three months. He sets them up, and marches them about. I must tell you the half of them are always at school, in the educational part, and the other half at the nautical training. After that they are drafted into —.

8243. Do you lean much to pipers?—No; we have Lieut. not a pipe band. We have about 100 boys always A. L. Scott. under musical training. Our first-class band consists of 46. 15 Dec. 1894.

8244. Well, then, you have got a brig, I see?—Yes, we work her in the summer months. She takes 60 boys and 6 officers, practically extra, and we manage during the summer to let them nearly all, or practically all, have a turn in her.

8245. What do you call 'a turn'?—The bigger boys will have about a month or six weeks, and some more.

8246. Do they do everything there?—Oh yes.

8247. Steering?—Yes, and making long trips.

8248. And the smaller ones don't get so long?—Possibly about a week. It is a first-rate thing for their health.

8249. And that ought to make exceptionally good sailors by the time they are done?—So it does. We turn out some splendid fellows.

8250. Do you think there could be any possibility of some working arrangement by which they could be more or less absorbed into the Navy?—Well, generally they are not physically fit for the Navy. It requires a stiff medical examination, and they are very particular about their teeth and every single thing. In fact a boy has to be practically perfect.

8251. Well, about teeth, you would have better opportunities of looking after their teeth?—Oh yes.

8252. Well, your band, is that a good?—Do you find that a good thing of getting boys off?—Yes, some of them go into the army. We have sent five into the army this year.

8253. You speak of the Highlanders, I notice?—Yes.

8254. Do they take them from you?—Oh yes, they are very glad to get them.

8255. Now, then again, do you find the army so much more open-minded?—Yes; from them never comes any objection to them. It is only the Navy.

8256. Do you get them all into the army?—Oh no.

8257. What do you do?—They don't always stop in the band. If, during the last six months in the ship they want to go to sea, we take them and give them nautical training.

8258. There is great difficulty in getting bands for men of war?—I don't know that there is. I think they train for themselves now.

8259. Do you know what ships are without bands?—I could not say.

8260. You don't know the curriculum of bandmen in the army?—No.

8262. Now as to the finances of the concern. Take the educational status of the children. You devote a considerable amount of time to their education?—Just half.

8263. Do you find that the half-time system is satisfactory, and that they make as much progress?—I think so. We only take them up to the fifth standard. At our last examination we had a pass of 99 per cent.

8264. In what standard?—In all the standards, with very few failures.

8265. Who is it who inspects you?—Col. Inglis, who is an officer of the department of the Home Office.

8266. Is his inspection equivalent to and on precisely the same lines, as near as possible, and according to the same instructions, as are followed by the inspectors in the Education Department?—Exactly the same. He is assisted by the sub-inspector, Mr. Robertson.

8267. You get a grant in respect of education, do you?—Our headmaster gets a grant.

8268. Of how much?—£20 from the Education Department.

Lieut.
A. L. Scott.

15 Dec. 1894.

8269. You think that the results of this half-time educational system are eminently satisfactory?—Quite so.

8270. Now we come to the Educational Statistics. What are they?—They are as follows:—

STATE OF EDUCATION ON ADMISSION AND DISCHARGE.

Admissions.

Read and write very fairly (Standard 4),	10
„ fairly (Standard 3),	22
„ a little (Standard 2),	40
„ very little (Standard 1),	31
Neither read nor write, ('Infants'),	15

Total admitted, . . . 118

Discharges.

Read and write very well (Standard 6),	27
„ well (Standard 5),	45
„ very fairly (Standard 4),	30

„ Arithmetic, . . .	6

BALANCE OF BOYS' CASH ACCOUNT.

In hand, 1st January 1893, . . .	£27 19 2
Received during the year 1893, . . .	99 13 1½*
	£127 12 3½
Disbursed during the year 1893, . . .	93 12 7
In Head-schoolmaster's hands, 31st December, 1893, . . .	£33 19 8½

8271. It shows that among the discharges there were only 8 boys discharged under the third standard, and one of those discharged only having been six weeks in the ship when discharged on account of physical unfitness; and only 23 discharged under the fourth standard, whereas upwards of 80 all come in under the fourth standard, and 15 come in unable to read or write? That is practically the effect of it?—Yes.

8272. Turning now to the financial part of the matter. What is the cost of your ship?—It cost £7500 last year.

8273. And what did you receive from Government?—Out of that we received £6118 from Government grants.

8274. And the balance?—Well, the balance of £1400 odds was made up by £54 allowance received from Admiralty towards payment of instructor.

8275. And they only avail themselves of the services of the boys to the extent of three per annum?—Something like that.

8276. Well?—£38 towards cost of maintenance of 'voluntary' boys. We take these cases at £15 a year.

8277. At whose instance?—Oh, the parents make application to the committee, and we generally have two or three on board.

8278. Why do the parents?—Are they unruly?—Well, they are generally all boys in somewhat better positions, and do not come exactly under the clauses of the Act. No magistrate could be got to send them; but they are boys who won't attend school, and are beyond the control of their parents practically.

* This amount includes about £70 sent by boys' relatives and friends for their fares home during the summer holidays.

8279. Are not their friends afraid of contamination?—Well, I don't know.

8280. You have not got very much, you say, for them—only £38. That will be representing only two or three boys?—At present we have two or three, then we have income from investments £387.

8281. And you get a considerable number of grants from local authorities?—We get grants from counties and burghs of £312.

8282. Let us have the subscriptions and donations?—£484.

8283. Can you give us the counties and burghs contributing?—Yes; the Edinburgh Town Council £60.

8284. They have increased their grant?—Yes.

8285. Well?—Forfar County Council, £50. They formerly gave £100. Dundee, £20.

8286. Are these the only ones?—Oh no.

8287. I don't think more are mentioned here (page 7)?—I said Dundee gives £20.

8288. Yes; and how much the whole lot?—£312, 13s.

8289. That is, counties and burghs?—Yes.

8290. In respect of what do they give you that. I ask that because it is a very proper thing they should give you; but, I see you complain that Glasgow sends you a lot of boys, and then gives nothing?—Does not give anything.

8291. You don't, therefore, get these subscriptions from Edinburgh and Forfarshire, and so on, in respect of their right to send boys to you?—Well, partly we do. We don't take Glasgow boys if we can get other boys. If we were full, and they wanted to send from Edinburgh, we take them in preference to boys from Glasgow, which does not subscribe.

8292. You take the subscribing counties then first?—Yes.

8293. Is there any rule that regulates the sending of boys to your ship rather than to shore industries?—No, there is no rule; but we have tried to make the authorities see that the bigger boys fit for sea should be sent to the Mars in preference to shore schools.

8294. Take another point. What is your experience about the development of the boys on board the Mars? Is it superior to that obtained on shore?—Very much.

8295. Could your doctor give us any average increase of weight?—I am not sure. I think he could.

8296. You don't offer an opinion?—The Mars is a wonderful place for building up a boys' constitution.

8297. It is a capital thing, you say?—Yes.

8298. Is the moral effect good?—I think so.

8299. Is their sense of right and wrong increased with the boy's general health and development?—I think so. Certainly.

8300. Then do you happen to know at all how the percentage of 'relapsed' compares with that of Industrial Schools ashore? Can you show a cleaner sheet than they?—I don't think—I have not gone into comparison. I should not like to say.

8301. You acknowledge that 15 relapsed out of, I think, 300 boys?—Yes.

8302. About 5 per cent.?—Yes.

8303. Besides a large number that you lost sight of?—Yes.

8304. What machinery have you for tracing them?—We have an agency in Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Dundee, and twice a year we look up every boy and get his address and what he is doing; and, of course, we are obliged to make a Government return once a year on the subject. And they are very strict in checking us. For instance the name of any boy in prison who has been in the Mars goes to the Home Office, and they can put a check on it.

8305. And what do they do? If you had a disproportionately large number, do they threaten to suspend the certificate?—Oh, dear no.

Lieut. A. L. Scott. 8306. But you say they are very strict with you?—
I mean if we failed to report boys in prison.

15 Dec. 1894. 8307. And if they found too many boys from the Mars they would request to have explanation?—Yes, I suppose so.

8308. Have you had any mutinies, or any rows?—No, not of late years. In the early days of the ship we had.

8309. Since when were you free of that?—Well, the last serious thing was in 1883, when two or three of them broke into the cabin when my father was away and set fire to the ship. It was put out. That was the last serious thing.

8310. Why do these boys appear to have a tremendous mania for fire-raising?—It is only one or two of them. I think it is some sort of disease.

8311. But it is not confined to boys of that class?—No.

8312. You mention a case here. We had a case mentioned in Edinburgh, and I think there was a case at Aberdeen, and I think there was one on board a training ship in the Clyde?—Yes.

8313. I think if temptations are placed in their way to fire any place, any boy will do it. Now, about your maintaining discipline?—Well, in the first place we have a large and very competent staff, which I think is a great thing: they are always with the boys and understand them. They award very little punishment indeed.

8314. And when it comes to punishment?—Well, we generally punish them by giving them extra work to do—a bit of deck to scrub during play-hour.

8315. And more serious?—We use the tawse.

8316. On the hands?—Yes.

8317. Do you find that that is sufficient?—Quite.

8318. Do any of these boys who come—Are they boys who have been birched?—No.

8319. You know magistrates have power of birching instead of sending to prison?—I have never heard of any boys coming to us who have been birched.

8319A. (Professor Dove Wilson.) Boys are never birched except for conviction of theft, so you are practically quite right.

8320. (By the Chairman.) And you don't use corporal punishment beyond the tawse?—Oh no, and very little of that. In fact, the more you have the more you want, if people are continually licking boys.

8321. In connection with the industries on board, there is one maritime industry that I don't see mentioned in the report—the industry of fishing. Would it not be rather an appropriate one?—Well, I hardly know. Of course they do a lot of fishing in summer from the brig.

8322. But nothing in the way of a fisherman's life?—Oh no. I don't see how we could teach that as we are situated—up the river.

8323. But from the brig?—Oh yes, at one time we used to have a trawl, but that is rather an expensive thing, and the fishermen don't like it.

8324. You have nothing to do with reformatory boys?—Nothing whatever. Nor do we send any of them there. Some ships and some schools, when they cannot deal with the boys themselves, get them sent there; but that has not been done with us for the last 10 or 12 years.

8325. What is the rule about that?—We saw yesterday in the reformatory in Aberdeen two or three girls who had escaped from Industrial Schools. Have you had any escapes from the Mars?—Not since 18 months.

8326. And before that?—The only time that the boys abscond—they never do so from the ship, but we give them leave to go home once a year. Those who have anything in the way of a decent home go for four days. Sometimes some of them fail to return.

8327. Four days in a year. That is much more than the shore reformatory children get. Is it the same as the Industrial School children get?—I don't know what the arrangements are in the shore schools, but the Government grant ceases after four days.

8328. Then take a Glasgow boy. Who pays his way there and back?—His people do.

Lieut. A. L. Scott. 8329. And if his people don't choose to send money for his return railway-ticket would you give him leave?—Oh no.

8330. Can he take four days in the lump?—Oh yes, once a year.

8331. What is the favourite season?—We give them leave directly after the Government Inspection in June.

8332. The season that most would like would be about the New Year?—Yes.

8333. And you would not give them leave then?—Oh no; not at all. It is not good to have them about the streets at that time.

8334. How many training ships are there in Scotland?—Two—the Mars, and the Empress in the Clyde.

8335. This is the only training ship you have had any experience of?—Yes.

8336. There has been suggested training ships in the west Highland district among the hillmen?—Industrial training ships?

8337. Well, training ships I presume—(Dr. Sutherland.) As feeders to the navy.

8338. (By the Chairman.) Are these training ships not certified Industrial Schools?—Oh yes. There is the naval training ship at Queensferry, the Caledonia. She takes boys for the navy. That is entirely different.

8339. Do all her boys pass into the navy?—They are in the navy when they go to her. She is not a very great success in the way of collecting boys. She has been established for three or four years, and I don't think they have many Scottish boys on board.

8340. All your boys are Scottish?—Yes.

8341. (By Miss Stevenson.) You said you never take children under the 16th section of the Act because of the Government grant?—I said we seldom take them.

8342. As a matter of fact you used to get a great many Edinburgh School Board cases, who were sent under both sections?—Yes.

8343. Those boys had never been before the Police Court at all, but were sent from the Burgh Court simply as incorrigible and not under proper guardianship?—Yes; I expect the School Board made up the difference.

8344. No; the Government simply accepted the combination of the two sections. That has been altered two years ago, and consequently you have had very few of our School Board cases?—Yes, that is so.

8345. You spoke of the physical condition of the boys being superior. As a matter of fact you require them to be of certain physical development before you take them?—Oh yes.

8346. You have a standard of height?—Yes.

8347. Before you take them in at all?—Yes.

8348. So, consequently, they are naturally superior to shore boys?—Oh yes.

8349. And you find that parents who would object very much to boys going to the ordinary Industrial Schools do not object to them going to the Mars?—I think the Mars is rather favoured among the parents, and it is not looked upon in the same way as a kind of penal punishment.

8350. That is the idea?—Yes, I think that is the idea.

8351. In regard to your supervision over the boys, it is a recent amendment of the Industrial Schools' Act, which gives you supervision up till the age of 18?—That is given out this year.

8352. I was asking in regard to your supervision over those boys. You have that under the recent amendment of the Industrial Schools' Act?—Yes, up till 18; but it has just come into force. At least I am not sure whether it is passed into law, but it only affects those who come now. Those who came before, it cannot touch them.

8353. Will you tell the committee what power that gives you?—Well, I cannot tell the committee yet, because I am not certain the thing has been passed into law. I have no official instruction on the matter.

- Lieut. A. L. Scott.* 8354. Then your ship is really doing preventive work?—Oh yes.
- 15 Dec. 1894.* 8355. And the boys who come to you, although they have been before the Police Court, possibly for petty offences, you take them in really as if they had a perfectly clean record?—That is so.
8356. (By Dr. Sutherland.) As a naval officer you are quite aware there is a dearth of sailors in the navy?—Yes.
8357. Is there no possibility of getting a number of those boys in the Mars drafted into the navy if some relaxation of the rigid rules of the naval service were made in their favour?—Well, a great many don't care about going to the navy. Up here there is a prejudice against it. The parents object to the boys going to sea, and there is a pretty strong objection against the navy.
8358. But, seeing there is such a dearth of sailors in the navy, don't you think these rigid regulations might be relaxed in favour of the Mars boys?—I don't think that they would relax in this matter. They are very particular about boys going to the navy.
8359. You say there is also a dearth of sailors in the Mercantile Marine owing to the influx of foreign sailors?—Yes.
8360. What powers of detention have you over boys sent by parents or guardians without coming before a court?—Well, we have practically none.
8361. Suppose a boy wished to go?—We would have to let him go.
8362. During your period of office, and with your intimate knowledge of the Mars for many years, how many gipsy boys have you known to be detained on the ship?—We have only had the experience of one boy; but I have no particulars of the case.
8363. Was he a success?—No; not a great success.
8364. Do you recollect a case, in the time of your father, of a boy who was sent to Portsmouth, and who, Lieut. A. L. Scott. no sooner than he got his foot on shore after a year's cruise, ran away?—No.
- 15 Dec. 1894.* 8365. (By Dr. Farquharson.) At what physical point are your boys found unable to pass the naval examination?—Not big enough, as a rule.
8366. Chest measurement?—Well, they come a little bit under in both chest and height measurement.
8367. Bearing on their health?—Oh yes, generally.
8368. (By the Chairman.) Supposing a boy leaves at 16 and goes into the merchant service, what status does he go under?—Many go as ordinary seamen; of course some of them are not so big, and go as boys.
8369. Would such a boy soon be shipped as an A.B.?—Oh yes.
8370. In what time?—I cannot tell. I must tell you the greater number of our boys go in Norwegian vessels than in British vessels.
8371. How do they get on in them?—They get on very well indeed. We have been making inquiry as to that, very few of our boys go away from Scottish ports. They don't care about taking them. We send them to Cardiff, where we have a shipping agent, and they are generally shipped into Norwegian or German vessels, and the result of our inquiry at Cardiff was, that the officers and men, in these Scandinavian vessels are a very superior class—better vessels, and the boys get better food, and are better treated, and they all speak English.
8372. What—the Norwegians?—Yes.
8373. Do they give commands in English?—Yes.
8374. About the Germans?—I don't know about the Germans speaking English.
8375. You don't give them any instructions in the ordinary nautical colloquialism?—No, we have never done that.

Rev. Father Holder.

The REV. FATHER HOLDER, called in and examined.

Rev. Father Holder.

8376. (By the Chairman.) Have you been long in Dundee?—For 24 years, with the exception of 10 months I was in Perth.

8377. And I suppose you are very well acquainted with a number of the Dundee population?—Pretty well.

8378. Have you had much work among the poor?—I may say my work has nearly, the larger part—considerably the larger part—been amongst the poor people in this community.

8379. You have an opportunity, which very few men have, of knowing the feelings—the moving feelings—of persons who have been punished by short imprisonment?—I think I have.

8380. Do you find the terror of short imprisonment soon wears off?—I don't think it has any, and, I dare say, that it is safe to say that that has been amply confirmed by the experience I had during the 10 months I was in charge at Perth. I found that short sentences, especially for drunkenness and those many crimes that come from drunken habits, have very little effect.

8381. Of course, it is perfectly evident that if a man is convicted repeatedly for assault, for disorderly conduct, and for breach of the peace, such crimes are committed when he is drunk?—Yes.

8382. Subject, of course, to certain exceptions?—Quite so.

8383. But it is asserted on the one hand and rather questioned on the other, as to whether there is much connection between petty thefts and drunkenness. What is your experience?—I don't think that there is.

8384. You don't think that people who are repeatedly ———?—I think that petty thefts occur—are committed by persons under the influence of liquor, but I have generally found that the offences had been committed—well, through thoughtlessness, through joking chiefly, at the time; and my experience has been that persons under the influence of drink guilty of petty thefts are astonished when they hear what they had done.

8385. I suppose those persons were often convicted all the same?—Yes.

8386. Now, with regard to the effect of long and short sentences. You have been in Perth, and therefore you have seen all sorts of sentences up to a couple of years. You have seen a good deal of the habitual offender class, and I have no doubt you have come across facts?—Yes.

8387. Do you find long sentences are more deterrent, or more dreaded by those people than the short sentences? Or do they become accustomed also to the long sentences?—A good many ex-convicts become almost resigned to long sentences, and I consider that these long sentences with a certain class have no deterrent effect, or very little.

8388. I suppose you are often applied to to help the people to get work?—We want very much an organisation—a larger organisation for them than what we know, as the Prison Aid Society, to help convicts when they finish their sentences.

8389. Not merely convicts?—Well, prisoners.

8390. I suppose you find very few people sufficiently unprejudiced who would be willing to receive them?—Very few.

8391. What reformatory institutions are you connected with?—In this diocese, I am sorry to say, we have none.

8392. But when I speak of reformatories I don't mean in the technical sense of the word?—Oh, agencies for reformation?

8393. Yes?—Well, we have none except our own church influences.

8394. Have you any sisterhoods?—Yes, but they don't undertake that kind of work. They undertake teaching in our schools and visiting the sick. They propose now—in fact, they have formed the nucleus of what is called a 'House of Mercy' for the gathering up of girls who might stray from the path of duty, and of training them as servants. This is in its first stage, because the sisters had not such a response until quite recently that would permit of this.

Rev. Father
Holder.

15 Dec. 1894.

8395. Of course they have had no experience of that yet?—No; it has not been in operation sufficiently long.

8396. You were talking about the Prison Aid Society, are you connected with it?—No; we have no branch of it ourselves.

8397. Do you work in connection with it? Of course, it is not a denominational concern at all?—I have always taken an interest in the work, and the meetings, and so forth. I have sometimes been present at the annual meeting here.

8398. What are your temperance organisations here?—We have what are called chiefly the 'League of the Cross.'

8399. That try to get as many people to take the pledge, and keep it, as possible?—Yes; and what I don't consider here, nor anywhere else, nor in any other temperance association, a very potent factor in the way of reclaiming drunkards at all. As far as I know, temperance societies are gatherings of men and women who do not require to join temperance societies at all, because these societies are made up of people who could be trusted to take their glass of beer or wine, and they band themselves together. They pledge themselves to abstain from what, I daresay, they call intoxicants, in order to be a good example to others. They spend large sums of money. I know in Glasgow of one temperance society spending in weekly or monthly donations such a sum as bought for themselves a large hall, which they manage themselves;—and the director—the clergyman—in charge of it said it was one of the most flourishing in the west of Scotland. But a society composed nearly altogether of men—very good fellows—who don't require to take any pledge themselves, and who made these weekly or monthly sacrifices in order that they might reclaim perhaps ten, or a dozen, or twenty say, drunkards, and those when reclaimed wanting habitual watching over.

8400. Then you don't think that in Dundee the work of your temperance societies goes far to reclaim drunkards?—No.

8401. What is your idea about the reclamation of the drunkard, and remember we are not confined to drunkenness. We are dealing with all sorts of habitual offenders?—I consider that habitual drunkards should be treated pretty well on the same level as we treat young people who are beginning to tread the path of evil, and confine them in reformatories or temperance retreats or something of that kind.

8402. You would do that with those who come into the hands of the police, and would you extend it to those who don't?—Yes, after being properly certified of course.

8403. Well, there are different questions in connection with that. What would you think would be the best basis of definition of habitual drunkards? The number of convictions?—I believe that in police circles a man who has been convicted twice of an offence within a year is considered an habitual offender. Well, I don't think I would go quite so far as that. I would narrow down the distinction. I would not describe as a habitual offender one found guilty twice in a year of the same offence, but, if a man, I think, was found and taken up for drunkenness four times in a year, and especially if this went over a few years, I should certainly hold him to be a habitual drunkard.

8404. Then about the finances—the maintenance of such reformatories. Would you have them supported entirely?—I should think that the maintenance of such institutions should fall to a large extent upon the local authorities, but also pretty largely subsidised by Government.

8405. Among the female habitual offenders that you come across, what do they chiefly work at?—Nearly all millworkers; but, unfortunately, those of them who do go in for drink spend a very large amount of their hard-earned wages on Saturday afternoons in drink.

8406. And, I suppose, a number are leading unchaste lives?—Not, I think, of workers.

8407. No?—There is a distinction.

8408. Between the female who has been convicted four times in a year of offences more or less connected with drunkenness?—It is hardly possible.

8409. And the probability is that she is spoken of as a loose character?—Not of the millworker. In fact, the words used very often here are 'she is not working, 'Father,' which means that she has gone to the street.

8410. Well, I asked you about the occupations of the habitual female offenders because we want some light on how to employ them?—I don't think that largely, at all events, those who are working are immoral.

8411. I thought that even if they had been convicted for prostitution they must have started life with some industrial training in the majority of cases, and the practical question that we want light on is whether that industrial training which they might have received previous to their convictions for drunkenness or petty offences could be utilised in case of detention for a period. Do you think it could? Are there a sufficient number of them working at one class of work so as to enable their work to be organised?—In Dundee nearly all our workers are female workers. The vast majority are working in factories and mills.

8412. At the same class of work?—At the same class of work, or very nearly so—so much so that I cannot very well distinguish it. Their hours are the same, and they are mixed together in their work in the same way.

8413. And, I suppose, the different grades of the work they have to go through are much the same?—Yes; the low and the high mill and factory.

8414. You must meet a large number of cases of domestic misery mostly caused by habitual drunkenness, which never come into the hands of the police?—Very many.

8415. What is your idea of that?—The majority of the cases of habitual drunkards I come across don't get into the hands of the police at all, and some of the most miserable cases.

8416. If you had your reformatory ———?—If I had a reformatory I would try to get such cases, first, well authenticated, well certified, and I would deal with them just in the same way—as the offence is the same in itself, and the havoc wrought in the family is the same—as the public ones who come before the police.

8417. At whose initiative?—The initiative in the first place—the representation—of their own friends.

8418. Take the case of a married man who is an habitual drunkard, whose earnings are trifling, whose wife can barely support herself, but whose husband adds something to the domestic income, the wife would be the proper person to take the initiative here?—Yes.

8419. Would she do so, according to your experience?—I don't think so.

8420. Would you care to take the initiative yourself?—It would be a hard thing, in a sense, to do; but there are cases in which I would not hesitate to do it.

8421. You then would think it proper that a member of the public should give information?—Yes.

8422. So as to set the proper authorities in motion, in the same way as you saw a man taking your boots?—Yes.

8423. And we propose that the funds which should support him should support a man sent to this house of reform?—Yes.

8424. And, I presume, the wife would fall into the same position as if the husband were dead, or sent to a lunatic asylum?—Yes.

8425. That is to say the same authorities liable in the one case would be liable in the other?—Yes.

8426. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Do you come across workmen at times who try hard to keep sober, but, notwithstanding, every now and again break out and get very drunk?—Yes.

8427. For days at a time?—Yes.

Rev. Father
Holder.

15 Dec. 1894.

8428. What do you think would be the effect of sentencing such a workman to imprisonment for that?—I don't think it would have a good effect. You mean a skilled workman?

8429. Yes. A workman who tries his best to keep sober, and often breaks it. Would it do him any good to send him to prison?—I don't think so. If it was a case where a man broke it now and again I think imprisonment instead of having a good effect would have the reverse.

8430. Might not such a case occur as often as four times a year?—Yes, it might.

8431. Do you think there is any case in which a sentence of imprisonment would do any good in the case of a man simply drinking?—In carrying on drinking, for a lengthened period, do you mean?

8432. Yes—whether you could cure him or do any good by sentencing now and then to imprisonment?—Well, I think that the imprisonment would have the effect of taking his appetite away from this drink. It would have a reforming effect upon him.

8433. Some witnesses have suggested that a short imprisonment simply sends him out thirsting for more drink?—A short sentence?

8434. Yes. What is your experience about that?—If it was a short sentence of a few days or such a period as would not break his appetite away from drink I should think it would have that effect.

8435. (By Dr. Farquharson.) I think you said that after prolonged periods of prison detention they get hardened to prison life?—Yes.

8436. Is it because they make them too comfortable in prison?—It is because they have entirely lost all self-respect to begin with. They find it hard to get any kind of employment, and they believe that their prison life is preferable to living here altogether homeless.

8437. And without any kind of means of support, in fact, they look upon prison as a home?—Yes, as a home. I knew of one woman in the Perth Penitentiary who had been 33 years in prison 'doing,' as they say, different sentences. After very great difficulty I got her brother, who is a pensioner, to take her and give her another trial. She was back again in less than two months. I had sent her out, as I thought, entirely reformed.

8438. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you find drunkenness more common among women than among men?—Yes.

8441. (By Col. M'Hardy.) About the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society, you said that in some way its action should be improved. Would you suggest in what way?—Well, at present the Prisoners' Aid Society is composed of a small number, proportionally at all events, of philanthropically-inclined persons. I don't understand that these Prison Aid Societies are subsidised in any way by Government, but are only kept up or are enabled to do what little work they do achieve by private subscriptions. Here in Dundee the Prison Aid Society commands a small income in comparison to the number of discharged prisoners who are thrown into the community.

8442. Do you mean discharged prisoners or convicts?—Well, here, both come under the same head. The Prison Aid Society takes in convicts as well as those who have been prisoners for short periods.

8443. Yes; but the Prison Aid Society, if it is certified by the Secretary for Scotland, has its funds supplemented by the state. You are aware of that, I suppose?—I was not.

8444. But in what way—is it the smallness of the society or the want of funds that requires to be improved?—I understand it is the smallness of the funds that cripples the service of the society in setting these discharged prisoners upon their feet.

8445. Have cases been brought to your notice?—Yes, cases where convicts, for instance, have, on leaving prison, applied to the Prison Aid Society, and have been furnished only with a supply of tickets for food at coffee houses, without getting any kind of safe lodging for them; and the consequence has been that they very soon fall into former companionships, and, as a result, into the hands of the police.

8446. You would have the society find them lodgings after they are discharged from prison?—If possible.

8447. You are aware that scarcely a convict leaves prison without, at least, a couple of pounds, unless very bad?—I am aware of that.

8448. And that women have generally £4 at their disposal?—Yes.

8449. But you would still augment these means?—I should have free control of it.

8450. That is the present system, that the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society takes charge of this money, and I don't see, having regard to facts, what you would desire to have. Would you give larger sums of money for their support in life, or what?—I scarcely know what to suggest, but I know the difficulty that convicts do find, is in getting the proper lodgings here.

8451. The idea of putting up a home or homes for returned convicts could never be thought of?—It would not work at all.

8452. The number would not warrant it?—No.

8453. (By the Chairman.) You have seen a lot of convicts I suppose, when dismissed?—Yes.

8455. Is the first they do generally to get a glass, and possibly several?—Very often that happens. I recollect, when I was in Perth, of a girl who belonged to Glasgow, who had a long sentence—of I think about nine years. When she went out she told me that, after the long confinement, she felt, almost before she walked across the Inch, that the very scent of the fresh air and fresh grass nearly intoxicated her. She got into the hands of old companions at the station, and when at Stirling she got into the hands of the police.

8456. We have heard that liquor is forced on prisoners?—Yes, very often, as they are leaving prison.

8457. In Edinburgh we saw Canon Donlevy, who gave us a very interesting account of his work; and he mentioned one case, which was described to us by the Parochial Authorities as a terribly bad and typical, of a woman living between prison and workhouse. He met her in prison, and he told us he had sent her to the country, and she kept straight for six months, and he appeared to be in the habit of taking great pains with those people in the way of their reclamation. Have you had much of that sort of work?—I have had a good deal.

8458. In Perth?—No, here, when they come home from Perth. I find it is very hard to keep them straight.

8459. Have you any machinery for getting them sent to the country?—No.

8460. Your church has no organisation?—Not for that.

8461. For instance, Canon Donlevy might apply to you?—Well, he has never done so.

8462. But anything that was done would be by personal friendship and effort?—Yes.

8463. (By Col. M'Hardy.) But there is a considerable amount of correspondence that takes place between Roman Catholic clergymen attached to prisons in regard to prisoners?—Oh yes. I had a good deal when I was in Perth, but since leaving I have had very little except through the visiting clergyman in Perth waiting to get suitable lodgings for girls coming here after leaving Perth. [Witness then withdrew.]

15 Dec. 1894.

The Rev. DAVID MACRAE, accompanied by Mr. JAMES THOMSON, Solicitor, called in and examined.

8464. (By the Chairman.) We have had distributed to us this paper (see Appendix) containing an account of what purports to be the experience of the committee, of which you and Mr. Thomson were members, when investigating the 'Tyson drink cure'?—Yes.

8465. You have signed this?—Yes.

8466. Is it correct? Are the statements contained in this paper correct?—Yes, they are correct. All the members of the committee were not always present, and certain cases were better known to individual members of the committee than to others; but the committee were able to issue that and put their names to it. I was not present at the final meeting, but the one clause to which I attach vital importance is the one towards the end of this report, referring to the time test. I held from the first that this was not, and could not be a cure for drunkenness, which becomes a moral as well as a physical disease, but we watched its influence on the drink crave so long as we had the patients under our treatment.

8467. Tell us briefly about the nature of the circumstances in which the committee was originated and started?—Mr. Thomson will perhaps correct me if I forget any point, but the templars in Dundee suggested this experiment, having seen reports of it. A local committee was appointed. Mr. Stephens, the Tyson agent in London, came down to conduct the experiment, and those members whose names are given in the circular here made a point of being present as fully as possible, morning and evening, to see the medicine administered.

8468. How was it administered?—Mr. Stephens had a bottle for each patient mixed up, bearing the patient's name. A dose was given out of the bottle, then the bottle was given to the patient to take away with him, with particular instructions to hourly take another dose, he having the graduated measure along with him to see that he took the right quantity.

8469. It was drunken?—Yes.

8470. Its composition, I suppose, was a secret?—It is. But we all tasted it.

8471. You selected your men in the first place?—Yes. Some very bad cases.

8472. I have looked over the cases, and I don't see any reference to convictions for drunkenness, or any criminal record?—(Mr. Thomson.) We did not have that in view. So far as I am aware, none of those had ever been convicted.

8473. Because a good, typical, chronic habitual is pretty certain to have gone through the mill of the Police Court?—(Mr. Thomson.) We have not that in view in the selection of the cases.

8474. How did you get your cases?—(Mr. Thomson.) By philanthropic agencies in the town.

8475. And the cases were all sufficiently bad to —?—(Mr. Thomson.) We found after we started that one or two of the cases were not so bad as we would have liked.

8476. But these are the worst?—(Mr. Thomson.) Yes.

8477. No. 5—male, aged 30, has been drinking for 22 years?—(Mr. Thomson.) He was moving about among liquor sellers, and they gave it to him when about eight years of age.

8478. I have no doubt that Mr. Macrae and the other members of the committee were thoroughly able to satisfy themselves as to the cases being good?—(Mr. Macrae.) Some much more aggravated than others. —(Mr. Thomson.) We were told they were very bad cases.

8479. You spoke about the importance of the test. Roughly speaking, the result was this, that, after the commencement of the treatment, the drink crave, according to the statement of the patients, disappeared in some cases at once, and in some cases within a few days; that sleep was restored, that the functions of nutrition were resumed, the appetite got natural, and sometimes almost more than natural, and that, in the course of a short time, the people appeared to be in the main completely restored; and that a nausea to tobacco appears to be engendered in certain cases, as well as to drink. Now, Mr. Macrae, as to the time-test? Would you please read the paragraph?—(Mr. Macrae.) 'That judged by the results of this public test, as applied to all the cases taken in hand, comprehending individuals from all parts of Dundee and Broughty Ferry, the committee feel constrained to admit that the scepticism with which they approached this test has entirely disappeared, and that the statements made in print by Dr. Tyson are fully justified up to the close of the treatment, and they will endeavour to ascertain whether the benefits already received by the patients will prove permanent, which is a most vital point.' You, therefore, understand that our testimony here is entirely to the effect of the treatment during its continuance.

8480. Exactly. Before you go further, the experiment was begun on 5th January, and the date of your report was 2nd February?—Yes. (Mr. Thomson.) The test lasted for 3 weeks.

8481. And then you had a week to consider?—Yes.

8482. Have you followed up the cases?—We have, to a certain extent. That is to say, we had two meetings—social meetings with the patients—that we might see them and ask them to give their experience; and it was proposed at the last that we should have another such meeting after a year had elapsed; but so many of the cases have gone back to drinking, that it remains questionable whether it will be necessary, although it would be interesting, to find out from themselves what explanation they can give. For instance, at one of those meetings, one of the patients when asked to report said he had come frankly to say that he had gone back to drink. I asked 'did the crave return?' He said 'No, but I wanted to get back to my old associates in the public-house; and so he had.'

8483. I think you had 17?—(Mr. Thomson.) We had 19 really, but 20 started at the same time as the others.

8484. And, I suppose, the other two —?—We had 19 altogether, but two or three ceased taking the medicine after five or six days, really not wanting to be cured.

8485. What was the result? You had 19 altogether. How many fell out?—Out of those 19 cases we find that 15 had lapsed, and 4 continued firm up to 11th October. We had a committee meeting then.

8486. That is from the beginning of January to the 11th October?—Yes; and of those 15 at that meeting the different members who knew the parties reported that in no case had the lapses been due to a return to the craving.

8487. You had 19 to start with. How many dropped out?—One of them dropped out, but told it afterwards.

8488. You said three, I think?—One or two dropped out. (Mr. Macrae.) Two were struck out, I think, because it was found they were trifling with it.

8489. And that reduces them to 17 bond fide experiments?—(Mr. Macrae.) Yes. (Mr. Thomson.) There were one or two others we tried, not as test cases, in order that they might get the benefit of the medicine. We have had 19 altogether in hand on whom we can report; of those 15 had lapsed by 11th October.

8490. What do you call lapsed?—(Mr. Thomson.) Gone back to drink.

8491. Do you mean one or two drunks or habituals?—They all stated, I believe, that in no case had they gone back because of the return of the crave, but because they wished to join old friends.

8492. Yes; but a man in order to join his old associates did not require to drink a bottle of whisky a day. It must be rather expensive. Here is the case of a teacher—'male, aged 52; been drinking for 20 years—whisky, as much as he could get. Sometimes for six months on end would drink one or two bottles of whisky a day; had periodical bouts and once delirium tremens.' That must be a very costly thing?—(Mr. Thomson.) That man has stood firm, I believe. (Mr. Macrae.) He was not one of those who spoke about 'sociality.' He seemed more to be a 'solitary.'—(Mr. Thomson.) We have had no further report submitted to us about him.

8493. I was talking about the cost. That would be 8s. or 3s. 6d. a day!—(Mr. Thomson.) I don't know where he got the money.

8494. (By Dr. Sutherland.) It is his own statement?—(Mr. Macrae.) We had to depend for many of those statements on the accuracy of a man's own words.

8495. (By the Chairman.) You have not heard anything of the 4 since the 11th October?—(Mr. Thomson.)—No.

8496. Were the 15 manifestly improved?—(Mr. Thomson.) Distinctly. One of them had a very bloated appearance.

8497. Yes; but at the 11th October. The ones that had lapsed at the time, were they like the 'dog returning to his vomit, and the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire;' or in a less disagreeable scale?—(Mr. Macrae.) As far as I knew the cases personally, it simply means going back to old ways, which did not mean constant drinking in all cases, but periodic bursts of it.

8498. In the case of a periodic burst it is difficult to say there was any cure until the periodic burst becomes due again?—(Mr. Macrae.) I will mention a case not in here, that I took a special interest in, and that perhaps tests better than anything here what the value of this so-called cure is. It is the case of one who has gone professedly three times through this treatment—a man of very sensitive organisation, of great ability—and he was taken at a time when he was not drinking heavily, and therefore it was not so manifest; but after he lapsed I got a hold of him and wired to London for a fresh supply of the medicine, and while his wife said that when once he began there was no stopping for some time, we no sooner began this with him than immediately he was 'picked up,' and the tendency to drink more seemed for the time to be destroyed. So that it was some three months after before he had another return to the craving.

8499. For three times professedly he has gone there, because we have to trust to this man taking hourly medicine; and therefore a Tyson agent might say, 'You cannot say this is unsatisfactory, because,' he could say, 'you did not see the medicine administered 'hour by hour'?'—(Mr. Macrae.) We could only see it administered twice a day. They declared they took it, and the result, for the time being, led us to believe they were going on faithfully with it. In the case of this man, I could not be sure that he went through the 21 days' treatment regularly 12 hours a day.

8500. When you tried it yourselves, how far did you go with it?—We merely took a dose to taste it.

8501. But you did not have—any member—sufficient self-sacrifice to see its effect?—Its effect in all cases was good, as far as we saw.

8503. Is this the same as what is called the 'gold' cure?—(Mr. Macrae.) No.

8504. There is one cure in which the medicine is administered by injection?—That is still another one, and I may mention that this same case that I referred to had already gone through this metabolic treatment in Glasgow.

8505. With what result?—He said it had cured him, but we found it had not, so far as indicated by his after conduct. But the distinction in our mind that had to be kept in view was this—the difference between its influence on the crave and curing drunkenness. I have always maintained that no physical treatment will cure drunkenness, which is the result of mental association and habits, and when it becomes a disease you may cure the drink crave, but, the man can recreate the craving just as a man who has no appetite produces it at first by the same process.

8506. Had you any women among this lot?—(Mr. Thomson.) We had. We had 5 out of this 19.

8507. Well, this woman—No. 4—has been in an inebriate home in Scotland?—I believe so.

8508. Where?—I forget where.

8509. Has she lapsed?—She has lapsed.

8510. How many women were in the lot?—Five.

8511. What was their results. Mention what the four who have kept steady were?—There was one woman out of these four.

8512. And you had five?—Yes.

8513. You have mentioned these other cures. Have you had any experience of them?—(Mr. Macrae.) The only case of metabolic treatment is the one I have referred to. The Keeley cure, so-called, I have known a few cases of, but two or three I know of were entirely unsatisfactory. One man declared that the money had been mis-spent, because it had not done him any good.

8514. Did Dr. Tyson & Coy.'s agent say—did you ask him as to whether this medicine should be administered in any other way than by the mouth? Does he propose, in dealing with habitual drunkards, to have them march up and give them their dose under supervision?—He would prefer that. If he could get access, for instance, to a home where the medicine could be administered regularly, he believes he could empty all these places in the country through it.

8515. But has he tried that himself?—He has got no opportunity, he says. (Mr. Thomson.) They refused (one or two homes) to allow him.

8516. You allowed your 17 to carry on the cure at home?—(Mr. Thomson.) Because we could not get people to look after them. (Mr. Macrae.) They were engaged at different parts of the town. (Mr. Thomson.) Every one of them was working.

8517. It did not prevent their working?—(Mr. Thomson.) No; because they took the medicine in a small bottle with them, and took it every hour.

8518. I think you have told us that the nature of the cure is a secret?—(Mr. Thomson.) Yes.

8519. What about the cost?—(Mr. Macrae.) It is pretty costly. It was charged £10. That is for 21 days' treatment. Then Dr. Tyson himself, too, went to Glasgow, and between him and Mr. Stephens there have been legal quarrels; but Dr. Tyson came across from America to Glasgow.

8520. Where does he hail from? Somewhere in Philadelphia, is it not?—And began treating persons there, and they got a few test cases. He wrote me to go and see them. I went afterwards, and saw some of the patients, and also inquired at Mr. Oates of the Young Men's Christian Association, as to their experience—how the patients were standing there, as compared with the Dundee ones. Tyson charged just £5, and then his Belfast agent sent a circular round offering to supply for £2, so it struck me that very possibly the medicine itself might be a thing of not much commercial value, though not necessarily of less practical value.

8521. But you don't imagine that Tyson would let his agent in Belfast know the composition of his medicine?—(Mr. Thomson.) His London agent knows the composition. He told me so.

8522. And he has a law-suit. About what?—(Mr. Macrae.) He bought the monopoly for what he called 'England,' and, whether it was owing to the fact that he thought England included Scotland and Ireland, I don't know, but when he found that the agent in Belfast was at work he took action against him and the judges decreed in his favour so far as that specific action was concerned. Then he told me he was to take action if necessary against Tyson.

8523. To keep up the monopoly?—Yes. (Mr. Thomson.) He is willing to sell at reduced terms to working people, but that he could make his own terms.

(Mr. Macrae.) Yes, and repay himself for the large outlay which he had made, or agreed to make.

8524. You say at the commencement of this circular that this has been tried at Birmingham and Belfast. Do you know anything about the results or alleged results of these trials?—(Mr. Thomson.) We don't know the Birmingham results. (Mr. Macrae.) We only got reports referring to the time during which the treatment lasted.

8525. Were the reports the same as yours?—(Mr. Macrae.) Yes. (Mr. Thomson.) Quite as favourable as ours.

8526. Was it the Birmingham cases in which Mr. Stead was concerned?—(Mr. Macrae.) Of that I am not certain.—(Mr. Thomson.) It was a different cure, I think.

8527. Have you looked into the literature and claims of those other cases—the gold and the metabolic?—(Mr. Macrae.) Yes, but only the advertising sheets, and so forth.

8528. As to the results, what is your idea of the value of the results from an anti-drunken point of view?—(Mr. Macrae.) I think that this treatment undoubtedly destroyed in most cases the craving for the time being.

8529. But how long—supposing a person to be in a home and not exposed to the temptations of society—would that effect last?—We are not in a position to say; but as a cure for drunkenness I don't think it to be deserving of the name. What goes to create drunkenness is still at work in society, and the man cured of the crave goes out and cannot even go to a Town Council banquet, or any place where there is drink, but the old temptations are there, and though the craving may be for the time destroyed, the old associations which I think go deeper than even the physical crave reassert themselves and draw him back into the old drunken habits.

8530. Did the four who had not lapsed go into the experiment with a violent desire to be cured?—(Mr. Thomson.) Every one of the 19 test cases said so; but we have reason to disbelieve that statement.

8531. Did you say that some after being cured wished to get back?—Yes.

8532. What you said, Mr. Macrae, would apply to cases treated by prolonged seclusion when they get out unless they become total abstainers?—Precisely.

8533. And lead to breaking their pledges, unless they were determined not to do so?—Yes, unless there is determination—a certain amount of moral power, and will left, and an honest desire to escape. I don't think that anything will cure so long as the conditions of society remain as they are—I mean with temptations to drinking.

8536. Well, I suppose from your experience, it is something to get a drunkard held right for even three months?—Oh, yes.

8536A. (Professor Dove Wilson.) Except that it would cost £40 a year.

8537. (By the Chairman.) Well, but you say that Tyson's agent is willing to supply the thing cheaper?—(Mr. Thomson.) Yes.

8538. Which you did pay?—No. It was entirely free.

8539. Have you been applied to by working men?—I have had at least 50 or 60 applications from all parts of the country.

8540. And you know the terms. Is it brought within the range of working men's finances?—Well, if a temperance society recommends a bond fide case where the party is not able to pay £5 or £6, they will supply it for £2 or £3.

8541. Are you an abstainer yourself?—I have practically been a total abstainer all my life.

8542. Are you acquainted with temperance organisations?—Yes. I am a member of the Free Church General Assembly's Committee and of the Dundee Presbytery Committee on temperance.

8543. Are you a good temperer?—I am a blue ribbon member.

8545. Has she been put there?—I have not heard since.

8546. You didn't advise the Tyson cure for her?—No.

8547. Why?—Well, I didn't think of it at the time.

8548. Would not that be a far better thing than imprisoning her?—Well, he wished to give her a lesson. But she would not have taken the medicine; she did not want to be cured.

8549. As a temperance worker I am certain Mr. Macrae has come across numbers of working-class families where you have got the wife, and specially doing exactly what you have described—pawns everything, and drinks, and is an habitual drunkard. Have you a temperance organisation availing itself of this offer of cheap medicine for any of those cases, and if so, with what results?—(Mr. Thomson.) The difficulty, of course, is that these people will not take the medicine. They are not willing to be cured, and it cannot be supplied against their will.

8550. Had you any medical men on your committee?—No; none would agree to serve on the committee.

8551. There was no suggestion made as to administration by injection?—No.

8552. Which could be done without consulting the patients?—Mr. Stephens said the medicine could not be given without the knowledge of the patients.

8553. He did not recommend it to be given in food?—No.

8554. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Had any members of the committee any personal knowledge of the habits of these men experimented on?—(Mr. Macrae.) Some of them had.

8555. Sufficient to make you think they were good subjects for this?—Decidedly.

8557. That they lapsed pretty quickly after the termination of the so-called cure?—(Mr. Thomson.) I suppose six weeks.

8558. Would you think that effect of the remedy was a sort of mental—a sort of mesmeric?—(Mr. Thomson.) No; certainly not. (Mr. Macrae.) Excepting that the mere fact that they were daily under the eyes of the committee, and were taking this medicine, would no doubt have a mental influence.

8559. (By the Chairman.) Did you try it on a moderate drinker?—(Mr. Macrae.) Yes. (Mr. Thomson.) And he has become a total abstainer. (Dr. Sutherland.) He was all right before.

8560. (By the Chairman.) I am speaking of what

Rev. David
Macrae and
Mr. James
Thomson.

15 Dec. 1894.

is technically called the 'moderate drinker.' Did you try it on any man of that sort? You say here that one patient 'who had been forty years addicted 'to drink, and took seven glasses of whisky per day 'during his bouts, after treatment said "he did not like 'the smell of it." Did it occur to you to ask some respectable person, who did not happen to be an abstainer, but who took a glass of toddy, to see whether his toddy would taste like vinegar, or whether he would come to dislike it?—(Mr. Macrae.) We did not make that experiment; and would have very probably found difficulty in getting one to take this for 21 days—I mean a moderate man drinking a little daily and liking it, that it would be very difficult to get that man to make the experiment.

8561. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Were there any moderate drinkers on the committee, or were they all teetotallers?—(Mr. Thomson.) I think they were all teetotallers. (Mr. Macrae.) There were others invited, but they did not act.

8562. Did you see the doses administered yourselves?—(Mr. Macrae.) Every morning and evening.

8563. Was there any effect produced?—Not at the moment. (Mr. Thomson.) It was rather pleasant to take, they said.

8564. You say the medicine has not been analysed?—(Mr. Macrae.) It has been analysed. The analysis show what has been discovered in it, but there may be ingredients in it that they don't know how to test for.

8565. Do you know the result of the analysis? Was it communicated?—No, it was not. (Mr. Thomson.) There was an Australian analysis—that strychnine was in it.

8566. Did you taste it?—Yes. It was more like quinine.

8567. It was bitter?—Yes, it was a little.

8568. There was foundation for the statement that more than one dose would be fatal?—(Mr. Macrae.) Not fatal, but having a poisonous effect. (Mr. Thomson.) The dose, I suppose, would be diluted. (Mr. Macrae.) If I remember the Australian report properly, it was that there was poison in it (that is strychnine), and that in the case of a person suffering from heart affection it might prove fatal.

8569. Had you any medical men on your committee?—We invited medical men, but they would not accept, on the ground that this was a secret thing.

8570. Mr. Tyson's agent did not object to medical men?—(Mr. Thomson.) He wished them. A medical man attended once or twice, just to see the patients.

8571. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Is Tyson a qualified medical man in this country?—(Mr. Thomson.) We had only Mr. Stephen's word that he was a qualified medical man.

8572. In this country?—I don't know; he is an American medical man.

8573. And is administering through agents a solution containing a deadly poison?—He denies that, of course.

8574. Supposing that, in treating a drunken person with heart disease, or any other organic lesion, death takes place, who certifies the cause of death in such a case?—(Mr. Macrae.) We never had that question before us, because nobody died. (Mr. Thomson.) And he was particularly careful not to take any one suffering from that.

8575. Do you look on this disease as physical or mental?—(Mr. Thomson.) Both. (Mr. Macrae.) A physical disease, but, allied to it, and anterior to it, and posterior to it, also a mental disease—an habitual inclination of will in a particular direction and inclination towards society, towards festivity, which, in the meantime, means being brought within temptation to drink.

8576. You would not call that mental disease?—

When it overcomes a man's reason—when it appears that he is doing an unreasonable thing.

8577. In a public hospital or asylum in this country—in the case of a person suffering from insomnia, hypnotic, or any other medicine may be administered with or without the knowledge of the patient—generally without; and why in the case of drunkenness—which long continued leads to well-marked physical or mental changes, or both—should it be necessary that the patient should know exactly that he is taking this remedy or that to bring about an expected result?—For one thing a man would not be taking food every hour daily. You must have some excuse for getting him to swallow an ounce of this tonic, or whatever it is—and you could scarcely manage it without letting him know he was under treatment.

8578. Does the element of faith enter into the efficacy of the cure?—(Mr. Thomson.) The element of will. (Mr. Macrae.) And the element of faith, to some extent also.

8580. Would you kindly supply me with the names of the four who have stood firm, so that I might make independent inquiry on my own account?—(Mr. Thomson.) Certainly—but that is up to the 11th October.

8581. In taking this evidence from each individual, as to their history and habits, was it verified by an independent party?—(Mr. Thomson.) Not, perhaps, in every detail.

8582. Are you aware that habitual drunkards are notoriously untruthful?—(Mr. Macrae.) Yes.

8583. Do you think that such statements as a labouring man with 3s. a day, drinking daily a bottle of whisky for years, should be accepted without verification?—(Mr. Macrae.) In many cases the committee got patients that they knew long to have been habitual drunkards.

8584. Is the dose increased either in frequency or in quantity in proportion to the degree of inebriety which has existed?—(Mr. Thomson.) In strength it is increased.

8585. Was there an effort made in Dundee to float a Limited Liability Company after this report came out?—No.

8586. That has been done elsewhere?—Tyson's agent in London has done it.

8587. Are you hopeful of the results?—I have no faith in it, as I have said, as a cure of drunkenness, but I believe it to be a valuable medicine for cases where the one thing that keeps a man from being sober is the drink crave—I mean, if a man has the desire to keep free from drunkenness and has moral power enough left. That is, power enough except for the drink crave. Then its destruction would be his permanent cure, and one or two of our cases were cases that we thought would prove to be of this kind. A man and wife after the crave ceased, moved away from low surroundings, but both have lapsed since. The conclusion I came to was this, that it would be sufficient where a man is only kept to the thralldom of drunkenness by the physical crave—that if the drink crave is destroyed, and he has the willingness and also the moral power to keep from tasting drink altogether, in that case I think, it would be permanent.

8588. (By the Chairman.) Did you get any of those men or women when they were in this 'non-craving' condition to take the pledge?—(Mr. Macrae.) Yes. (Mr. Thomson.) Some have taken the pledge. [Witnesses then withdrew.]

Mr. JAMES F. BREMNER, Chief-Constable of Fife and Kinross, called in and examined.

8589. (By the Chairman.) You are Chief-Constable of—?—Of Fife and Kinross.

8590. How long have you occupied that position?—31 years in Fife; 3 in Kinross.

Chief-
Constable

15 Dec. 1894.

8591. Have you got any bye-laws on the subject of vagrancy?—No; never framed by the County Councils.

8592. Or with regard to drunkenness?—No.

8593. Drunkenness, of course, is treated as an offence against the licensing Acts?—It is treated in the county under the Public Houses (Scotland) Amendment Act when cases come up—very seldom. In Burghs under the Burghs Police Act.

8594. You have experience of both the systems of short and long imprisonment. Which do you consider is most efficacious?—That is a question of opinion.

8595. That is a question on which I should like your opinion?—Well, I should say that the power now conferred by the Burghs Police Act is a valuable one.

8596. Have you seen any better results?—No.

8597. Does the system of pledges for petty offences prevail in your counties?—Before trial?

8598. Yes; we find in a great many towns that a man found drunk and incapable or concerned in disorderly conduct, or in a petty assault, with 5s. or 10s. in his pocket, he is, after he gets sober, let out, leaving this pledge for his reappearance?—Yes; that prevails to some extent in Fifeshire.

8599. Well, in some places he gives the name of John Smith, disappears, and there is an end of it, leaving his pledge?—Yes.

8600. In other places if he does not appear his pledge is forfeited and he is cited?—Sometimes.

8601. Which system prevails with you?—Persons up for drunkenness are usually dealt with in either of the two ways—either dismissed with a reprimand and ordered to go and sin no more, or else their case is proceeded with in Court in the usual way.

8602. Yes; but before they come before the Court at all?—I don't allow such a thing to be done. I set my face against that. No man taken into custody in Fifeshire under my charge, or by my officers, is liberated without being taken before a magistrate.

8603. On what account do you adopt that system, which, as you know, is not the system operating in a great number of places? Do you think it is correct and just?—Yes, if not, I would not have it in operation. The accused has an opportunity of appearing before the magistrate at the earliest possible time, and making any complaint, while the police are freed from anything like temptation from money that may be left.

8604. Do you think where there is this system of pledges carried on there is a temptation to the police to 'run in' people?—Oh, run them in, I hope not; but it is better not to put a temptation in their way.

8605. Therefore I presume you think, from the words you use, there might be a temptation?—I do, and these are the two reasons I have given.

8606. As regards the prisoner himself, it has been suggested that acceptance of the pledge was a way of letting off trifling offenders whom it might drag down and ruin to bring before the magistrate—that consequently it was more merciful to accept the pledge?—I don't agree with that.

8607. Do you think the police should not judge of an offence?—I do.

8608. Is that system pursued in all the burghs throughout Fifeshire?—It is. I have charge of all the burghs in Fife except two—Kirkcaldy with a population of 27,000, and Dunfermline with a population of 23,000. All the other burghs—there are 17 Royal burghs—are policed by the county under my charge.

8609. Do Kirkcaldy and Dunfermline pursue the same arrangement?—I don't know.

8610. Why have you not urged the adoption of by-laws for vagrancy?—It is not for me to apply to the County Council. I have other work to do.

8611. We were told that Edinburgh had drafted by-laws, and adopted them because of a decision in the Court of Session that a certain by-law was ultra vires?—Yes.

8612. Had that decision anything to do with you?—I don't think so. On the question of drafting and afterwards enforcing such by-laws as you point to, I may say the matter has been before the County Council for a considerable time, but, owing to the very large pressure of work in other departments, they have not yet been able to overtake this work.

8613. Do you think that the usual by-law as to vagrancy is taken from the Burghs Police Act?—Yes, I do.

8614. Do you want this power?—Well, I told the gentlemen who were on the committee of the County Council that, if they thought fit, and had authority given to them to adopt the same by-laws as practically works in burghs, I would fill the jails in a week if I were to carry them out strictly—I mean for begging.

8615. You have got a very large number of vagrants?—We have.

8616. Almost the highest number of any county?—Well, we have a very large number. I can give you the figures. Observe that Fifeshire is really the highway between Edinburgh and the north. A large stream of vagrants constantly pass through from south to north and vice versa.

8617. What sort are your vagrants? Any of the tinkers?—Only three families of tinkers who come and visit us periodically.

8618. I suppose for all practical purposes it is not worth counting them?—No.

8619. How do your other vagrants divide themselves? You have got the professional tramp, I suppose, who does not want to work?—That is so.

8620. And you have got working men on the tramp?—We have.

8621. How do you deal with them? What proportion of the one to the other have you?—The police, in the system we adopt in Fife, challenge persons who have, at all events, the external appearance of tramps, and question them about their business and where they are going; but, in regard to whether they are really bona fide in search of work or otherwise we must take it as they tell us. We have no means of ascertaining whether they are really telling a true story or not. A number, I believe, do; but it is impossible to distinguish between those who say they are labourers or masons, or other tradesmen, and those who are just professional tramps.

8622. Do you find that many of them who profess to be in search of work are offered work and refuse it?—Oh yes, a good many do. A good many could get work, but won't take it.

8622A. What are the stages—Cupar, I believe, is a fine place?—Coming from Edinburgh they halt at Kirkcaldy. They afterwards walk on to Cupar, and then cross county by Newport, and pick their way over to Dundee.

8623. How are they put up at Kirkcaldy?—In lodging-houses.

8624. No shelter?—No. In Cupar they go to the Inspector of Poor, and they are generally refused relief.

8625. Yes; but we were told by Inspectors of the Poor that it was a very difficult thing when a man came and said he was suffering from lumbago, or some other trouble, and wanted a night's shelter—that it was rather a risky thing to refuse relief?—Well, cases occur every now and then, that I may state come under my personal notice and that of my deputies, in which poor creatures who are out, we will say in all weathers, are refused relief by the inspector, and in such cases we take it upon us to put them into a lodging-house and pay for their bed. It is more as a matter of sympathy than anything else.

8626. Out of what funds?—Oh well, we just charge it against the county.

8627. You don't give them shelter in the cells?—Oh no. They are simply for confining persons charged with crimes.

8628. Yes, but in Glasgow we had evidence that 5000 people were sheltered in the cells?—We give no such shelter.

8629. The Inspector at Cupar does not give assistance so lavishly as to attract vagrants?—On the contrary, the course he has pursued I think, is to deter vagrants rather from coming to Cupar.

8630. Have you any shelters throughout the county?

Chief-
Constable

15 Dec. 1894.

Chief-
Constable
Brommer.

15 Dec. 1894.

—None. We have lodging-houses, but, for these, of course they must pay for shelter.

8631. Then how does the tramp support himself by begging? Does he steal?—He really, to my knowledge, moves in a very mysterious way. I am often at a loss to know.

8632. Do you get many complaints regarding him?—Wonderfully few in regard to offences against property, or of assault, considering the numbers that pass through.

8633. As to begging. I suppose he begs?—Oh yes.

8634. Do you get many complaints?—We get complaints occasionally; but I think the disposition of the public, so far as I know them in the landward part of the county, is rather to relieve the needy-looking tramp than to complain against him. At the same time we have every year, not many, I should say, but several instances of masterful begging, which, when it comes to our knowledge, is at once dealt with by the police—the persons are apprehended and brought before the Court.

8635. How many cases had you of begging in Fifeshire last year?—Twenty in burghs convicted of simple begging, but none in the county of masterful begging. I could not at present give statistics, but I could send them.

8636. That is an offence at common law?—Yes. It is punishable by the measure of the sheriffs' powers in the Summary Court. Sixty days is the maximum, which is very seldom gone to.

8637. You don't have any complaints as to tramps begging?—We have, occasionally.

8638. We were told that in Roxburghshire, under the Trespass Act, they could not sleep in a field, or in a ditch, without the consent of the owner of the place. Do you use that Act?—We do, considerably. We have this year a very large number, compared with previous years, of convictions of tramps who made it a practice to sleep at brick kilns, particularly at one place near Cowdenbeath, where the nuisance was so intolerable that the coalmaster complained, and we had to, night after night, apprehend and take to Dunfermline for trial the tramps found sleeping there. There were over 50 convicted this year for that, and that has had the effect of clearing the place.

8639. What did they get?—Short sentences of imprisonment—under 10 days.

8640. Did you put up any notice?—There have been notices put up, and have been at most of these pits before this plan of dealing with them was adopted.

8641. You would deal with them on your own initiative?—Oh no, only on complaint by the owner of the property.

8642. Although you are not, I suppose, bound to wait for his consent?—Yes. At several of the coal-pits in Fifeshire—at the pit-heads where the boilers are—the masters if they do object, it is very slightly, to the tramps sleeping there if they don't cause any disturbance, because they do some work for the privilege they get.

8643. Do they?—Yes.

8644. It is a sort of cheap lodging-house?—It is.

8645. If the tramps do the work how do they do for food?—I don't know.

8646. They will have to carry their breakfast?—In regard to food, my experience of tramps is that they manage to get whisky when they apparently cannot get food.

8647. Have you any suggestions about them and the extension of the Burgh Police Act clauses to the counties?—No. I should like to see the powers conferred by the Burgh Police Act in regard to dealing with tramps who beg applied to the county; but at the same time it would require to be exercised, I think, with great discretion by the chief of the police, whoever he was, otherwise injustice, I would say, might be done to the honest man really travelling in search of work.

8648. You have no system in Fife such as is in Ayrshire?—We have not.

8649. About the drunkenness of tramps. Have you many complaints as to their being drunk, or any breaches of the peace?—Oh yes, a great many breaches of the peace and disorderly conduct go on.

8650. In these cases, of course, you have power to deal with them?—Oh yes.

8652. These are for breach of the peace, drunk and incapable, vagrancy and petty offences. That seems a rather great increase. Can you give any explanation?—I really cannot. Of course what may be called the 'vagaries' of crime are somewhat mysterious to me. We had an increase last month as compared with the same month last year; while in the previous month we had a considerable decrease. I cannot account for these fluctuations, but it may be the increased presence of that class at public works, which undoubtedly affects this.

8653. Was the number of constabulary sensibly increased between those years?—Yes.

8654. By how many?—By four I think.

8655. The number of tramps in Fife daily seems to be something like 500; roughly speaking that seems to be the average number?—Speaking from the half-yearly census I will give you the actual number detected—that from the Sunday after the longest day and the shortest day of last year. The total number in the summer half-year was 533, including children. That was the actual number of vagrants in the county. In December the number was 369.

8656. Well, that is 450 as a matter of fact?—The average?

8657. Yes. These men, you say—are any of them actually remaining in the county afterwards?—No. These are all men who wander beyond the county as a rule.

8658. Do they take about five days to march through the county? Would it be longer than that? I understand you to say that all these men, women and children, are on the march through the county?—Yes; but if they get temporary work they may remain for a time.

8659. What would you take as the average length of time of their march through the county?—I should think five days at the outside.

8660. But if you give a week you get this population shifting 50 times in a year?—But pardon me, I say that perhaps a half of these might find temporary work and remain longer in the county.

8661. But that would represent between twenty and thirty thousand persons passing through the county in a year?—I don't doubt that there is something like the minor figure passing through the county in the year.

8662. A great many of these men, apparently, as we have been told, are actually in search of work—poor workmen who have really to go in search of it?—That is so.

8663. Unable to pay their railway fare?—That is so.

8664. You do assist these men to a certain extent. When they have no money you find them quarters?—Oh, no. I say that sometimes in inclement weather a tramp has applied to the Inspector of Poor—I speak principally of the burgh of Cupar—and he is refused relief, and he comes to us in a pitiful state and appeals to our sympathy. I occasionally pay for his bed and give him shelter in a lodging-house.

8665. But that action of yours is quite on a small scale, and not general throughout the county?—Certainly it is, and it is somewhat irregular.

8666. What would you recommend as to the treatment in the way the country should deal with these men? Should they be provided with some sort of cover during the night?—Do you mean such tramps as you have been speaking about?

8667. Yes—men in search of work, in so far as the police can see and believe, and who is to provide the funds? I wish to ask you if it should be provided?—

Chief-

Chief-

15 Dec. 1894.

I am very doubtful if many of these men would probably put themselves under the restrictions that would likely be attached to such a shelter.

8668. Without going out of the city we are in, there is such a shelter here?—Yes, I know.

8670. Then you propose deliberately to leave these 22,000 men, women, and children, without shelter?—Oh, they find shelter for themselves.

8671. In what way?—Well, in some mysterious way, they get help and sympathy. They meet with brother tramps, who have begged successfully, and out of their receipts they are supported in some way. I know that a number meet with a regular shelter.

8672. Do you suggest that begging by tramps should be winked at?—No, I don't.

8673. Do you think it should be stopped?—Well, then, you appeal to the sympathies of the law-abiding lieges.

8674. No, no; to the Chief Constable?—Well, you rather put me in a dilemma there, for, though I am a police officer, I have not lost altogether a sort of sympathetic feeling for them, and I have told you how I have acted in cases of distress.

8675. But if these men are to be supported by the population of the county, one way or another, which, I understand, you think is at least a charitable view of the question, that support in an irregular way would probably cost more than if some proper method were adopted. Would it not be better to organise and accept the situation that they have to be housed and helped than to leave them to beg and find what shelter they can?—You would find it would necessarily be that a system of that kind would be very expensive to work, and the number of applicants would largely increase on your hands. I am inclined to say you would be imposed upon to some extent.

8676. But if the entrants had all to pass the constable of the place, would not that be a sufficient check for abuse?—It might, but that points to a very large number of separate shelters in the county.

8677. Yes.—And that would be very expensive.

8678. But not more expensive than the present system?—Well, it would fall on one body.

8679. But the support of tramps, as it stands just now, is a very heavy charge on the county?—I don't quite follow you.

8680. Well, these people who exist in your county every day and night have to be supported. You say they don't support themselves by actual work, and the only other way is by begging?—Yes, to a large extent it is.

8681. Well, that would come to be at a cost of something like £4000, or £5000 a year?—Well, I really could not form any opinion as to that.

8682. Do you ever see anything of the children of the tramps?—We do.

8683. Have you ever thought about what could be done for them. Would you suggest anything for them?—Well, if you are to deal with the children, they would require in the first place to be entirely separated from the evil influences under which they are being brought up, but that means taking them away from their parents.

8684. What can you suggest, with your long experience, in order to get the children educated?—It is very difficult. I could not answer that question.

8685. You don't see any system you could suggest?—I do not, because, unless you take the children and put them into a properly equipped school for a sufficient period, a few days' tuition is practically worthless.

8686. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do I understand you to say that you disbelieve in relief stations with a day's march between?—Well, the question comes in, do you point to relieving stations for able-bodied men?

8687. Yes?—Well, that seems to be a question more for the poor law authorities than for the police.

8688. Would not a system of passports, presented by persons passing from one relief station to another, ultimately lead to the discovery whether they were anxious to work or not, and would it not in some way enable you to check the great and constant stream of vagrancy?—That is charity by another form than merely coming out of begging. We would require to have a considerable number of extra returns for such a thing, and additions to the staff of the working police; and I am not very sure that that would be a duty for the police.

8689. You are not familiar with the German system?—I have read about it. I am not able to answer that question.

8690. With regard to the children, would you be in favour of taking possession of the children and removing them from their environments, and placing them in industrial schools?—For the children's sake, in many cases, it would be well if they were removed from the influence of parents and tramping life, but to take away children from their parents would be almost an offence against our common humanity.

8691. But if these parents are training their children to follow such useless lives, is it not the duty of the State to take them away and to fit them by education for better things?—I concur there.

8692. (By Col. M^r Hardy.) These apparent increases I referred to, are these in part attributable to the adoption of the Police Acts in the interval in the neighbouring burghs?—I think not. It may to a certain extent.

8693. Do you find breach of the peace and drunkenness, and petty offences more common in proportion among the vagrant population than among the begging population?—I think I may say yes.

8694. Could you tell us the number of vagrants of the tramping class apprehended for those offences during the last year—the number convicted, tramps, persons described in the complaint as of no particular occupation, and no settled place of abode?—There have been 48.

8695. But, I suppose, your apprehensions would be larger?—As a rule they are convicted when apprehended. We seldom apprehend that a conviction does not follow.

8696. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Do you prosecute in any of the Burgh Courts?—I prosecute in the Justice of Peace Court all over the county.

8697. Do you personally prosecute in any of the Burgh Courts?—No.

8698. Do any of your inspectors prosecute there?—No.

8699. Do you use the system of accepting pledges in your county, taken by the police?—No. It may be taken, but it is handed over to the magistrates.

8700. The police don't accept pledges at all?—In a burgh like Burntisland a policeman may take a sum of money from a man detained, but it is handed over to the burgh authorities without the constable retaining it.

8701. It is a pledge of his appearance. Do your constables not keep bail-books?—Yes; it passes directly into the hands of the burgh authorities. The police certainly take these, and hand them over to the burgh authorities.*

8702. They take them and record them in a small bail-book, giving a receipt to the prisoner. That is done in the burghs. Anywhere in the counties? You never do that in the county?—No.

8703. What do you do in the county with drunk and incapable persons?—In the county a drunk and incapable person is locked up for the night, taken before a Justice of the Peace next morning, and usually reprimanded and dismissed.

8704. If a bail is taken in one of the burghs, and is forfeited for non-appearance, what follows then?—Usually nothing; the Burgh Prosecutor takes no proceedings.

* Chief Constable Bremner explains that in the landward part of the county the police take no bail. In burghs policed by the county the police do take bail, but only after it has been fixed by the magistrate. They retain it (the police) until the court which is usually next, or following, day, when it is handed over to the prisoner. The police of themselves take no bail—it is only when ordered and fixed by the magistrate who comes to see the prisoner.

8705. Can you tell me anything about the practice in the Burgh Courts in the case of previous convictions for statutory offences? Do they take them into account in passing punishment?—As a rule I believe (I speak guardedly in regard to burghs) that when convictions are known they are libelled against the parties brought up.

8706. That is at common law?—No; in statutory offences as well. A man may be convicted twice or three times in the same year, and the punishment is increased.

8707. But that is under a separate section?—Yes.

8708. Supposing they are brought up under a previous section, and the question is simply as to punishment, do they take previous convictions into account?—If there is any they do.

8709. How are they known?—By the Prosecutor libelling them in his complaint.

8710. In the Justice of Peace Court do you libel all previous convictions there?—There the cases I deal with are confined to common law cases of a lesser gravity than those that would be tried in the Sheriff Court—cruelty to animals, public-house and road cases. In public-house cases where there has been a previous conviction for breach of certificate, that is libelled.

8711. That is statutory?—Yes. [Witness then withdrew.]

[ADJOURNED.]

NINETEENTH DAY.

Glasgow, Monday, 17th December 1894.

PRESENT :—

Sir CHARLES CAMERON, Bart., M.P. (Chairman).
Col. A. B. M'HARDY, R.E.

Dr. FARQUHARSON, M.P.
Dr. J. F. SUTHERLAND.

MR. WILLIAM HAMILTON, Chief-Constable of Govan, called in and examined.

Chief-
Constable
Hamilton.

17 Dec. 1894.

8712. (By the Chairman.) You are Chief Constable of Govan?—Yes.

8713. How long have you been in that position?—Eleven years in November last.

8714. What was your police experience before that?—I was nine years in Glasgow, and previously I served four years in the office of the Procurator-Fiscal for Ayrshire at Ayr, where I daily came into contact with the County and Burgh Police.

8715. The chief problem which we are anxious to get your assistance in solving is in regard to the difference of statistics between Govan and other places—you have a table of statistics before you?—I have been told about it.

8716. It shows that last year the ratio of apprehensions for breaches of peace, petty offences, assaults, drunk and incapables, and drunk and disorderlies was 60 per 1000 in Glasgow, while in Govan it was only 28 per 1000. Now, does not Govan form, so far as any stranger would be able to see, a portion of Glasgow?—It does.

8717. Is the population of the same character?—No; not quite.

8718. What is the difference of the population, and what is the explanation of the very much smaller number of arrests which are more necessary in Govan than in Glasgow?—Our population is composed to a very great extent of respectable working men, that is to say, men who are at all times in employment when they can get it. We have no loafers, no people hanging about who do nothing but commit offences.

8719. But, talking simply of breaches of the peace, petty assaults, and drunk and incapables, and drunk and disorderlies—they are the more respectable and constantly employed population you have?—I think so.

8720. Is there any other reason as to public-houses or anything else to account for the very great disparity and the fewness of arrests in Govan?—It is a delicate matter for me to give an opinion upon, as to the difference between Glasgow and Govan, although I am quite willing to give as full information as I can.

8721. We want to have any hints that will throw light on this matter. In the first place, tell us how you treat your drunk and incapables in Govan, under what Act do you deal with them?—In 1893 we dealt with so many under the Public-Houses Act.

8722. And now?—Well, under the Public-Houses Act, we dealt with 117 drunk and incapables in 1893, and under the Police Act, which came into operation during that year, we also dealt with 166.

8723. You are working under the Police Act altogether now?—Yes.

8724. Under the Public-Houses Act the punishment was 5s. or 24 hours?—Yes.

8725. And under this new Act, the Burghs Police Act, you have powers to fine 40s. or 30 days' imprisonment, and in cases of repeated convictions for drunkenness you have power to inflict 14 days extra without the option of a fine?—Yes.

8726. Are these powers much availed of—have the increases in sentences been commensurate with the extension of powers?—No, I do not think we have had more than three or four cases altogether of fining above the old fine of 5s. or 24 hours.

8727. How many drunk and incapables had you according to the last statistics you have?—283 in 1893.

8728. And what had you the year before?—352 in 1892.

8729. Have you any idea what you have this year?—No.

8730. You have not made up statistics even for six months?—No.

8732. But, I suppose, the extra power is well enough known in your burgh?—Yes; but we have not many who are convicted of drunk and incapable who come before the Court a second time or three times during the year.

Chief-
Constable
Hamilton.

17 Dec. 1894.

*Chief-
Constable.
Hamilton.*

17 Dec. 1894.

8733. To follow up the drunk and incapable matter, I suppose the definition is the same in Govan as in Glasgow?—I believe so.

8734. That is, a man who is drunk and incapable and not in charge of some friends?—That is so.

8735. When you bring them to the Police Office do you follow the Glasgow system of letting them out on pledge?—Yes.

8736. What pledges?—From 5s.

8737. Can the majority do so?—Yes, I believe so.

8738. If they cannot, do you send out to friends to let them know?—Yes.

8739. We were told that in Govan, which is a comparatively small place, the police know the houses of the different people, and that where they found a man drunk and incapable or asleep near his house they assisted him home to it, whereas, in Glasgow, they simply ran him in?—That is not correct. Our men have got instructions if they find a person drunk to rouse him up. If the person is then able to give his or her name and address, and able to walk, the constable will direct him home. This he will also do if he knows the person, and in either case if friends turn up they let them take charge of him.

8740. Do you find that disposes of a large number?—A good many.

8741. But the man that is simply sleeping hardly comes under the definition of drunk and incapable, that is, if he is able to walk?—It depends upon the opinion of the constables.

8742. What is your opinion on that point? The constables act according to the instructions from the Chief Constable of course?—Yes; my opinion is as I have indicated.

8743. That is, if a man is able to walk and is not disorderly he is rather to be directed and got home than run in? Was that the practice pursued in Glasgow when you were here?—Nearly all the time I was in Glasgow I was in charge of the Detective Department.

8744. But, as a man of ordinary intelligence, and living in or near Glasgow, and formerly being a police officer in Glasgow, do you say you don't know what went on in Glasgow and what goes on in other parts in connection with police business? Is there any difference to explain?—I cannot say there is any difference.

8745. We are to assume that the same thing occurs in Glasgow, and that the police act practically upon the same instructions?—I believe they do.

8746. About your pledges?—If a man leaves his 5s., do you allow him to give any name he likes, and to walk off in the assurance that you will never hear anything more about him, or do you do as we are told they do in Edinburgh and in other places, regard the pledge as surety for appearance at the Police Court, and if the person does not appear the pledge is forfeited, and he is proceeded against by citation?—We simply forfeit the pledge, and no further proceedings are taken, unless it is some serious case.

8747. Does that hold good as to all classes of petty offences and breaches of the peace?—Yes.

8748. With regard to these cases of drunkenness and breaches of the peace, is your practice the same as in Glasgow?—I believe it is so.

8749. We are told that a large number of drunk and incapable cases are converted into disorderly cases or breaches of the peace cases, because the drunk man has sufficient animation left in him to struggle and possibly kick the constables. Is that your experience?—A man who is drunk and incapable is not in a position to kick constables.

8750. As a matter of fact, you don't have many of these cases converted from incapable into the other?—No; none.

8751. About the statistics of the police, what is the number of your force?—80.

8751A. Then your police in Govan are in the number of one to every 792 inhabitants?—That is so.

8752. Whereas the police in Glasgow are in the proportion of one to every 514 inhabitants—has the lesser ratio of police to inhabitants in your case anything to do with the smaller number of apprehensions?—I do not think so. Chief-Constable. Hamilton.

8753. You think you have sufficient police for all purposes?—Yes. 17 Dec. 1894.

8754. And that if your police ratio were brought up to Glasgow it would not affect your arrests?—I do not think it would in the slightest. In Glasgow there is the Marine Division of Police which watches the harbour with a very small population. In reckoning proportions this would require to be considered as well as the very strong police force necessary in the centre portion of the city for many causes,—entertainments and demonstrations, and the great influx of people from all parts of the country.

8755. We were told that one cause of the very high proportion in Glasgow was that Glasgow was a sort of attractive centre to which a number of people came from all parts, and that the more gay members of the community of Govan came up to Glasgow for their spree instead of taking it out there?—That tells the other way as well.

8756. That is, you have people coming down from Glasgow to Govan, therefore the one counter-balances the other you think?—For 1893 we had 17 per cent. of the total from Glasgow.

8757. I suppose there is always a larger proportion who would come to Glasgow?—I don't know the number that go to Glasgow, but our proportion is 17 per cent.

8758. You mean, do you, 17 per cent. of all crimes?—All crimes and offences dealt with during the year 1893.

8759. Can you give us details?—No.

8760. I would like you to separate the crimes from the offences?—If you take drunks there are 36 per cent. arrested in Govan who come from Glasgow and district.

8761. Can you say the total number of criminals from Glasgow and district arrested in Govan. We want to eliminate the serious criminals, such as burglars and others of that stamp, who would be tried for indictable offences belonging to Glasgow and district. How many of the 17 per cent. have been genuine criminals, housebreaking and burglary in Govan, or how much does the 17 per cent. amount to?—The total number of persons dealt with in 1893 was 2660.

8762. And of these there come from Glasgow and district?—463.

8763. And what is the total number of drunks dealt with?—283.

8764. And the number from Glasgow and district?—102.

8765. And these people, I suppose, get drunk in Govan?—Yes.

8766. Can you go any further with your analysis?—No.

8767. If they get drunk in Govan, this shows that there must be ample facilities for getting drunk there?—We have a fair number of public-houses in proportion to the population, but it is much smaller than Glasgow and other towns.

8768. Have you any theory for so many Glasgow and district men getting drunk in your district?—I believe a number of them come down to Govan to see their friends on the Saturday night, and perhaps some live in Glasgow although employed in the ship-building yards of Govan.

8769. But, if they go down to see their friends and get drunk, would not their friends very often get drunk with them?—They might.

8770. And, on the other hand, a number of your Govan people would be up in Glasgow seeing their friends?—Oh yes, a number of our Govan people get drunk in Glasgow. The Glasgow police telephone very often on the Sunday and other days to see the friends of prisoners about them.

8771. And is the proportion anything like the same in the two places?—I don't know.

8772. Does not the telephone guide you in showing that?—Oh no. There are perhaps two or three on a

*Chief-
Constable
Hamilton.*

17 Dec. 1894.

Sunday; but they are not always for drunks. They may be breaches of the peace and assaults perhaps.

8773. Do you think the Govan population is a more law-abiding population and more composed of respectable electors than that of Perth for instance?—No, I would not say that.

8774. Your number of apprehensions is smaller than that of Perth, taking the percentage of apprehensions to population?—Yes.

8775. Your percentage in Govan is 2·8, and in Perth it is 3·1?—The number of apprehensions may vary according to how the police force is handled.

8776. That is exactly what I have asked you, but you have not seen fit to answer it. Do you think that Govan has a much rowdier population than, say, Leith?—Leith has a much more mixed population than Govan.

8777. And there should be, according to your theory of the character of the population, rather a higher percentage of arrests than with you?—It depends entirely on the management of the police force.

8778. You have in Leith barely two-thirds of that in Govan, and in Perth—a country town,—a considerably larger number of arrests; and in Ayr you have nearly half as many as in Govan?—Ayr within the last few years has been very much run on by processions from Leith and other places.

8779. Well now, the Leith people are very rowdy, and yet there are only 20 per cent.?—I meant the people who went to Ayr, but I think I had better withdraw the name of Leith specially.

8781. You don't think the prevalence of football matches increases the amount of drunkenness?—Those who attend football matches may to some extent drink, but I don't think the football matches increase drunkenness to an extent worthy of notice. A few perhaps get drunk.

8782. Let us take Leith and Govan on the one hand, and Glasgow and Govan on the other. There you have Leith which you say has a population composed of more heterogenous elements with large numbers of no fixed employment, and of a less purely respectable working class than Govan; how is it that your arrests are as 28 to 20 greater in Govan than in Leith?—I cannot explain it.

8783. And you cannot explain why in Govan they are 32 per 1000 lighter than in Glasgow?—No, I cannot explain that, but I can say that for many years our percentage has been gradually on the decrease.

8784. When did you go to Govan?—In 1883.

8785. And, before you went to Govan, what was the percentage?—The percentage was 73 per 1000.

8786. It was pretty much about Glasgow's percentage?—Yes, if you take 1883.

8787. You mean for the total?—Yes.

8788. Can you give us the details for the different years?—Yes.

8789. What was it in 1873?—105 per 1000.

8790. And in 1883?—73·39.

8791. And since then?—In 1884 it was 57; in 1885, 41; in 1886, 34; in 1887, 31; in 1888, 38; in 1889, 41; in 1890, 51; in 1891, 44; in 1892, 45; in 1893, 42.

8792. That is for all crime?—Yes.

8793. There is rather a remarkable thing here that you have got only 28 per 1000 for petty offences. You must have 14 per 1000 for grave offences to bring you up to 42, or how do you make up the added 14 per 1000?—If you take offences against property, and those were petty offences, there were 304 in 1893. If you take malicious mischief there were 111 of that class.

8794. What is the population of Govan?—In 1893 it was 63,197.

8796. Glasgow has more than ten times the population of Govan, and in Govan the number of cases of malicious mischief were only $6\frac{1}{2}$ times less than in Glasgow, which would argue that your population must be much more malicious and mischievous than that of Glasgow?—I believe in all small towns you will find those petty offences better looked after than in the large towns. There are a great many offences that we are almost driven to look after, whereas in a place with a large population, such as Glasgow, they would not be able to deal with them.

8797. For instance?—Destroying coal-cellar, knocking over fences in back courts, smashing down railings, breaking windows, and so forth. In Govan and in many of the smaller towns we have, I may say, more facilities for the breaking of windows than there are in Glasgow. With us such offences are much more easily noticed, and are also much induced, as we have more macadamised roads than larger towns, and this leads to these malicious offences.

8799. And you say the police are driven to look after these offences in a manner that they do not look after them in large towns?—Perhaps driven is not a very good word.

8800. At all events, the police do look after them more efficiently?—Yes. I believe they do so more than is done in a large town.

8801-2. That partly disposes of your original theory about the differences in the amount of original sin between Glasgow and Govan, as accounting for the extraordinary discrepancy in arrests? It shows that your people take the opportunity of throwing stones when it is there?—It is only 111 out of the total.

8803. Yes; but it is much bigger than in Glasgow? My point is this. The offences of malicious mischief are very much larger in proportion to the population in Govan than in Glasgow, which shows that your population has very much the same human nature in it as in Glasgow, but yet your number of arrests are most creditably small, and what I want to know is—we are trying to get at the motives that actuate petty offences—your candid view for the difference between the number of arrests in the two places?—I have given you the numbers for the different years from 1873.

8804. Yes, you have given us the numbers, but you have not given us your explanation?—The explanation is simply a different system of police administration.

8805. Well, let us have the different system as illustrated by Govan? When you went to Govan in 1883 it was 73 per 1000—what time in that year did you go?—November.

8807. And in the first year of your administration the number of arrests per thousand had fallen from 84·79, or, say, 85 per 1000, to 57·3 per 1000; and under your system the number of arrests has steadily gone down and has never ever approached the figure of 57·3 which you brought it down to in your first year? How is that, and what changes did you inaugurate?—The opinion I formed when I went to Govan was that the police took up far too many persons and interfered in many cases which they ought to have left alone. On Saturday night I patrolled the streets

Constable
Hamilton.*

Constable
Hamilton.

17 Dec. 1894.

8808. Is there any other decided change that you have made?—At that time the police were very unpopular, and the people being nearly all of one class, seemed to have formed the opinion that the police were there to be made targets of to a very great extent. As I have pointed out, we have a working class community, and if you interfere unnecessarily with a few of that community, that interference affects hundreds, because they are working together—say, in Fairfield yard, where there are thousands of men employed—and they tell one another, and spread about the feeling that the police are unduly severe in carrying out their duty.

8809. Did you give any instructions about altering the system of dealing with drunks and incapables. What was done before?—I had only formed an opinion in a general way that far too many persons were arrested. I had never been in Govan but once prior to my appointment.

8810. Let me go back to your system of not arresting for petty assaults. A Glasgow magistrate told us that he had the idea that in Glasgow the police were over-officious, and he personally patrolled the streets in the same manner as you did, and he came away with quite a different opinion. He said he found, in such cases as you refer to, the police separated the quarrellers and advised them to go home. I suppose you have patrolled the streets of Glasgow and know them. Do you think the system is the same here as in Govan?—To a great extent. I, of course, do not wish to express any opinion regarding the Glasgow system.

8811. You do not think they are over-officious?—In a community like Glasgow, more particularly in the Central District, you require to let people feel that the law has to be enforced.

8812. Your men have in the first place to decide what law has to be enforced, and they take that law, do they not, from the directions of the Chief Constable?—If you were to attend the Glasgow Central Police Court and our Court in Govan you would see the great difference in the class of people in the Glasgow Court from our people. The class of people you find at the Central Court are generally those who require to be dealt with pretty severely.

8813. And you think that, under any other system, that the pre-eminence of Glasgow on this table would remain?—I would not like to express an opinion.

8814. We would like you to express an opinion. You have an opinion?—I would rather not express it.

8815. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Do you think the prosperity of the working class has much influence on their drinking habits?—Yes, it has a certain influence.

8816. We were told by a witness in Edinburgh that the more prosperous the working classes were the more they drank. Is that your experience?—Well, yes; they have more money to drink with.

8818. Why, don't they drink more then?—In 1893 trade was not so good as it had been before that.

8819. Is there any means of finding out whether there is more or less liquor consumed in Govan than in Glasgow in proportion to its population?—I do not know of any means.

8820. (By Dr. Sutherland.) I find from a table I have in my hand that you had a child under eight years in custody for malicious mischief last year. Do you know if that child went to prison?—The table does not show, but I expect the charge would be withdrawn.

8821. I find you have had 134 children under 12 years who have been up for petty offences, and of these 19 have been fined or imprisoned. Did any of them go to prison?—None.

8822. What was done with them?—They paid the fine.

8823. I find that 27 children under 12 years have been birched?—Yes.

8824. Seventy in all?—Yes.

8825. You believe in the birch rod as a wholesome corrective?—Yes, I think it is very good, especially where boys have been banded together for mischievous purposes.

8826. You approve of it being done in the police office in preference to the prison where it used to be done?—Yes.

8827. Did you find any objection raised in the town against birching?—No.

8828. Do you believe in sending children of ten years to prison at all?—No.

8829. Is the probation of First Offenders' Act much taken advantage of by the Govan magistrates?—Yes, in a great many cases.

8830. I presume each case is carefully considered as to whether or not the First Offenders' Act should be applied?—Yes.

8831. In regard to the total number of apprehensions for those petty offences about which we are inquiring, somewhere about 1841 is the total,—do you find that the mild powers which you possess and exercise is a sufficient deterrent?—Yes, I think it is.

8832. Can you tell us the number of people who have only come before you once in the course of the year, and have never come back. Take the drunks, who are only about a sixth of the other classes?—In 1893 we had seven who came before the Court twice, 11 three times, and one four times.

8833. So that the powers you at present possess are adequate to deter?—Yes, I think so.

8834. Of those who leave pledges, do you find that being in a police office is a sufficient deterrent without bringing them to trial?—Yes, of the class of people.

8835. You have no desire to bring up for public trial and exposure any person who is a casual offender when you are satisfied that the fact of his being in the police office for some hours is a sufficient deterrent?—No.

8836. In regard to the previous convictions of prisoners for petty offences, are these convictions made known to the magistrate before the charge is proved?—He must first of all intimate his decision. I find in Govan you have only ten individuals who have been apprehended five times and over, and always for the special offence we are dealing with?—Yes.

8837. A much smaller proportion than exists in Glasgow?—I do not know.

8838. Would it be possible to run up a bigger score of men and women as habitual offenders, if the police exercised any other methods than they are doing at present? I mean to say that if any other methods were adopted of handling the people who were drunk and incapable?—It might.

8839. In regard to the birching of children, I find that Govan is at the head of the whole of Scotland. I suppose that those lads who are guilty of malicious mischief are mostly punished by means of the birch rod?—Yes.

8840. And there is no outcry against it?—No.

8841. Was there any outcry against the system when the whipping was done in prison?—No. I cannot say there was.

Chief-

Hamilton.

17 Dec. 1894.

8842. (By Col. M'Hardy.) When you bring up a man for trial for a petty offence, and he says that he is not guilty, do you proceed to trial right off?—Before proceeding to try him, he is asked if he has any witnesses, and if he says no, he is asked if he wants his case continued. If he asks for a continuation, the case is put off for a day or two.

8843. What is the practical result? Have many people had their cases continued?—Very few.

8844. Can you give the approximate number for a year?—It is a very small proportion.

8845. Would there be 20 cases in the year?—Oh yes; perhaps more. But in many of the cases where a continuation is asked, it is really asked more for the purpose of getting the money to pay the fine than for anything else.

8846. But would not they raise the money if they were not continued?—They might, but they would be sent off to prison within two or three hours after being convicted; whereas, when they get the continuation, they have more time to get up the money. And, besides, they are often liberated without bail if they are known, and they can get the money more easily then.

8847. Your constables in the cases in which they have to give evidence have to be present when the Court sits?—Yes.

8848. The next morning?—Yes.

8849. Then there are a great many of these constables who are never called upon at all?—Yes.

8850. But they are all there?—Yes.

8851. So that you are ready in every instance to go on?—Yes, that is the custom.

8852. Is that the custom in Glasgow also?—Yes.

8853. It is not the custom, though, in Edinburgh?—Mr Henderson goes in for the English system, I think, a bit. He was in England himself.

8854. What is the English system?—They are different from us. They do not try cases right off.

8855. How do you deal with prostitutes?—In the way of punishment?

8856. Under what conditions do you arrest them?—Prostitutes arrested in the fore part of the night are brought before the Court the following morning, and are dealt with as the other prisoners are.

8857. Have you plain clothes constables, going in pairs, detecting cases of importuning?—We have not had them for many years.

8858. Is Govan a likely place for prostitutes to be in?—No, we have very few prostitutes. There were only 31 dealt with throughout last year.

8859. In comparison with Glasgow, there is nearly ten times less than the number should be. It should be 300. Glasgow has 2600. There are about ten times as many in Glasgow relative to the population than you have?—There, again, the people go to centres.

8860. Is the principle of arrests of prostitutes—otherwise than that they are not watched by special constables—the same in Glasgow and in Govan?—It is practically the same. They sometimes send out plain clothes men in Glasgow.

8861. We have heard that they do so always?—Not always, I think.

8862. Do you caution these women?—No. Not the class that we have got. There are only 31 dealt with altogether, as I have said, and they were well-known prostitutes; and even though we know they have been convicted in Glasgow, they are simply admonished when they appear the first time. I may say that 30 of them were from Glasgow and only one was a resident in Govan. They come down to our Plantation district, where they find seamen in the vicinity of the harbour. This district is near to Glasgow.

8863. (By the Chairman.) I see that before your time nothing appears to have been done practically with prostitutes. In 1865 they are blank in our return; in 1875 there were only 2 arrests made; in 1895 they mounted up to 29. Now, what is the explanation of that?—I really cannot explain it, as I had never been in Govan before I went to take charge of the police.

8864. Did you not give new orders?—Yes, because I observed that on Paisley Road and Govan Road, just over the boundary from Glasgow, we had generally a few prostitutes, and I gave orders to have these prostitutes dealt with. I said, in reply to Col. M'Hardy, I did not send out plain clothes men. But at that time I did so, and brought in these women.

8865. Have you got the number of arrests of prostitutes made in 1882?—No.

8866. I suppose we may take it they were almost nil before that time?—I believe that will be correct.

8867. In 1875 there were 2, and in 1865 there were none, and there was a jump up when you took the police in hand?—Plantation district grew very quick, and it may be as the district gradually got populated by seafaring men the prostitutes began to go down.

8868. What is the charge for prostitution?—Loitering and importuning men for prostitution? They are not taken up unless they are seen to importune three or four men.

8869. And what is the evidence required?—That they are known to be prostitutes, and have frequented that district for so long.

8870. The evidence of two policemen is required?—Yes. Two policemen when they have seen those women stopping several men, and when they have been frequenting that place.

8871. Do your policemen go in pairs?—When they do that work they go in pairs.

8872. They are out specially when they do so?—Yes. On Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday we invariably attend to the prostitutes, but there is nothing done on the Monday or the Saturday night with them.

8873. That is to say, you have got your single men on the Monday and Saturday nights, and this sort of work may go on under their eyes and they can do nothing?—If it was very glaring they would ask the men on the neighbouring beats to join them. In point of fact there is very little of it on Saturday night.

8874. I should have thought that there would have been more done in that way when the men were drunk and money plentiful?—No.

8875. You never have the evidence of the person importuned?—No. In just a few cases it has occurred, but in point of fact we never get the person importuned.

8876. You have in the offenders' clause, as breaches of the peace and petty assaults, an increase—in 1885 it was 1007, and in 1893 1558, and the increase is steady. These are your own statistics supplied to the Secretary of the Commission.—I do not quite follow.

8877. For breach of the peace and petty assaults the number arrested in 1865 was only 442; in 1875 it was 1383; in 1885 it was 1007; and in 1893 it was 1558.—Between 1885 and 1893 there was some change in the system of making up the returns.

8878. But that won't explain it here, because none of the other classes of drunkenness vary so much as to account for the change?—Well, I think there was some change.

8880. Well, that is a point that I wanted to come to. That is your candid opinion?—It is.

8881. I think you will see that it is a Chief Constable's business to know what the systems are everywhere around him if he wishes to improve his own system. There is a tremendous diversity of handling by Chief Constables. Do you think that any improvement could be made if the Inspector of Constabulary had some power to suggest or bring about something like uniformity of action among the Chief Constables of the country?—In a small town like Govan, with 63,000 inhabitants, a Chief Constable can have much more influence, and a small force can have much more influence over a community than, I think, can be the case in a large community.

8882. As I understand it, Govan is not a small community, but simply a comparatively small slice of a very large community?—That is so.

8883. You are very much like Partick?—No. Partick is more residential than we are.

8884. Partick is a much less likely place for crime?—Yes.

8885. And for drunkenness?—I would say so.

8886. Because there is a large portion of Partick in which there are no public-houses?—Yes.

8887. There are huge districts of Partick and Hillhead without public-houses?—Hillhead is in Glasgow now.

8888. There are fewer public-houses, as a matter of fact, in the residential districts?—Yes. We are pretty much the same in the Ibrox portion of Govan.

8890. You are decreasing to the tune of 15 per cent. of apprehensions between 1881 and 1893, whereas your population is increasing 32 per cent: you have decreased 55 per cent. in your drunk and incapables, while the population has increased 32 per cent. That shows that that element can be changed very much by handling?—Yes. As regards Govan it is a purely working-class community. Two-thirds of our community are respectable working men employed in the various shipbuilding yards, and they have the police working harmoniously with them in their districts in many ways. The people, when that is the case, get the opinion that the police are simply part of themselves, and that tends very much to the reduction of offences.

8891. Are your men frequently interchanged with Glasgow? How are your wages compared with Glasgow?—We are a shade better.

8892. Do you take many men from Glasgow?—No, we prefer to have young men from the country, rather than to take them from Glasgow.

8893. Do you prefer to take men from the country rather than trained men from Glasgow?—Well, there is generally something wrong if a trained man wants to leave the Glasgow force, where there are so many more opportunities for promotion, and I therefore prefer the young man from the country.

8894. But does the pay not attract the men from Glasgow?—It is only a penny a week more.

8895. But a great many men do leave Glasgow force for English forces?—We have had none, although I have heard that said.

8896. You know the enormous difference in the proportion of apprehensions in England. In the Metropolitan district there is not one-third of the apprehensions?—Because the system is entirely different.

8897. What is the difference?—In a great many of the offences committed in England the complainant requires to go to the Police Court and apply to the magistrate for a summons, and that summons is issued by the police. Now, I believe people do not always put themselves to the trouble of going and making a complaint.

8898. We asked some of the Glasgow police magistrates for an explanation of the difference between Glasgow and Govan in arrests, and they said that Govan was under-policed?—That is not correct, although it is an old story.

8899. I find in the report of the Inspector of Constabulary for Scotland for 1893 that he places Govan among the police forces that require strengthening?—I have pointed out to H.M. Inspector Captain Monro that I think he is in error there, in so far as we have to pay our proportion for the police in the Marine Division of Glasgow who watch the Harbour Dock within the burgh of Govan, and, in estimating the police force in connection with the population, we must count these men in the Marine Division who watch in the Govan district, although they are under the Chief Constable of Glasgow.

8900. Do you think that this table giving the number of police in Govan is not correct, and that instead of your being, say, one to 800, and Glasgow one to 500, that there should be some of the Glasgow police credited to you, which would more equalise your number?—Yes, the Marine Division watching in Govan.

8901. How many men are there?—I should say twelve.

8902. Would that make much difference?—It would make a difference.

8903. It would not make much difference so far as Glasgow is concerned. It would leave Glasgow at about one to 550, but it would bring you up considerably. What is your police force?—We have 80, independent of marine police who watch a considerable area and thus reduce our acreage.

8904. Now about prostitution, how about fines?—The first time they are admonished, and the second time they get 14 days.

8905. You have had experience of Glasgow in the short-sentence treatment of drunkards and under the extended powers, and your magistrates have almost never put the extended powers into operation?—Only in three cases, I think, where they fined them 7s. 6d. instead of 5s.

8907. You have some begging?—Yes, not much. [The witness then withdrew.]

Chief-
Constable.
Angus.

MR. JOHN WYNESS ANGUS, Chief Constable of Greenock, called in and examined.

Chief-
Constable.
Angus.

8908. (By the Chairman.) You are Chief Constable of Greenock?—Yes.

8909. How long have you occupied that position?—Eight years. My previous police experience was chiefly in the county of Renfrew. I was Inspector for 13½ years for the lower ward of the county.

8910. What part of Renfrewshire is the lower ward?—The lower ward consists of the parishes of Inverkip, Greenock, Kilmacolm, and Port-Glasgow. The police district takes in a good part of Erskine and Houston, in addition.

8911. Greenock has a Police Act of its own?—Yes.

8912. And the county?—Is worked under the General County Police Act.

8913. In Greenock I see there has been a steady falling off in breaches of the peace, disorderly conduct, petty assaults, and in drunk and incapables?—That is only for two years. 1891 was the highest on record.

8914. I see in 1880 you had a total for these offences of 3000 apprehensions; and in 1891 you rose up to 3518; and in 1892, 3172; and in 1893, 2116?—Yes, and I think I am correct that 1891 was the highest on record.

8915. What do you attribute that to?—To brisk trade.

8916. You have been there for eight years; that would bring you back to when?—I began on 1st December 1886.

8917. You commenced practically in 1887?—Yes, practically.

8918. You did not introduce any great change of system?—No.

8919. Simply pursued the old system?—So far as concerned the apprehension of offenders I simply pursued the old system.

8920. What is the system in connection with drunk and incapables: your definition of drunk and incapable is, that a man must be not only drunk and incapable, but unaccompanied by any friend who could look after him?—Certainly.

8921. What instructions did you give to your men with regard to drunk and incapable?—I am sorry I have not the instructions with me, but I shall send a copy to the Secretary. I may explain that I found it necessary to point out to the constables four or five years ago that a man might be incapable of taking care of himself who was not absolutely incapable of locomotion, and that in a town like Greenock, with so many harbours, and where so many cases of drowning were taking place, it was all the more necessary that men who did not know where they were, or what they were doing should not be allowed to wander about, but should be picked up.

8922. Did that much increase the number of your apprehensions?—Slightly. And I intend to state frankly to the Committee that I have frequently impressed this upon the members of the police force—the night force I speak of. If they pick up such men it means that their sleep will be broken next day in order to attend the Court, and, therefore, they are not desirous of taking such men. And I have a suspicion that they pass over many cases, because we have cases of drowning very often.

8923. You do not think that they sweep up all the cases?—I am certain they do not.

8924. You often, I suppose, have occasion to take a stroll through the streets at night?—Yes.

8925. And your opinion is based upon what you see?—Precisely.

8926. I suppose what you say as to the men having their sleep disturbed by having to be present at the Police Court if they have arrested drunkards, holds good in every town?—So far as regards the night force.

8927. Therefore it is at personal inconvenience to themselves that constables arrest drunk men, except in Edinburgh?—Well, yes. In Edinburgh they have a different system. They have three shifts.

8928. They have got this difference that, if a man pleads not guilty he is remanded in order that the constable may attend next day?—Yes, but that is not the case with us.

8929. If that was much of a factor in the matter, don't you think that Edinburgh arrests under that system should be much more than the arrests in other places?—I would say so.

8930. Yet Edinburgh is not very high. Edinburgh has only 24 arrests per 1000, whereas Greenock has 23?—Yes, but there is a very large extent of Edinburgh with a residential population that do not fall into the hands of the police, I think.

8931. Greenock is a fairly drunken place?—It is. That is to say, it comprehends a very large number of the lower Irish class, a population who work about the shipbuilding yards. They are of a rougher class than the population in an inland town like Paisley, for instance. Then we have got seamen, another rough class.

8932. You have got a great falling off in the number of your apprehensions. Do you attribute that entirely to the bad trade of recent years?—Not entirely. It certainly has had a large effect upon it, but probably an equal effect has been had by the system which I have pursued for a number of years with shebeens. It still continues. I have got special men who are specially acquainted with the shebeens, and with the characters who frequent them, and the same men, I think with one exception, have been at work all the eight years, Sundays and after hours, visiting these houses, according as they think there is any drinking going on in them. We have had so many apprehensions of men drunk or drinking in these places, that now, practically, no one but a drunk man will go to them.

8933. Do you think then that shebeening is largely responsible for the drunkenness in Greenock?—To a great extent.

8934. Have you any idea of extent of the proportion it constitutes?—I think you might say almost every case after 11.30 p.m. Eleven o'clock is the shutting hour for the public-houses.

8935. If you think a man is not run in or arrested before 11.30?—He has been at some of these places getting drunk.

8936. What is the proportion of drunks you arrest after that hour?—I have not made it up specially, but I shall furnish you with it.

8937. Roughly speaking, can you give us it? Is it one-third?—About one-fourth. I should say rather under that, but it is not far off the mark.

8938. We are not talking specially of drunkenness, but of cases caused by drunkenness,—petty assaults, breaches of the peace, disorderly conduct, and drunkenness?—Yes.

8939. That is surely an inordinately high proportion; there must be a lot of shebeens in Greenock?—I do not go the length of saying that that is the exact number, but I know that I sign warrants for searching and examining these places to the average of about 152.

8940. In a year?—No, every week. The warrant only runs for a week under the Public-Houses Act.

8941. How many visits to shebeens will your men make in the course of a week?—They certainly visit every shebeen weekly, sometimes probably several times in a night. If they see that the people are in bed, and the house is quiet, they do not disturb them.

8942. It must be rather a lively sort of life that of a shebeener, liable to so many visits?—No doubt; but, of course, the moment the traffic ceases, and the people cease to go about the place, our men stop going.

8943. How many convictions had you for shebeening last year?—It has been going down every year, but I have not the exact figures with me. I had a good number three or four years ago.

8944. Do you find that your prosecutions for shebeening are generally successful, or are they difficult to obtain convictions in?—We have no great difficulty.

8945. Do the men who visit the shebeens say that bad liquor has to do with the supply of drunkards?—The liquor is something extraordinary. In fact it is not liquor, it is more like firewater. I should have plenty of samples in my possession.

8946. You might send one to the Secretary?—I shall do so.

8948. You get samples—what are they for?—They are what has been seized under a certain section of the Public-Houses Act.

8949. Can you send us one or two specimens?—Certainly. I shall look if I have them. I know I have beer, but we generally empty the whiskey every month or two months into the drains, and I am not sure that we may have it beside us just now.

8950. Have you many habitual drunkards? Many men who are convicted of the same offences several times in one year?—5 men and 23 women.

8951. You had 1 man and 10 women arrested 5 times during 1893 for offences connected with drunkenness?—Yes.

8952. You had 2 men and 6 women arrested 6 times; 2 men and 2 women 7 times; 3 women 8 times; 1 woman 10 times; and 1 woman 11 times?—Yes.

8953. I see the women are very much worse as habitual offenders than the men with you?—Yes.

8955. But that would be a pretty big number to lock up for a place like Greenock?—No doubt, but of that proportion I think 129 or 130 are prostitutes, and that is one of the matters which, if anything is to be done at all, I should like to see something done to.

8956. The Glasgow authorities told us if they could get 500 locked up it would enormously decrease their pre-eminence among the cities of Scotland in regard to the proportion of arrests. 500 in Glasgow would be equivalent to considerably less than 100 in Greenock, in fact, to 50 in Greenock, in point of population?—Yes, that would be like it.

8957. But you think you would want to lock up more than 50?—Taking 7 convictions as the number to require a person to be an habitual offender, we have 335.

8958. Seven convictions in their life?—Oh no; I say within three or four years—within a very recent period.

8959. That is a very important point. You say 7 convictions within how many years?—I would say within four years.

8960. You would not guard that by any number within one year?—No, I do not think so. It just struck me when this was sent down to me that it would not accomplish the purpose in giving an exact view of the characters, because we find very often that for a year or 18 months some of the very worst characters—I cannot explain the reason—will draw up, and we will never see them. Then they may come back and we shall have them quite a number of times within a very short period.

8961. But it is a great thing to have them draw up for a year?—Certainly.

8962. You were talking about the number of prostitutes and their effect in swelling your list. Is Greenock more infested with prostitutes than other places?—Well, in proportion to the population, I believe, it is. I know that our number is about 129 just now.

8963. You seem to have come down greatly in the apprehensions of prostitutes. In 1875 you had 35 prostitutes arrested, in 1885 you had 63, and last year you had only 22?—Ah! but that would be only one view of it—that is for importuning. They figure more largely in these cases of breach of the peace by a long way. We have got the importuning on the streets almost put down, but in other offences—in drunkenness, petty assaults, and breaches of the peace they are a perpetual nuisance.

8964. In the first place, tell us how you would deal with them for offences of prostitution: what is the crime?—Importuning or loitering for the purpose of prostitution.

8965. Do you employ men in plain clothes?—Yes, whenever there is any complaint that they are beginning to come out again on the streets and stopping people or making remarks to the passengers.

8966. Do these men go in couples?—Yes; but singly, at a certain distance apart, so as to be within sight of each other.

8967. And the evidence that is given is of course that of those two men?—Yes.

8968. You never take the person importuned?—There is great difficulty in getting them to come. They won't even give their names.

8969. What is the punishment?—40s. or 30 days is the maximum.

8970. Do they generally pay?—The general punishment imposed is about 10s. 6d., and they generally pay and don't go to prison.

8971. What would 10s. 6d. mean in the way of imprisonment?—About seven days.

8972. They are not harshly treated?—Certainly not.

8973. Do you think your bailies treat them too lightly?—In the case of those offenders who come back after seven convictions within three or four years they are far too lightly dealt with.

8975. With regard to the other offences, you have got considerable powers, but you do not treat the crime of importuning very severely—they don't generally give them thirty days?—No; generally about 10s. 6d.

8976. What is given for breaches of the peace; that will run up much higher?—Oh yes; but it varies according to the magistrate who is sitting. Very frequently they get thirty days for breach of the peace.

8977. I forgot to ask you what your powers were in the way of punishment for drunk and incapables under your Police Act?—For the first offence it is 40s.; but after they have against them six convictions for drunkenness the magistrate can imprison them without a fine for sixty days.

8978. You are aware that under the Burghs Police Act they have got a punishment for the first offence of 40s. or thirty days, and after three repeated convictions within a given period there can be an addition of fourteen days without the option of a fine. In the case, therefore, of the person who can pay a fine, you seem to have a severer punishment than in any other place we have come across; you have greater powers under your Act than others?—I think so.

8979. Are these often exercised?—Not very often.

8980. Can you give us an idea how many men were sent thirty days to prison for simple repetitions of drunkenness?—There has not been a single person during the last eight years.

8981. Before that?—There were some after the Act came into force—after 1877.

8982. Why were these severe sentences not given; did public opinion revolt against them?—I don't know; but there was a considerable agitation for larger powers at the time the Greenock Act was got in 1877. I am speaking from personal knowledge, because I was resident in the town at the time. They got these larger powers, and, for a year or two, I believe they exercised them; but a change of magistrates occurred, and they did not feel so strongly, and they dropped into the old rut and took a milder view of the matter.

8983. What is the usual punishment for drunk and incapable?—For a first offence 7s. 6d. or 5 days.

8984. And for the second or third or fourth offence?—We don't generally make any difference until they come up to over six convictions.

8985. And then?—They may give them sometimes 30s., sometimes £1, and on an occasion they send them to prison without a fine for thirty days.

8985A. But that, I think you say, has not been done for eight years?—No, not with regard to anyone not a prostitute.

8986. Then they send prostitutes occasionally to prison thirty days even for being repeatedly drunk?—Yes.

8987. When you speak of convictions, I suppose you speak of all convictions of this class, whether simple drunkenness or petty breach of the peace, or any other of the drinking class of offences—disorderly conduct, petty assault, and prostitution?—No; in dealing with these previous convictions, we confine them strictly to drunk and incapable.

8988. You don't even take in drunk and disorderly?—No.

8989. Then have you many drunk and incapable six times up?—Yes.

8990. Could you give us any examples of women so frequently convicted as drunk and incapable?—Yes. There is one, Rose A——, convicted eight times of being drunk and incapable; then there is Ann B——, six times; then Mary M——, five times. These were all in one year.

8991. Have these women any other convictions against them in the year, or do they run entirely on drunk and incapable.

8992. They do not run entirely on drunk and incapable. Rose A—— was alone drunk and incapable; Mary M—— has three breaches of the peace and three convictions for importuning against her.

8993. Well, that is exactly the thing. Don't you think that your system is rather defective in this, that a woman who has been five times convicted of drunk and incapable, if she is arrested when she is absolutely drunk and incapable, and records the sixth charge of that kind, she can be sent to prison for thirty days without the option of a fine; whereas, if she is arrested a little earlier before she gets incapable and breaks a policeman's head or commits an assault, she does not come within the scope of your repeated conviction clause?—Not unless she has convictions for assault against her.

8994. But an assault won't count in with your drunk and incapable?—No.

8995. The assault is subject to a bigger punishment, I suppose, is what you would say?—Undoubtedly.

8996. About your systems in the counties: you have seen a different system from that which prevails in Greenock? In Greenock there are very heavy penalties and under a special Police Act. Take it in the case of drunkenness. You tell us that they run up to thirty days without the option of a fine. In certain cases in the counties, they cannot give more than 5s. or 24 hours?—They cannot give more than that.

8997. Now, you have had experience in both: do you find the best results in the burgh?—Decidedly yes.

8998. To such an extent?—The fact is that without these powers we could not maintain order as we do. The difficulty of dealing with drunks in the county—I speak with perfect knowledge of the subject, because I was for a long time in the county—is this—that every drunk and incapable they prosecute, the expense of the prosecution will run up to eight shillings or nine shillings, and if the man has to be taken from a distance to the Court it would be more. These are the fees under the Sheriff Summary Jurisdiction Acts and these exceed 5s., supposing the offender pays his fine, and, consequently, the authorities in the counties set their faces dead against prosecuting men for being drunk and incapable.

8999. What is Port-Glasgow under?—A Police Act.

9000. What burgh in the district have you formerly had that was under the County Government?—Gourock was the only one, but there we did not prosecute for being drunk and incapable, as we had no Police Court.

9001. You had no other burgh under the County Act?—No.

9002. What system do you pursue in Greenock with regard to pledges?—Prior to my taking office in Greenock there was an order given—I do not know the date—with regard to persons apprehended as drunk and incapable. No pledge of less amount was to be taken than 10s. That has been adhered to ever since, and is still adhered to for first offences. The magistrates of course never exceed—I should say rather with rare exceptions exceed—7s. 6d. as the punishment for the first offence, and frequently it is only 5s. The result of that system is this, that instead of having a large number of forfeitures as in other places, we have very few. The offenders appear at the Court for the purpose of getting back their 2s. 6d.

9003. What was the pledge before this order went out?—The pledge before that would be 7s. 6d.

9004. Are very many of your drunk and incapables found with 10s. on them?—Oh, yes, a good many.

9005. Out of ten men, how many would you find with 10s.?—I would expect to find at least four out of the ten.

9006. Would these be sailors?—Very frequently tradesmen or workmen, and sailors too. If seamen have newly arrived they are more flush of money of course.

9007. Do these workmen consider it worth while exposing themselves for the sake of getting back 2s. 6d.?—Well, it only loses them an hour's time, and a very large proportion of them—I am surprised at it, but it is a fact—a very large proportion of them turn up for the 2s. 6d.

9008. Do you take any trouble to get the correct names, or do you take "John Smith" or any other name they give you?—If a man is brought in and gives a name known to be false, of course it is at once corrected, but usually we have no means of knowing, unless the prisoner sends out to some person in order to raise his pledge. Then we get the correct name, and it is put down.

9009. Do you send out for many of the prisoners?—Yes, we send out a good many messengers.

9010. How many of your drunk and incapables remain with you all night for want of money to pledge them out?—About a half.

9011. What do you do with prostitutes: do you accept pledges from them?—Yes.

9012. But they are known?—Yes.

9013. You told us that prostitutes are occasionally sent without the option of a fine for thirty days' for being drunk?—Occasionally, but very seldom.

9014. Would you take a pledge from a notorious person who might be dealt with in that way?—Oh no; there are several we would not,—the like of Mary M—— for instance.

9015. That is left to your discretion?—Yes; I have absolute discretion up to the limit of £20, notwithstanding the magistrate's order.

9016. Under what power is that?—Under our own Police Act.

9017. You are not much troubled with vagrancy?—Very little.

9018. I see you have 37 arrests in 1893 against 89 in 1885?—Yes.

9019. Has vagrancy decreased?—We are generally most troubled with vagrancy when there is any talk gets up about the destitution in towns, and talk about the want of employment.

9020. How is that?—They get to know it in other parts of the country, and they come in, thinking to pass themselves off as unemployed, to share in what is being given.

9021. That is to say, when there are soup kitchens and such like got up for the relief of the destitution that they come?—Precisely.

9022. Have you any number of honest workmen on the tramp going to Greenock or passing through Greenock?—We have them; but these men don't go to the Model Lodging-House or the Refuge in Captain Street. It is the vagabonds that we find there.

9023. Is the lodging-house a private lodging-house?—Yes.

9024. And the Captain Street Institution is called the Buchanan Night Asylum, I think, is it not?—Yes. It was established by a person of that name, who left money to provide for destitute persons who might be on tramp. It holds about thirty, and they get supper and breakfast.

9025. Does that bring many people about Greenock?—I don't think so. It does not seem to have any great effect in bringing them.

9026. But you think the honest, decent working man in search of work does not go to these places?—No; they generally manage to find fourpence to go to other lodging-houses.

9027. But the fourpence will only cover their bed, not their supper?—That is quite true.

9028. And, if a man is hard up, say he has not got a shilling or more than a shilling in his possession?—Generally some one gives them. We have plenty of them applying at the police office, and we give assistance to them when we are satisfied that they are respectable.

9029. Do many come to you?—Plenty.

9030. And you give them some assistance?—If satisfied that it is a bond fide respectable person who is hard up we do; but if I am satisfied that it is one of the tramp class we send him to the Buchanan Night Asylum.

9031. And you give them up to what extent?—That is left to myself—perhaps 1s.

9032. That comes out of the police funds?—Sometimes I give it out of my own pocket and sometimes out of the fund.

9033. But it is a recognised charge?—Yes. We used to have a police poor-box in my predecessor's time; but it went down somehow, and, instead, I have given applicants something and charged it up to the Commissioners. The magistrates have never checked me for doing so.

9034. I don't know if you are aware that some five thousand find shelter in the police offices of Glasgow during the year?—We don't give them shelter in Greenock at all.

9035. How many of the decent working class would you assist in the course of the year?—I would say about an average of 100.

9036. With regard to these lower class tramps who go to the night refuges, will they take them in under the influence of drink?—No.

9037. Is there a strict rule to that effect?—There is a rule that every person who is to get in, unless he is sent up by myself, must be there by 9.15 at night. There is always a policeman in attendance there every night to assist the superintendent in maintaining order, in case any man wanted to take advantage, such as for instance a man under the influence of drink.

9038. Then does the 'influence' extend to the smell of whisky?—Not exactly to the smell, but if by his conduct he showed distinctly that he would be a nuisance.

9039. He is not allowed to remain?—No.

9040. You, of course, only send sober men there?—Of course.

9041. And they take them up to any hour on your recommendation?—Yes.

9042. In the county where you were inspector was there any provision for tramps?—The law is that any person found there at night, and who is certified by a medical practitioner to be unable to proceed further on his journey, the Inspector of Poor must provide for that person. In the parish of Kilmalcolm they had a system of allowing fourpence per night to tramps, instead of sending them to the doctor or being bothered with them, and found lodgings for them in the village. That is carried on yet; but they have stopped the money, I believe, because it brought so many.

9043. You speak of what you personally know?—It was in my time. I had to interfere and stop the constable, who was practically acting as Inspector of Poor, from distributing the money. We found that in a great many instances it led to breaches of the peace.

9044. Could the man get drunk on fourpence?—Well, they had generally something before, and it brought these people there. I saw Mr. Knox, the Inspector of Poor, about it, and he stopped the money, and gave them instead a ticket for their lodging.

9045. That is very good so far as their lodging is concerned, but they get no supper or breakfast?—There is no provision for food.

9046. In any other part is there any provision for that?—Not that I am aware of, except the Poor Law. Captain M'Hardy of Ayrshire deals with them, I believe.

9047. Do you recognise his passes?—Not we.

9048. I suppose you know what is going on in Renfrewshire?—Oh yes.

9049. You have a vagrancy clause in your own Act?—We have.

9050. Do you know what it is?—It is the Burgh Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862.

9050A. In the Greenock Police Act?—Yes, incorporated.

9051. Well, in the counties, the County Councils have power to make by-laws, and in some counties they have made a by-law similar in terms to the Burghs Police Act, and in other counties they have not?—Well, that has been held illegal.

9052. Well, we know the ins and outs of that. It has hardly been held to be illegal, and in some counties they are acting on such a by-law: do you know if they have passed such a by-law in Renfrewshire?—I have not heard of any such by-law being passed in Renfrewshire, but they have a special power in Renfrewshire. They had a special Act for vagrancy, and there is nothing that I know of has repealed that Act. Although it has fallen to a certain extent into disuse, it can be worked yet.

9053. What were the powers generally?—That we could send a vagrant to prison for sixty days for being a vagrant.

9054. That is to say, being there with no apparent means of livelihood, and no abode?—That is so.

9055. That appears to be a stiffer piece of legislation than in any other county we have come across?—No other county has such powers as far as I know.

9056. Could you refer us to the Act?—It was called Colonel Muir's Act. It was passed in 1848 or 1849. I shall get a copy of it and send it to the Secretary.

9057. Have you had to deal with many vagrants in Renfrewshire?—Oh, yes. In the east end of the county, before I became an inspector, we were very much troubled by a class which they called the 'doersers' coming from Glasgow, and we dealt with them in Pollokshaws, and we always acted upon this special Act in Pollokshaws.

9058. That is pretty close to Glasgow?—Yes.

9059. You stopped them at once?—We apprehended them at once, knowing that they were persons of bad character, sleeping about the kilns and out-houses, and so forth.

9060. But you could deal with them under the Trespass Acts?—(Col. M'Hardy.) The Prevention of Crimes Acts. I am speaking of the time prior to the Prevention of Crimes Act, to a period between 1863 and 1869 when we worked with Col. Muir's Act.

9061. But if it were Col. Muir's Act it would be a public Act, not a private Act?—He was a member of Parliament. It was at his instance that the Act was obtained. He was the father of Col. Muir who was M.P., and who died some years ago.

9062. (By Col. M'Hardy.) In Greenock the Greenock Police Act is a special Act that was passed for Greenock: was it intended to allow proper development—to give extended powers of imprisonment for offences of disorder?—For offences of drunkenness.

9063. Well, what I mean is drunkenness and disorder?—Yes.

9064. What was the extreme limit of the powers conferred under that Act to the magistrates for these offences?—That is, cases of drunkenness?

9065. Was not disorder brought in?—No; if you come to breach of the peace, which is, of course, disorder, the magistrate can give anyone sixty days, that requires no Act.

9066. For crimes of disorder, including breaches of the peace and disorder, they had power to give up to sixty days?—Yes.

9067. There was no such power under any other Police Act in Scotland?—Oh yes.

9068. At that time?—Yes.

9069. Where else?—I think the general power was that in cases of breach of the peace the magistrate could give £5 with an alternative of 30 days, or 60 days without a fine, in virtue of a certain section of the Summary Jurisdiction Act.

9070. Then was there any great necessity for claiming these extraordinary powers in this particular Bill?—The special powers were confined simply to drunk and incapable offences.

9071. You have at any rate special power in regard to the drunk and incapable?—Yes.

9072. And the outcome in real practice has been that the magistrates have not taken advantage of their extreme powers, but as a rule have worked upon lines more or less similar to magistrates in other towns?—Precisely.

9073. Are you in sympathy with any associations for the reclamation of offenders—prostitutes for instance. Do you do anything to help them to be placed in homes?—We do, whenever we have an opportunity, but, unfortunately, we cannot get them to go.

9074. Through your own instrumentality you have not sent a great many cases to these places?—We send all we can get to go, but I think that seven or eight would be about the number I have got to go.

9075. Do the magistrates ever offer the alternative to a girl of that sort?—Not before sentence.

9076. After she is sentenced?—Yes.

9077. Do you receive any remuneration from the Prison Commissioners for conveying prisoners from the police office to the prison in the town?—Yes.

*Chief-
Constable

17 Dec. 1894.

Chief-
Constable
Angus.

9078. (By the Chairman.) How much would you get?—It is one and twopence per prisoner.

9079. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Is it not consolidated?—Yes, we made an agreement with the Prison Commissioners. It is really not a source of revenue to us.

9080. But it is better than getting nothing?—Certainly.

9081. (By the Chairman.) What is the amount of your pledges?—I have not the figures, but I shall put them in.

9082. Do you entertain any views as to how these habitual offenders might be best dealt with?—I think that after a third conviction within, say three years, that there should be a specified period of imprisonment.

9083. And you would treat it by imprisonment?—Yes.

9084. You have not considered the idea of confinement in a reformatory institution?—What I would aim at, in the first place, would be to stop them before they get to be, what I would call, habitual offenders, by having seven or eight convictions against them.

9085. But how would you stop them?—Well, suppose a person had three convictions against him, it would be a great deterrent if that person knew that on coming up the fourth time he would get a certain specified period of imprisonment.

9086. What would you say for the fourth time?—I should say not less than 40 days.

9087. For drunkenness?—For drunkenness, breach of the peace, or any of these petty offences.

9088. Do you include drunk and incapable in these?—Yes.

9089. But your people have not acted on their powers?—I am quite aware of that.

9090. So that you don't want any legislation unless to render it impossible for them to give a smaller sentence, which would be rather a new line?—We have undoubted power to go up to one month for drunkenness, and for breaches of the peace and petty assaults 60 days.

9091. You mention that you have sent some of your prostitutes to institutions—there is, I understand, a place—a laundry—in Greenock under the auspices of the Prisoners' Aid Society?—Yes.

9092. Do you send many of them there?—I have never myself sent one there. I don't know that they would receive a prostitute there.

9093. They would not receive any one but a discharged prisoner?—Yes; those they receive are on the verge of prostitution, whom they think they might save. There is another place for fallen women out at Ingleston.

9094. You send a very considerable lot of boys to the 'Mars' Training Ship?—We do.

9095. What are the results?—I think very good.

9096. Do you send any to the 'Empress'?—We send to both ships.

9097. And you think that the results are good?—Yes, I think so.

9098. Do you send many to the reformatories?—We have a good few in Kibble and some at Stranraer, all, with one or two exceptions, good.

9099. Do you think the reformatories or the Industrial Schools are better?—With both the results are good, except in Dalbeth for Roman Catholic boys. There is such a large number of bad boys there that if a boy is not vicious when he goes he comes out fully developed.

9100. Do you birch many boys?—We did up till last year, but they have been falling away. Some of the magistrates are against it.

9101. What is your idea of it?—For the first and second offences my idea is that it does a great deal of good.

9102. For juveniles?—Boys under fourteen.

9103. Would you extend the age?—There is a question whether it does apply after fourteen, but I would not extend it after fourteen.

9104. Do you find that it has a salutary effect?—It has.

9105. And it is probably better than sending the boys to prison for a short time?—Very much better for the first or second offence.

9106. You have no certified police cells, having a prison in the town?—No.

9107. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you find drunkenness more common among women than among men in Greenock?—Oh yes.

9108. You spoke of seven convictions over several years: don't you think that a rather hard and rigid definition of an habitual offender?—I don't think so.

9109. Do you mean to say that you would class as such respectable working men, citizens and sailors, who might get twice into the hands of the police in one year?—No.

9110. Then you can have no experience in Greenock of working men, sailors or others who are in no sense of the word idlers or wasters, who get into prison once or twice in a year, leaving a pledge or getting off with a fine?—The cases are very, very few.

9111. But you can conceive under such a definition that the family of a working man getting run in once or twice a year would be dealt with hardly?—I should certainly consider any one with seven convictions in four years should be dealt with as a habitual offender.

9112. That is to say, one and three-fourth lapses per annum would render him liable to be classed in the category of habitual offenders?—Yes.

9113. Why do the magistrates not act upon their present powers?—I cannot say for that.

9114. Does the Public Prosecutor give any idea to the magistrate as to the previous history of the prisoner before passing sentence?—He does.

9115. And, in spite of that knowledge, he refuses to act up to the full powers the law gives him?—He does not do it.

9117. Do you think public opinion would support you in giving 40 and 60 days to drunk and incapables, even for four convictions?—I do not look upon imprisonment as a matter of punishment to many of those people, unless it be in depriving them of their employment and liberty.

9118. Do you expect any more reformation from 40 days than from seven?—Certainly.

9119. Within the last few years have you found that the sentences in Greenock have increased as to time on the average?—I think they have decreased.

9120. How many people are apprehended for the first time in Greenock out of your 2116?—About one-half.

9121. Of those apprehended for the first time, how many come back in the course of the year in question?—Not above 500.

9122. Five hundred of 1000 come back to you for a second time?—I think I have the figures here.

9123. Is that not phenomenal—we have had towns where there was only five per cent.—could you give me the figures of these?—The apprehensions and citations are together.

9124. Well, you have 2116?—Of that 1800 would be cited or apprehended for the first time.

9125. How many people have been apprehended only once during the year?—I have not the figures separated here, but I shall fill them in.

9126. Assume that you find that 90 per cent. were apprehended during the year in Greenock and did not return again during that year, would that not indicate that the powers you at present possess to deal with these minor offences is adequate enough?—If there were 90 per cent. that did not come back again that year, certainly I think it would.

9127. (By Dr. Farquharson.)—You were telling us something about the adulteration of liquor in Greenock; do you think the quality of the liquor has a good deal to do—something, at all events—with the violence and disturbance coming from inebriety?—It certainly has to do with drunkenness, and I have no doubt with violence too, because that very bad class of whisky certainly affects them in a way that ordinary malt whisky doesn't do.

9128. A smaller quantity would have a greater effect upon them than a greater quantity of good whisky?—Yes, and a different effect; it affects the limbs.

9129. Is it anything that they put into the whisky, or is it new or raw whisky?—Well, new or raw whisky is very bad in that way.

9130. Do they put anything into it?—I think there must be spirits of wine or something like that in it.

9131. Could they afford to do that—is not spirits of wine expensive?—Certainly, it is expensive; but they can get other kinds of spirit, what they call 'finish.'

Mr. John Y.
King.

MR. JOHN YOUNG KING, Solicitor, Glasgow, called in and examined.

Mr. John Y.
King.

9135. (By the Chairman.)—You are a solicitor in Glasgow?—I am.

9136. You have taken an interest in the Society for Improving the Condition of the People?—That is so.

9137. In connection with that, you acted as joint-convenor of a sub-committee on petty criminals and vagrants?—That is so.

9138. And you made a report?—Yes.

9139. Would you very briefly tell us your proposals as to the treatment of juvenile delinquents?—I do not know that I can put it more briefly than in the three recommendations given in our report. They are as follows:—(1) That a measure proceeding on the lines of the Glasgow Juvenile Delinquency Prevention and Repression Act, 1878, should be made applicable to the whole of Scotland; and that the powers conferred by that Act, as well as by the General Reformatory and Industrial Schools' Acts, should be amplified in the matter of withdrawing children wholly or partially from the influence and control of unworthy parents, or other persons working as guardians. It is believed that the Day Industrial School system is most valuable, as securing for the children in many cases a strict discipline and healthy upbringing, without absolutely breaking the family tie.

9142. Well, take a concrete case. It has been urged upon us by witnesses in various parts of the country where they are troubled with tinkers—a class of vagrants who dwell in tents and wander about the country,—that power should be given of separating their children from them. Is that what you want, and to put them into schools?—Well, we had not before us the matter of vagrancy, that rather applies to the country districts. We were speaking from the experience of gentlemen who have been working these Acts in Glasgow.

9143. It is quite clear that the extension of the 9132. Could the Adulteration Laws not be put into force against that class of liquor in Greenock?—We have undoubted power in regard to that in Greenock; but I have not seen it used in regard to ordinary spirit dealers, and it is no use trying it with the shebeeners, because they only keep it in the place for a night; they must always guard against having more than a gallon or we can seize it.

9133. There is no difficulty in putting the clause into effect?—No.

9134. Does it require any particular kind of evidence to apply the Adulteration Clauses?—If an inspector under the Food and Drugs Act goes into any spirit shop he is bound to be supplied with any class of liquor he likes to ask for the purpose of testing; and the question only is—is there any difficulty in the analyst determining what is in it? [The witness then withdrew.]

Glasgow Act would not have any beneficial effect upon Glasgow, because it cannot matter to Glasgow whether Aberdeen or Dundee has an Act or not. You have an Act in Glasgow?—That is so. The making of the Act applicable to Scotland generally would have no effect on Glasgow except by way of stopping the influx into Glasgow.

9144. You don't know the exact powers of this Day Industrial Schools' Act?—I have not paid special attention to it.

9145. Then, give us your second recommendation?—The second recommendation is that no child under 12 years of age should in any case be imprisoned for a petty offence; and that where a child is sentenced by the magistrate to be sent to a reformatory or Industrial School, such child should not be previously sent to prison.

9146. You are aware, of course, that the child going to a reformatory need not now be sent to prison?—Yes.

9147. Take the first part of your recommendation—that no child should be imprisoned for a petty offence—what is the idea?—The birch.

9148. Not reformatories?—That they should be sent to an Industrial School without going to prison.

9149. A certain number of children would be sent to reformatories or Industrial Schools—now it is rather a serious thing to send a child to a reformatory, and the effects upon a mischievous but otherwise excellent child might be very bad; and you—or did your whole Committee—approve of the birch?—Yes, the whole Committee. Eight or ten of the Committee took an active part in the working out of these details.

9150. But you are sure that the birch was what they approved of?—Yes.

9151. And after that?—They thought that the Industrial School would not be so prejudicial as the prison.

9152. Now, give us your third recommendation?—It is that the powers conferred on sheriffs and magistrates by the Lord Advocate's regulations, in regard to the birching of juvenile male offenders, should be more fully taken advantage of in dealing with boys who are not to be sent to reformatories or Industrial Schools. Might I say, for myself and apart from the recommendations of that Committee, that I think it would be a most important thing if it were possible in dealing with those children who have not lapsed, but who are living under conditions which tend to demoralise them in dense populations, to make some provision, either through the Board Schools or otherwise, for providing places for recreation, that is for those children living in small houses who cannot reasonably be kept cooped up in a single apartment, or even in a house of two apartments, after they are done with school work, with the result that they get on to the streets, loaf about the corners and the theatres, and so forth, and get into bad company and mischief. My opinion is, that if it were practicable to provide halls where gymnastics and other exercises could be engaged in under some kind of supervision, a great deal of good might be done.

King.

17 Dec. 1894.

9153. But you have got gymnastics already in the parks, have you not—in the green, I mean?—Yes, in one corner, but that is at the extreme end of Glasgow.

9154. You are for extending that system?—That is so.

9155. Now, what are your recommendations in regard to adults?—In our report we say:—‘The present system of dealing with this class is, in the opinion of the sub-committee, productive of much harm, and the sub-committee recommend—1st, That a system of cumulative or progressive sentences should be adopted and rigidly enforced.’ The Committee were unanimous in that.

9156. That is, with regard to drunk and incapable, riotous and disorderly, and habitual offenders generally, that cumulative and progressive sentences should be adopted and rigidly enforced?—Yes.

9157. But what sort of steps would you take? Let us take the case of a drunk and disorderly, or breach of the peace, which is generally combined with drunkenness, for your first offence; give me an illustration of what you would do?—Well, the Committee do not profess to give a precise definition, but what they were desirous to guard against was that an offender who has been frequently before the Court should not possibly be dismissed with an admonition.

9158. Now, you are a solicitor, and you are aware of Lord Kingsburgh's Act that did away with the system of bringing forward the number of previous convictions in evidence and held them back, no mention of them or facts bearing on previous convictions being allowed until after the man has been found guilty: you are also aware that in Glasgow that practice is acted on in the case of Police Court offences?—They are not referred to until after the conviction.

9159. I suppose you are further aware that the police magistrates have no means of identifying or knowing anything about the previous convictions for petty offences in other Courts?—That may be; that is to say, there are a number of Police Courts in Glasgow, and a man may have been very often convicted in one who is run into another.

9160. And may be a first offender there?—Yes; but surely it should be possible in a city like Glasgow to establish some system of identification and registration.

9161. But take another instance. In Glasgow there is a very large class of men—the class you refer to—who are let out on pledge. The man who has five shillings or ten shillings can almost always get out on pledge, and he does not require even to give his own name if it is not known already. Would that not interfere with the practicability of such a scheme as you speak of?—The question is whether such a system should be continued.

9162. Under that system, do you think it would be practicable?—Unless they were taking the name and carrying out a system of registration, and holding that the man who forfeited his pledge was practically pleading guilty, there would be a difficulty in carrying it out.

9163. You are an outsider and a lawyer, and I should like to have your opinion on another point. In Glasgow, if a man gets out on pledge and forfeits it, the forfeiture is held as purging the crime. In Edinburgh, if he leaves his pledge, it is regarded as a pledge for his appearance before the magistrate, and, if he does not appear, his pledge is forfeited and he is then cited. Which do you think is the right way?—I have no hesitation in saying that the Edinburgh plan accords with sound principle.

9164. That would enable that cumulative system to be carried out; but take another case. We found in Edinburgh Prison, for instance, a prisoner who was said to have been in fifteen or twenty times. Dr. Sutherland, who, as you know, is connected with the Glasgow Prison, recognised her as having been in probably a hundred times before in Glasgow Prison, and she had on her card previous convictions, say 26, or whatever it might have been?—I quite grant it might not be possible to ascertain all the facts about a prisoner.

Mr. John Y.
King.

17 Dec. 1894.

9165. So that it would not be possible to rigidly enforce it as you recommend?—Well, there might be many who would get off, but as the system was worked out, it would become more effective.

9166. Now, read us your second recommendation in which you explain more accurately what you mean?—‘That after six convictions have been obtained against the same person within twelve months, or after twenty convictions spread over any period, the offender should be declared a “habitual drunkard,” and should be committed to an Inebriate Home, or otherwise boarded out, under suitable conditions as to health, diet, and industry.’ Of course no committee could profess to be dogmatic as to the number of convictions which should produce that result.

9168. Then you go on to your third?—Yes, it is:—‘That a vigorous effort should be made to enforce, and, if necessary, amend, the law as to supplying liquor to persons in a state of intoxication; and that the supplying of liquor to persons who have, to the knowledge of the publican, been declared “habitual drunkards,” should be made punishable as an offence under the licensing laws.’

9169. Now take the first part of that? Have you any reason to believe that a vigorous effort has not been made to enforce the law in the matter of supplying drink to drunk persons—had your committee any reason to believe that?—There was no special inquiry made by the Committee, and different members of the Committee had different views upon that point; but there was an impression that it should be possible to trace the infringement to its source by the enforcement more strictly of the present law.

9171. That is what I was going to ask?—They have not done anything. These proposals were only a recommendation to the general committee of the association.

9172. Now, had you any ideas as to the amendment of the law required?—Well, different views were discussed, but it is very difficult, I confess, to say how the statute could be improved in that particular. In my impression it is rather a matter of enforcing the law.

9173. Parliament of course would not give amendments to the law where there are already powers that could be enforced. Any organisation or society would have the power to obtain evidence—the police won't prosecute for want of evidence, but temperance or philanthropic organisations might send people to public-houses to get up cases and have the matter tested?—Well, that is a matter which was submitted to the General Committee for consideration, and they have taken as yet no step in that direction.

Mr. John F.
King.
17 Dec. 1894.

instructed not to supply them; but the majority of the Committee took another view, and said that the onus should be thrown upon the Prosecutor, and that, while many cases might pass unpunished, yet there were many cases in which the publican could be punished, as many of the cases were notorious, and a spirit of watchfulness would be fostered.

9175. Take another instance: if the drunkard was to be prevented from procuring his liquor directly, you would make this apply to grocers as well as publicans, and that would make your difficulty much greater?—Yes, it would.

9176. If a drunkard could afford to buy a pint or a quart, or whatever is the smallest quantity that can be sold by a licensed grocer, he would, of course, still be able to get drink?—Yes; but it is not that class of persons that were specially in view. The class we want to get at are those who go in and sit in the public-house.

9177. And, don't you think, that if a man might send in a friend to get drink for him that that would militate against your proposal?—The fact that it might be evaded should not prevent some attempt to deal with the difficulty.

9178. You have paid some attention to the matter of the habitual drunkard, and you have got some suggestions as to the amendment of the law. You say you should like to emphasise the recommendations of the Inebriates Act, 1879 and 1888: how would you have it amended?—I would make it possible for the relatives of an habitual drunkard to subject him to restraint, and to have him confined without his consent.

9179. As a solicitor, would you please let us have your ideas as to procedure?—I should proceed very much as in the application of the lunacy laws.

9180. Before the sheriff?—Yes.

9181. In camera or open Court?—I think it should be in camera.

9182. Unless the man proposed to be dealt with wished it otherwise?—That is so.

9184. Now, we shall take an opposite case. Suppose you have got a son or a daughter—especially a son—who has taken to drink, and the father has a very sharp way of dealing with the son. He says: 'You must either go to this retreat for so long, or you must clear out and starve,' and the son goes voluntarily under this influence?—I have never had in my experience the case of a man who went voluntarily to these retreats.

9185. Not even a son?—Not even a son. I have had two or three cases of married women going because they were afraid they should be separated from their husband and children.

9186. We have seen a number of women in the same position, who were not there of their own free will, but because they were told that they must stay there or starve, and I think you may take it that occasionally a number of sons do go under these conditions. But reverse the case; do you think sons could venture to take action, even in extreme cases, against fathers on whom they are dependent?—I have not the slightest doubt that in many cases they would.

9187. My point is, do you think you could get members of the family to take the initiative against a parent who is not a lunatic, and who can therefore change his will; who can change the whole of his monetary dispositions after the Act was taken, and their cards, so to speak, were exposed?—Well, take a case in my own mind just now. There was a large family, and the family would have acted unanimously in having such an act as I suggest enforced. The man—a gentleman of good business experience and an intelligent man when he was free from the influence of liquor—would not have done anything to pass over his family as a whole, and the whole family would have unquestionably combined and taken that step, and their belief was that they would have had the thanks of their father after he had been subjected to treatment.

9188. Well, take the case of a working man again: where a working man is the offender, do you think you would get many wives to go before the sheriff and get him locked up?—I think they very likely would, on the very same principle.

9189. Probably a son in a working man's family would be more independent than among the wealthier classes?—That is so; but among the working men it might possibly be chiefly those who became amenable to the police who would fall to be dealt with.

9190. That is quite true, but we have it in evidence that a very large number of habitual drunkards never come into the hands of the police?—There is not the slightest doubt that there would be difficulty in getting a wife to make application of that sort in regard to her husband among the working class; but, at the same time, we have the same difficulty in the wife giving her husband in charge for assault, and, though that is a graver step than the other (because the other has always this to get the husband to condone it that it was for his good), you find that the wife frequently gives her husband into custody for assault.

9191. But, don't you often find that she comes up afterwards and perjures herself in order to get him off?—They often do.

9192. You mention that you have persuaded a good many women to go into retreats; have they remained there?—One came under obligation to stay twelve months, but she was allowed out at the end of six months.

9193. And was she cured?—For a long time she was, but she fell away. She had not been subjected to medical treatment: it was simply the ordinary abstinence of a retreat.

9194. Can you give us another case of cure effected?—Not by the simple abstinence treatment, but this same lady has been cured by the 'metabolic' treatment.

9195. Can you explain the 'metabolic' treatment to us, and why it is called that?—Well, it is an American method of treatment, and I am not in any way associated with the gentleman who owns it, or he would have taken a different course than he has taken. The treatment, so far as I can judge from the outside, is very much the same as Keeley's 'gold cure,' although Mr. Coykendal, who owns it, claims that he has made a considerable advance on Keeley's system.

9196. How is the cure administered?—It is partly subcutaneous, and partly stomach treatment.

9197. There is a liquid used which is taken by the stomach, and partly by means of subcutaneous injection?—That is so.

9198. We were told, for instance, with regard to another cure—Tyson's—that it was a liquid of which a certain dose was taken every hour for twelve hours per day, and this treatment was continued for twenty-one days: is there any similar absorbing direction given with yours?—The patient requires to be treated subcutaneously, as well as by the stomach, four times at least in the day.

9198A. And there are different drugs given for the stomach, and for subcutaneous injection?—I understand so. The two go on concurrently, and the treatment is continued for at least 21 days, and four times a day, I think.

part in that, but, as I was anxious to verify the extraordinary report that my friend had given me, I asked Mr. Coykendal him if he would have any objection to allow me to submit the treatment confidentially to a physician in Glasgow, and I said if this physician should speak well of it, and assure me that there were no risks attached to the administration of it, I should supply him with a patient or two. He agreed to that, and I got an assurance from this physician that the treatment was thoroughly scientific, and that it would do no harm, if reasonably administered although he was not satisfied that the system would secure the results claimed for it. Well, the results of the treatment were certainly very remarkable. There are cases which, to my knowledge, have held good for two and a half years, i.e., since the treatment was administered in July 1892.

9200. What sort were the cases?—The first was that of an employee of a well-known man in Glasgow. The employee's father had been a confirmed drunkard and had died an inebriate. The son also had for many years been a confirmed drunkard, and, although the employer was most anxious to retain him in his service, he had been compelled to send him away. He had married a most respectable woman, but she also had broken down, and their house was simply a place of wretchedness. The poor fellow had tried very hard to break off the habit time after time, and was an abstainer for short periods, but always broke through. Well, his wife was treated first, and he himself immediately afterwards. The result was that the craving for drink was entirely removed, but, about six months after they were treated, their only child was run over by a vehicle, on the street and had been taken to the Infirmary and was about to be operated upon. The husband and wife were going there so as to be at hand when the boy was being operated upon. On the way to the infirmary the wife felt weak from excitement and apprehension and the husband wanted her to go into a public-house and take some brandy. She objected, and said she had no need of it, but he insisted. The result was, that within a day or two, both husband and wife were back in the old state. The employer had his eye upon the man, and, seeing that something had gone wrong, he went to the house and discovered the state of matters. He persuaded them to renew the treatment for about a week. They did so, and ever since there has been absolute abstinence. That must now be about two years ago. That is to say, it is two and a half years since the wife was treated, and there was only that short relapse.

9201. Now, give us another?—The most recent case is that of the lady I referred to, who went to a retreat and broke through after a considerable time. She was treated about twelve months ago, and the result has been perfectly satisfactory till now.

9202. In how many cases?—About half the cases I know about have been successful, and the other half unsuccessful.

9203. But how many cases do you know about?—Personally, I know about one dozen.

9204. You don't call the case successful unless the abstinence has lasted for more than a year?—That is so.

9205. That is a very considerably higher percentage of successes than that which is claimed by the Committee that gave evidence before us in Edinburgh as to their experience with the 'Tyson' cure; but, have you made any experiment in conjunction with any committee or anything of that sort?—I have not, for this reason, that I am almost certain I shall have authority to place the whole thing frankly and fairly in the hands of the medical profession. I have urged the proprietor to allow me to do that, and I believe I shall get authority. The gentlemen with whom I am associated paid a considerable sum to the proprietor for leave to use his method philanthropically.

9206. Your friend has the right to use it philanthropically?—Yes.

9207. Without much cost?—The medicines in each case cost about one guinea.

9208. Did you ever try a good, hardened police court habitual, who had half a dozen convictions against him?—Well, this gentleman—I suppose I may give his name—Mr. Johnston, J.P., of Rutherglen—said that no court could produce a worse character than the man of whom I have spoken. When Mr. Johnston was asked to take an interest in this treatment by the same gentleman who communicated with me from America—he also was personally known to him—he said, thinking to get quit of the matter, 'I will give you a case and a few guineas, and if you treat that case effectually you will manage any case.' From the description I got I do not think there could be a worse case. But, bear in mind, unless the patient really wishes to be cured—if it is merely a demoralised habitual who has got the swinish impulse to drink—nothing can possibly cure him of drinking.

9209. But the claim of the Tyson cure was that it created a perfect aversion to drink?—There is an aversion which lasts for a month or two by our cure.

9210. Are you sure that there is so; did you ever take any steps to try it upon a moderate drinker?—I did not do that, but I was assured by every one who underwent the treatment that there was a very strong aversion after the first week.

9211. What was the effect of the treatment on the people?—In every case it improved them in a short time. One or two went off sleep for a time; it rather over-stimulated them, but after the treatment they were better.

9212. Did they require to be off work?—It was found desirable that they should be away from work.

9213. The whole time?—Yes.

9214. Did they have to be in bed?—In some cases for the first week, although some of them, I know, went about the whole time.

9215. If a person did not want to be cured, and if you could get aversion to drink created, it would be a very desirable thing to have a month or two's respite from their drunkenness?—Yes.

9216. Do you think it would accomplish that, or have you ever tried?—Well, I would allow no one to be treated unless he was resolved to be an abstainer after treatment.

9217. Well, if he gives an assurance, and keeps the assurance?—Well, I mean I was not testing them in the way you suggest.

9218. Do you allow them liquor under treatment?—I believe they are allowed it, but they very soon cease taking it.

9219. Your friend is getting an unexhaustible supply of stuff?—Well, the philanthropic gentlemen to whom I refer, are not quite satisfied with the way in which the physician—who is the representative of the owner here in Scotland—is working it, and they have in the meantime withdrawn their supplies. I have, however, got a letter, which practically authorises the philanthropic treatment to be tested as I think proper, and my idea is, that if I could get a retreat established where this treatment was practised side by side with the ordinary method, we should probably find that patients would voluntarily undergo the treatment for the sake of getting sooner quit.

9220. You have never tried any of these good police court fellows?—There have been some of them tried, and whether any of these have held good or not I do not profess to say, but a good many of them have broken away.

9221. Is that among your dozen?—No; I cannot speak at first-hand of them.

9222. Your idea would be to test it side by side with the ordinary treatment in a retreat?—Yes.

9223. But, of course, you would not get an opportunity of doing that to any extent so long as the remedy is a secret?—Well, I have urged this Mr. Coikendale to give us authority, and he has indicated that he will give us a free hand. The first condition I am stipulating for is that I shall be at liberty to put it into the hands of the medical profession according to their own rules, and they won't allow a medicine to be used unless it be open to the profession as a whole.

Mr. John Y.
King.

17 Dec. 1894.

9224. (By Dr. Farquharson.) You have told us on the authority of the Glasgow physician that this treatment was both scientific and safe?—That is so.

9225. Was this an independent physician who had no connection with the cure?—Absolutely independent.

9226. And a qualified man?—A man of high standing, but I am not allowed to give his name.

9227. Has he a qualification under the Medical Act?—Unquestionably, and not only qualification, but he is a leading physician in Glasgow.

9228. Was he familiar with the composition of the remedy?—He knew nothing about it till the man produced the formula and allowed him to examine it and put questions about details of treatment.

9229. Then the inventor communicated himself the composition?—Yes.

9230. But he has not allowed it to be generally known?—Oh no. It was submitted to the physician in confidence.

9231. The physician had that amount of knowledge that he could state from the composition of the remedy that the administration would be safe?—That is so.

9232. Have you tasted it yourself?—No, I have never seen the medicine at all.

9233. You say it is similar to the Keeley gold cure?—I am satisfied that it does proceed on the same lines, although it is claimed that it is an improvement on that cure.

9234. Have you heard that Keeley's cure has been analysed?—I am not aware of that.

9235. And that it contains nothing but pure water?—I am not aware of that. I know there was a controversy in some of the medical journals two or three years ago, but if what you say be correct, then this must be very different from the Keeley cure.

9236. That at all events would carry out the opinion of the physician that the administration would be safe?—Well, I should say, although I have not seen the formula, that the cost of the medicines is considerable. There is some difficulty in getting some of the ingredients,—and there is no doubt whatever there is expense in getting them from what has come under my own observation. (Question repeated.—If it were pure water the administration would be safe.) It is natural enough for you to make that observation, but it would be highly offensive to the physician, for whom I pledge myself.

9237. I am making no suggestion against the physician, I am simply asking if the metabolic is the same as Keeley's?—You may not intend offence but your suggestion reflects on the honesty or intelligence of the physician. When I say that the treatment is not the same as you describe I do not profess to know the working of Keeley's cure, but, from what I had seen in some of the medical journals, it seemed to me that the general course of the treatment was not unlike that of Keeley's.

9238. I think you said it should be a fundamental part of the treatment that the patient should have a strong desire to be cured, and enter into the treatment with a certain amount of faith?—Well, the faith element I cannot speak of, but I will give you an illustration of what I mean. I have had two or three cases in which the patient was to some extent concussed. I confess that I myself used what influence I could in one case. A partner had violated his contract of co-partnership, and his partner was to give him another chance if he would go through that treatment. After he went through the treatment he said he had no inclination to drink whatever, but he would keep to his old resorts and his old companions. He went to a billiard-room where his companions were in the habit of drinking whisky and water, and when I found that sort of thing going on, I was satisfied he would not hold out because his old habits were entirely the same. He very soon began to drink again.

9239. You would not give an opinion, I suppose, whether his feelings was mesmeric?—I am satisfied there is no mesmerism about it. The man who is administering the cure is the least magnetic kind of man that one could meet.

9240. Magnetic influence might be in the remedy—Mr. John Y. King. the feeling of faith in the remedy itself might supply some power, though not the administrator of it?—Well, that is a thing I really could not speak of, but there was nothing which should have led the patient in these cases which failed to have less faith in the treatment than those that were successful. I attribute the failure simply to this—that the patients were rather pressed into it, and were really not wishing to be delivered from the craving.

9241. Is the element of faith not more largely developed in some treatments than others?—That may be; but, I tell you frankly, I could not have said a priori which of these people were most likely to be influenced.

9242. Then, would your plan be to take sets of inebriates in an institution, put half on the one side under the ordinary treatment, and the other half on the other side with unlimited liquor and the cure alongside?—I did not say 'unlimited liquor.' I say, suppose you had the offenders committed to a retreat for twelve months, and they were told in the event of the physician or any number of physicians being satisfied with them after this treatment, they would be dismissed sooner, you would very likely find a number of them willing to say that they would undergo this treatment. In that case I would allow them to go away (if the physician was satisfied) before the twelve months.

9243. Would you keep liquor for them?—To those who had undergone the treatment I would give free access to the liquor before they left.

9244. But, would you not have double treatment on the same man; you would have the same man with the ordinary treatment and the other treatment with liquor?—If you call the mere compulsory withholding of liquor 'treatment,' I suppose that is practically the treatment now followed in the ordinary retreat.

9246. It would not be fair to shut up a man and give him your treatment alongside unlimited liquor for testing purposes?—If it were necessary to have a test case in that form, I have, I think, authority for trying it.

9247. It would satisfy medical opinion better?—Well, the difficulty would be that that would give only one or two cases. I have had a much better test myself in that at least half of these treated, who were really very bad drunkards, have been able to overcome entirely the habit, and two cases have proved good for two and a half years.

9248. Did the physician help you to investigate the cases afterwards?—Well, the cases of which I speak just now he did not investigate. He did not know about them. But he himself recommended one patient who, I understand, was successfully treated.

9249. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Is there any poisonous substance in the solution?—I believe there is strychnia. 9250. We were told that that was the principal ingredient of the Tyson cure?—Yes.

9252. But the usual effect of nux vomica prolonged is that the person becomes subject to muscular twitchings?—I suppose so.

9253. Do you increase the dose in proportion to the degree of inebriety that you meet with?—I can't speak as to that.

9254. Do you think that your association would give me three or four bottles of the solution, so that I might experiment with them upon the most habitual drunkards in Glasgow, with this proviso that they will not know that this thing is a special medicine, but that it is just the usual tonic I give them when they are down in health?—I shall do what I can. These gentlemen will do anything reasonable if Mr. Coykendal allows it.

Mr. John Y. King.

17 Dec. 1894.

9255. Suppose I, as an ordinary medical practitioner, were to give a bottle of my own with the same drugs, do you think it would be quite successful?—If you used the ordinary moral influence, I should say it would be the same.

9256. That is exactly going in the line of Dr. Farquharson, if you speak about moral influence?—I believe I used more influence myself than the physician in speaking to the patients I introduced. Where the disease is partly physical and partly moral, medical remedies should be combined with moral influence; but this is not what is commonly understood by a faith cure.

9257. Another question I would like to ask you: the Secretary of the Tyson cure in Dundee gave us a list of all who were under treatment. There were nineteen. Fifteen relapsed, and four, he thought, remained after nine months? How does that compare with yours?—That has been very much less successful than this.

9258. He agreed to give me the names of the four, still holding out that I might make independent inquiry?—I shall be very glad to give you the names. I can refer you to Mr. James Johnstone, J.P., Rutherglen, for the two first cases which I mentioned.

9259. My reason for asking that, is that a doctor in the East End is giving me four or five patients of his who have been under this 'metabolic' treatment.—I should say this, perhaps, that Dr. Currie—who, by the way, is not qualified according to this country—claims a higher percentage than I have spoken of, but I have mentioned these cases that I know myself about. You asked me what the ingredients were. I think it was quite frankly stated that strychnia was one element; but that there are a good many other important ingredients besides that.

9260. Of course you are aware that the Keeley solution has been analysed, and it has been found that there is no 'gold' in it, and that has been practically disastrous to Keeley?—Well, I have not been following the controversy.

9261. Dr. Farquharson has indicated to you that, when an inebriate was secluded from society for a long period, this was done by medical men to enable the tissues of the body and the internal viscera, &c., to get rid of the alcoholic poison, and to recover their normal condition?—That is so.

9262. Well, when the alcohol has been eliminated a person is able to go about, and in a great many cases able to withstand the temptation or craving. Now, when you seclude your individual and treat him by means of this 'metabolic' treatment, what other or additional effect would these secret solutions have upon the man other than those indicated?—I do not profess to speak of that. Indeed I have gone very much further to-day than I intended to go in regard to this treatment. I do not profess to speak in the very least degree of the ingredients of the medicine or its specific effects. All that I had in my mind to say was that, as an outsider, I have seen a number of very remarkable cures.

9263. (By Col. M'Hardy.) In the report of the Association for the Improvement of the Condition of the People in regard to petty criminals, I notice the name of bailies in the Committee who passed these resolutions—I do not know if there are more magistrates than these two on the Committee. I was going to ask what these gentlemen had themselves since 1892—when they passed these resolutions—done in the way of working out the suggestions so far as they had the power. For instance, in regard to a child of twelve years, and in regard to whipping, I should like to know the exact records of these gentlemen or others of magisterial power?—(Dr. Sutherland.) Neither of them have been magistrates for some time.

9264. Are there none of them magistrates at all?—No; and they have not done anything so far as I know. [The witness then withdrew.]

Sheriff Birnie.

MR. JOHN BLACK BIRNIE, Sheriff-Substitute of Lanarkshire, called in and examined.

Sheriff Birnie.

9265. (By the Chairman.) You are a Sheriff-Substitute of Lanarkshire?—Yes. I have been so for 19 years. I am now in Glasgow, but I have been in the county for a long time.

9266. We were very anxious to get a skilled statement of the powers of detention—in fact of the whole working of the Reformatory and Industrial Schools' Act. Can you give us that?—Yes. The Industrial Schools are worked under the Acts of 1866 and 1880. The Reformatory Schools are under the Reformatory Act of 1866, and the recent Act of 1893. Now take the first Act of 1866. By section 14 of the Act of 1866 'any person may bring before two justices, or a magistrate, any child apparently under the age of 14 years, that comes within any of the following descriptions, namely, that it is found begging, or receiving alms, or being in any street or public place for the purpose of begging or receiving alms,' and other clauses.

9267. That is exactly the same, is it not, as applies to the Training Ships?—Yes.

9268. There is one clause as to children under the control of parents?—Yes, Clause 16.

9269. Give us the rubric?—'As to refractory children under 14 years of age in charge of parents.' Before leaving that, I should like to say that we always send under the 14th and not under the 16th section. I made inquiry this morning at the Procurator-Fiscal's office, and I find they only know of one case that has been sent under 16. The reason is that the grant is 5s. under 14 and 2s. under 16, and we cannot get them to take them under 16. I may say that, proportionately to the number of young criminals that go through the Glasgow Sheriff Courts, the fiscals tell me, there is a very small proportion that is sent there. The greater number of boys and girls we are sending,— principally boys—to the Industrial Schools, are under the Education Acts.

9270. Before we pass from this. There is some provision—at all events, there are some children received in the 'Mars,' whose parents send them and pay for them themselves. What is the power for the detention of these boys? Where is it conferred?—Unless under section 16, I do not know any other.

9271. There is no power given in this Act for parents to send children direct, and pay £15 a year for them?—I do not understand so.

9272. If they are detained there without legal powers, of course it is technically false imprisonment?—It might be.

9273. But you don't know any power?—I am not aware.

9273A. Well, go on.—I come then to the Act of 1880, with regard to the Industrial Schools.

9274. Is that the Act which you referred to as the Education Act, and under which you deal with the greater number of children?—We are now enabled to deal with them under the Act of 1893. We have, however, been dealing with them really under the 14th section of the Act of 1866 up till now. The Act of 1880 adds a power to the Act of 1866 as to Industrial Schools. It adds this power, that 'any child lodging, living, or residing with common or reputed prostitutes, or in a house resided in or frequented by prostitutes for the purpose of prostitution, may be sent to an Industrial School.' We use that a good deal for children who are brought up for not going to school. Then, in coming to the Reformatory Acts, 1866 is again the leading year, and the ages there are probably the most interesting part. That again begins with section 14—'offenders under 16 years of age may be sent to a reformatory.'

Shorty
Birnie.

17 Dec. 1894

9275. Under the Industrial Schools' Act what is the age?—They cannot be kept after 16 in the Industrial Schools. Under the age of 14 is the Industrial Schools age without any limit apparently of youth. Under section 14 of the Reformatory Act there is that clause which I mentioned, where the age is 16.

9276. Well, we have not got that, so I should like you to give us it?—Whenever any offender who, in the judgment of the Court, justices, or magistrates before whom he is charged, is under the age of 16 years, is convicted on indictment or in a summary manner of an offence punishable with penal servitude or imprisonment, and is sentenced to be imprisoned for a term of ten days or longer term, the Court, justices, or magistrates may also sentence him to be sent at the expiration of his period of imprisonment to a certified reformatory school, and to be there detained for a period of not less than two years, and not more than five years. That is the leading provision of the Reformatory Act, but it is very much modified by the Act of 1893. The clause in the Act of 1893 is:—Where a youthful offender who, in the opinion of the Court before whom he is charged, is less than 16 years of age, is convicted, whether on indictment or by Court of summary jurisdiction, of an offence punishable with penal servitude or imprisonment, and either (a) appears to the Court to be not less than 12 years of age, or (b) is proved to have been previously convicted of an offence punishable with penal servitude or imprisonment, the Court may, in addition or in lieu of sentencing him according to the law to any punishment, order that he may be sent to a certified reformatory school, and be there detained for a period of not less than three, and not more than five years, so, however, that the period is such as will, in the opinion of the Court, expire at or before the time at which the offender will attain the age of 19 years. There are several changes there. The first is that no child under 12 years can now be sent to the reformatory, unless he has been previously convicted; the second change, and most important, is that he need not be sent to prison, and the third is that he cannot be kept after 19. That is the practice of the Act at this moment.

9277. Formerly he could be kept much longer?—Yes, and we always found the reformatories wished to get them as long as possible.

9278. Because he was trained to work, and they got a good grant for them?—Well, I would not like to say that, but they made requests that they should be sent as long as possible. It is here that two points of difficulty come in. The Fiscals asked me to say that it is oftentimes very necessary that a child should be kept for a few days until you find whether the School will take him or not, and that there are no means to pay any person for keeping the child. In the second clause of the Act of 1893 he may be taken to prison or to any other place not being a prison which the Court thinks fit. We generally get the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children to take them, but that is out of favour. The Poor Authorities will not take them. The second point is this, that the Local Government Board has sent out instructions to have them medically examined—I do not know if in every case; they did not tell me that; but in some cases—and the police doctors say it is no part of their duty, and there is no money to pay them. These are the practical difficulties which have come up.

9279. You say here you send the children to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children?—Yes. In Montrose Street.

9280. (By Col. M'Hardy.) They are sometimes sent to prison?—Very seldom; only unless we cannot help it.

9281. (By the Chairman.) In Aberdeen there is no such difficulty. The children are sent there right off, and that is explained by the fact that Aberdeen gives £600 a year to the reformatories. Aberdeen City and Aberdeenshire give each £600 a year to the Reformatories and Industrial Schools, and so they secure the priority of admission for all their juvenile offenders. Do you know if Lanarkshire County Council or Glasgow Town Council give anything?—I do not know anything about contributions, but we never find any difficulty in getting them to take them if there is room.

Shorty
Birnie.

17 Dec. 1894.

9282. I suppose you are not connected with the Boards of any of the reformatories, or connected with the administration of any of the reformatories?—No.

9283. Or the Industrial Schools?—No.

9284. Have you given us the whole of the Reformatory Act?—I think so. These two Acts embrace everything.

9285. The chief suggestion you have to make now—rather that your Procurator-Fiscals make through you—is that there should be some provision for the detention of these children other than that of sending them to prison, and for the medical examination?—Yes.

9286. What is the medical examination for?—I suppose to see that there is no infectious disease. (Dr. Sutherland.) I do the most of that examining, and it is confined to the skin, for ringworm or itch, and the like.

9287. Dr. Sutherland, it appears, does most of the examination; how are they relegated to him?—(Dr. Sutherland.) The institutions have doctors of their own, but some of them are so far away that the authorities ask me to examine, and the Prison Commissioners in some cases have asked me to do the work.

9288. I suppose, if the children were sent to the prison, they would naturally come under your power, Dr. Sutherland?—(Dr. Sutherland.) Yes.

9289. Well, please continue?—We have a strong feeling against sending children to prison.

9290. If the police surgeons rebel, the prison surgeons have not got the same excuse?—(Dr. Sutherland.) I may say that I objected, but the Prison Commissioners said it was desirable that I should do it. But the numbers are getting fewer.

9291. You are not in a position to know whether there are many children from the Industrial Schools or reformatories, who go back into a course of crime?—No, except to this extent that for the last three years—I have the summary criminal work in Glasgow—I have had very few cases, and I have only had two sets of cases where children required to be sent from Industrial Schools to reformatories. Our feeling is, that we are always very glad when we can get the child sent to an Industrial School.

9292. Do you know anything about the means by which they are maintained?—Government pays a grant, and the parents pay a good deal. In the country they do not pay much, but in Glasgow they pay a good deal, and the Parochial Boards in certain cases must pay.

9293. Could you tell us exactly what are the provisions of the Act?—It is the 5th and following sections of the Act of 1866. The Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury may subscribe any sum they please, with these limits, that they cannot give more than 2s. per head per week for children detained on the application of their parents; in other words, for children sent under the 16th section.

9294. They may give any sum they please, and they practically do give 6s.?—Yes, I believe, something like that.

9295. That is to the Industrial School?—Yes.

9296. Did you say that the parents pay?—Yes.

9297. The way that they pay is, that the sum is recovered by the Treasury from the parents, or as much of it as they can get?—There is a gentleman in Glasgow, who acts for the Industrial Schools, who takes particular care of that. Under the 39th section parents and step-parents—for the time being legally liable to maintain the child—if, of sufficient ability, must contribute to the maintenance about 5s.

9298. But you have no means of knowing exactly how much they do manage to get out of them?—I do not know. I have not had a case before me since I came to Glasgow.

9299. Does that 5s. not go to repay the Treasury?—By the 40th section it is recovered on the complaint of the Inspector of Industrial Schools, or by any agent of the Inspector, or by any constable under the direction

Sheriff Birnie. of the Inspector. These are the three parties who seem to recover.

12 Dec. 1894. 9300. But what is the destination of the money when recovered? It is the Treasury is it not? In fact, is it not the case that the Treasury gives 6s., and they recover any sum they can up to 5s. from the parents?—I should think that is likely.

9301. But do they give the destination in the Act?—It simply says the magistrate may made an order or decree on the parent for payment to the Inspector or his agent of such weekly sum not exceeding 5s. Then it goes on to explain about the order or decree, and then it states that every such payment shall go in relief of the charges on Her Majesty's Treasury.

9302. Exactly; that is to say, it does not go to the Treasury, but, if the 5s. is recovered, the Treasury only gives 1s. ?—That is so.

9303. You said something about the Parochial Boards subscribing?—Yes.

9304. The Parochial Boards can only do so under statutory powers?—That is so. 'The Guardians of the Poor, or the Union of a Parish, or the Board of Management of a District Pauper School, or Parochial Board of a Parish or Combination, may from time to time, with the consent in Scotland of the Board of Supervision, contribute such sums as they think fit towards the maintenance of children detained in a certified Industrial School on their application.'

9305. Do Parochial Boards apply often to have children sent to Industrial Schools?—I do not think so.

9306. That does not give them a statutory power to contribute generally to the funds of a reformatory or an Industrial School. I mentioned that Aberdeen county and city each contribute the substantial sum of £600 a year to these Reformatory and Industrial School institutions, but the power that you have read to us would not allow a Parochial Board to give, say £20, to the funds of a Reformatory School. It only enables it to give so many shillings a week in respect of a given child?—There is another power under which, where a child has been in charge of the Parochial Authorities three months before hand, or at the time of committal, the Parochial Boards must contribute.

9307. But that is a different sort of contribution from that which is made, for instance, to the 'Mars' Training Ship of so many pounds—£50 by Edinburgh, so many pounds by Forfarshire, and so many pounds from Dundee?—Quite different.

9308. Have you given us the financial provisions as to reformatories?—Expenses of Reformatory Schools are under section 23 of the Act of 1866. The expenses of putting a child to the school must be paid by the Prison Authorities, and it is defrayed as a current expense by the Prison Authorities. Under section 24 there is a contribution by the Treasury; the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury may contribute such sum as the Secretary of State may recommend. Then, under the 25th section, the justices may order the parent or step-parent to pay any sum not exceeding 5s.

9309-10. In fact, it is exactly the same thing as in the case of the Industrial School, with the exception that there is no 2s. maximum?—That is so.

9311. (By Col. M'Hardy.) In regard to that first clause about the transit being paid by the Prison Commissioners, that is now abrogated by the Act of 1893? It is not in so many words set out there, but it follows from the fact that the Prison Authorities don't know anything about the boy?—That is so. I would suppose so, as it is not now necessary to send to prison.

9312. You have had a good deal of experience of petty offenders—the more serious class of petty offenders. When you were in Hamilton did you deal with the ordinary run of petty offenders from the county?—All offenders from the county come before the Sheriff Court. Of course the offenders in the different burghs in Lanarkshire are dealt with by their own magistrates.

9313. Therefore you had a pettier kind of offences before you there than here?—Yes.

9314. Here it is only the more serious that you deal with—those that can only be dealt with by a sheriff or by a sheriff and jury?—Yes.

9315. Your experience of drunkenness, for instance, will be almost all county?—It is almost nothing. Drunkenness apart from breach of the peace is not known in the Sheriff Court.

9316. How do you deal with them in the county?—I do not think they deal with them at all; I think they leave them alone unless they are noisy, or taken up for some other cause.

9317. Breach of the peace?—Oh, breach of the peace is quite another thing; that is practically under the Summary Procedure Act, the penalty being 40s. with an option of 60 days.

9318. But surely the drunk and incapable are dealt with somehow; are they dealt with by the justices?—In the burghs.

9319. But put aside the burghs in the county?—I never heard of a man being taken up for drunkenness.

9320. How many districts do you speak to?—I was in all the districts, including the very large district of Lanark and Hamilton.

9321. You never in the course of your experience heard of a drunkard being taken up?—That is so. They may take them into the Police Office but we don't know of that.

9322. If they had been taken in and brought before the magistrate you would have been the magistrate?—They may have been dealt with by the justices, but I do not think that the drunk and incapable are dealt with alone by the justices.

9323. What cases come before the justices?—Breaches of the peace.

9324. But would they not come before you?—The more serious ones would. There is really a union of jurisdiction there. The justices do an immense deal in the counties.

9325. You say that you see no reason why drunkenness, breaches of the peace and petty assaults in the early stages should not be dealt with as at present. The offences are against public order and must be followed by punishment for the sake of deterring others, whether the punishment does good to the person punished or not. Now, you have seen the systems of heavy punishments and light punishments, the one under the Glasgow Police Act, offences against which come before you?—No; the police offences would not come before us, although I know something about them.

9327. You say: 'The present punishments for drunkenness, and for drunkenness coupled with breaches of the peace or petty assaults in their earlier stages, are probably sufficient, but after a second conviction I would give power to order a prisoner to give or find security, say for £10, not to offend again for six months, and in default render him liable to imprisonment for one month, and on breach of this security I would render him liable to imprisonment for six months' ?—That is a severe punishment which would be very seldom inflicted, but it would do good in preventing, say, a young man from tumbling into dissipated habits.

9328. But do you think you could get £10 security for a man after his second conviction, that is to say, don't you think the greater number of men who are habitual drunks would be unable to find that security?—I would not make it always £10; you might have caution for £2. The great thing is to get a friend to take an interest in the man.

17 Dec. 1894.

*Sheriff
Birnie.*

17 Dec. 1894.

9329. In default, you would give imprisonment for one month?—Up to one month.

9330. It is the latter at the present moment?—In the burghs under the Burghs Police Act.

9332. Have you any precedent for that?—No.

9335. Could you not hold it in some suspended animation? You would require to have some arrangement of that sort, otherwise the £10 security would be no security at all?—Of course, the magistrate would always have the power of forfeiting the security.

9336. You mention that the habitually intemperate man or woman have difficulty in finding work when they come out of prison; and that any punishment could have lasting effect only by providing him or her with work?—I think that is a most important point. We find the societies here—the Prison Society and the Charity Organisation Society—enormously useful. They get work for quantities of these people. They scarcely refuse a person we send them, and we always find these people are better. But the most extraordinary point is this. My experience is, and one of the fiscals told me also that it was his, that there has been no instance of one of these men who has been sent to work ever having been taken up for stealing from their master or their fellowmen. It is a most remarkable fact.

9337. The master to whom these discharged prisoners are sent are told their characters, but not their fellow-workmen?—I understand that is so; it must be so.

9338. And you say in your statement, which you have supplied the Committee with, that you have been told of cases where some officer connected with criminal administration had told the fellow-workmen?—That is so.

9339. And that you propose to punish?—Yes.

9340. By fine, and, in default, imprisonment for 30 days?—Yes.

9341. Well, you make a suggestion here as to something like adult reformatories?—Well, I did not feel myself capable to do that, but one is so impressed with the benefit, the hopefulness of work to these creatures, that anything that could be done would be of importance.

9342. You don't attach much weight to the objection as to competition with honest labour, but might I ask you, what sort of labour you would suggest as proper for such reformatories?—I have not thought of that.

9343. Your theory as to the uncertainty of sentences, would you explain that?—Well, at present there is great discussion and objection about that. Different judges when they come here to Glasgow have different sentences, and the sheriffs also have different sentences. My feeling is that when the time comes, if it does come, there should be some codification of sentences making a minimum and a maximum, and the only points that strike me about that is that I would never make a fast minimum, I would always authorise a judge to let a man off with an admonition; and, in the second place, if the magistrate—applied to the inferior magistrates—if the magistrate was to decrease the minimum I would make him give a reason. That would be very useful, because it would enable the next man to see why it was done. At present we have no guide at all. Of course, it is more a theory than anything else.

9344. You say you would have a minimum fixed by statute, and the magistrate empowered to lessen it on giving reasons?—Yes.

9345. I have been very much struck by the very great diversity of methods of dealing with practically the same crime; don't you think that if your course were followed there would be an inclination to charge combined offences under a heading that would make it look more serious?—I find our Procurator-Fiscal is a most moderate man; I never find any inclination of that sort.

9346. You have got a different Procurator-Fiscal from the police magistrates?—Oh yes.

9347. As to vagrants, you think that what they want is to be made to work; you have got no ideas as to how to deal with them?—Am I not right that in Germany they make them work on the roads and in a particular uniform. The thing is to shame a vagrant, because he can work if he will.

9348. You have, had no experience with them?—Not here, but I have had in Lanark and Hamilton.

9350. The proposal has been made to us that in the case of these petty offenders they should be charged with being habitual, and remitted to the sheriff, who would take evidence as to the habitualness of their offending?—And commit them to these retreats which are assumed?

9351. As habituals?—Yes.

9352. But let us come to another point, that is as to the extension of the Habitual Drunkards Act, to the cases of persons proposed to be committed at the instance of their friends; you propose to do that?—I assume that they are voluntary.

9353. Would you enlarge that power? Would you allow a husband to take proceedings against his wife who was never in the hands of the police, and pronounce her a habitual drunkard, and send her to some retreat?—Yes.

9354. Before the sheriff, of course?—Yes.

9355. I suppose you know the precedent of the lunacy laws?—Yes.

9356. In a lunacy case what is done?—In the lunacy committals it is done upon certificate; but, it is one thing to say that a man or a woman is insane, and it is quite another to say that he is a habitual drunkard.

9357. The lunatic is not brought before you except in dangerous cases?—Well, I have seen two or three cases of dangerous lunatics who have been cognosed, but it is a daily occurrence to commit three or four to lunatic asylums, and we never see the patient.

9358. (By Dr. Sutherland.) But, in the case of the person charged as habituals, you should see the patient?—Certainly.

9359. And let the patient state objections?—Yes.

9360. And if the patient preferred a public trial, you would have no objection?—I would give an option to the sheriff.

*Sheriff
Birnie.*

17 Dec. 1894.

Sheriff Birnle.

17 Dec. 1894.

9361. (By Col. M'Hardy.) That might be disagreeable to his friends?—The sheriff would deal with that.

9362. (By the Chairman.) You think there ought to be an appeal in the case of people treated as habitual offenders even from the sheriff, supposing we were to make the Sheriff Court the court of first instance?—It might be to the principal sheriff.

9363. If he went to the Sheriff-Substitute on an ordinary criminal charge he would have an appeal to the sheriff?—Oh no.

9364. Then this would be a sort of quasi-criminal case?—It would be a sort of administrative case.

9367. There would be nothing peremptory there, because, if you did not pronounce him a habitual, you would deal with him as you like?—There is no doubt that that is just something like my idea.

9368. Would you give the sheriff power to release the man?—Yes; we have that power just now in lunacy cases.

9369. In the case of a habitual drunkard you would be for appointing a curator to look after his business? Sheriff Birnle.

—Yes.

9370. In a private case at whose instance would you have the prosecution?—At the instance of the relatives.

17 Dec. 1894.

9371. Do you think they would act?—Oh yes. Children would act in regard to a mother, and they would also in regard to a father, unless, perhaps, it was to take money out of their pockets: that is a difficulty.

9372. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Would you allow independent friends to bring a suit?—Well, I never saw any act which went so wide as that.

9373. You have a paragraph here about the definition of the habitual drunkard; have you any objection to define it for civil purposes?—Well, the definition I have marked is the Quebec definition. The Quebec definition is not very well expressed, but it is something like what I think:—'A person who heretofore on many occasions has been a cause of ruin to their families, of grievous injuries to their relatives, as well as to their creditors.' It seems most necessary that there should be something of that sort, because it might be better to leave a drunkard than to take him away and probably send his wife and children into poverty.

9374. We have got a definition under the English law, and, of course, it is much easier to keep a definition that we have than to make a new one; that is to say, a definition that has been interpreted and understood, finds more ready acceptance than would an attempt to import a new definition?—Quite true. [Witness then withdrew.]

Dr. J. F. SUTHERLAND.
Miss FLORA C. STEVENSON.

MR. JOHN TRAQUAIR STRANG, Secretary of the Charity Organisation Society, Glasgow, called in and examined.

*Mr. John
Traquair
Strang.*

18 Dec. 1894.

9375. (By the Chairman.) You are Secretary of the Charity Organisation Society?—Yes.

9376. And your Society has taken much interest in connection with dealing with tramps and casuals?—We have to deal with them every day, as well as with the respectable poor. We get all classes before us.

9377. Can you please tell us what you have done in the way of instituting some Labour Colony there?—For the last nine or ten years we have had a Labour Yard at Alexandra Parade, where we give temporary work to men out of work. It serves as a help to those men who are willing, and it serves as a test of those who are not willing to work.

9378. A man comes to you for assistance who has no place to go to for the night, no money to buy lodgings; what do you do?—We used to issue lodging tickets to the public, so that they might not give money but rather give a ticket when applied to, which would entitle the holder to a bed and a little food for the night. We found, however, that these tickets were being used in improper ways. That is to say, they were content to beg for these tickets and not to work. They knew where the tickets were to be got, and they went regularly there for them.

9378A. Where were they to be got?—From the public. When one man got a ticket from any one he told the others. We sold the tickets to subscribers at fivepence each. That would cover the cost of the bed and food for the night.

9379. And then a man went to your subscribers and got one of those tickets?—Yes.

9380. What did you do then?—We recently opened a Shelter of our own.

9381. But before that you say they begged for these tickets instead of working? If a man arrives on the tramp in Glasgow and has no money to get a night's lodging, and had no opportunity of working beforehand, that is, of working out the price of fivepence?—That is not the class of men that we discovered to be working upon these tickets. It was the class of men termed "loafers" who hang about the lodging-houses. The lodging-house keepers tell me that they cannot get them out of bed before eight or nine o'clock in the morning, and they hang about the lodging-house all forenoon and go out in the afternoon and evening begging for a night's lodging again. I happened to pay a visit to one of the lodging-houses in North Woodside Road, about half-past eleven in the forenoon, and I spoke to the Superintendent about the number of men I saw in the hall at that hour of the day. I said to him, "Who are these; are these men on the night-shift?" He laughed and said, "No, the men on the night-shift are all in their beds." "But," I said, "you have about 40 or 50 young men who are idle at this time of day." "Oh," he said, "the great majority of these men are just living off the public, begging for their tickets, and they come here with the Charity Organisation Society's lodging tickets."

9382. That was not a model lodging-house but a private one?—It was a model lodging-house.

9383. Not a Corporation lodging-house?—Yes. And the Superintendent told me that what I saw was not to be found in his house alone, but that it was in the others.

9384. About that tell us what you did?—After that our Committee decided upon opening an Industrial Shelter to do away with the lodging tickets entirely, and to issue a ticket for our own Industrial Shelter, where a man will be provided with food and lodging on condition that he does a certain amount of work in exchange. We opened that Shelter on the 16th November last, and it is now in full working order.

9385. At what hour do the people commence to turn up at night?—They are admitted between four and six in the afternoon. The Superintendent has power to admit in very urgent cases at any time.

9386. You have some labour test there, you say?—Yes. Wood chopping and stone breaking.

9387. When have they to do the wood chopping or stone breaking—before they get their food and bed or not?—When they enter the house they sign an obligation to do a certain amount of work and to conform to the rules of the house. We do not ask them to do a certain amount of work before they get their night's bed. We trust to them doing it.

9388. Do you have any of them refusing?—No, not as yet. They are all willing to work after we have taken them in. There were six men who, after a week's sojourn, left of their own accord.

9389. Do you keep them for a long time?—They are allowed to remain there for a period of three months, and during that time if they get work good and well; they go.

9390. How long does it take to do their prescribed task?—They are expected to do six shillings worth of work in the course of a week. That is a shilling a day, the estimated cost of their keep.

9391. What I have asked you is how long does it take them to get through their work? They will only have the balance of the time available to search for work?—Yes. The scheme is only in its infancy, and we have not had time to arrange how the men are to get an opportunity for getting work. They can ask the Superintendent to get out. One man did so the other day, because he had prospects of work, and he was allowed to go out.

9392. They are not allowed to go out?—Not without the permission of the Superintendent, but if they satisfy him that it is to look for work, he will not stand in their way. But they must be back by a certain time.

9393. You have no power to detain them, and they can go?—None whatever.

9394. How many have you in now?—There were 44 last night. We cannot take more than 50 just now.

9395. How many of them had been in the place for over a week?—35 for more than a week.

2 Q

Mr. John
Traquair
Strang.

18 Dec. 1894.

9396. Were there many who had been only in for a night or two?—None except those who went in yesterday for the first time, and there were about six of them.

9397. You do not appear to give them only a night's lodging you give them more?—It isn't limited in the Night Shelter. We take down the man's name, and endeavour to get some information about him—how he has got into his destitute condition—and we endeavour to bring influences to bear upon him to set him on his feet again.

9398. And you keep him there while you are trying to trace him?—We keep him clean and feed him, and bring religious influences to bear upon him to put him into a proper place again. The Committee intend to take some steps—what these may be I do not know; they had a meeting yesterday forenoon—to consider what steps they should take to set these men into situations of a permanent character.

9399. To keep a man there earning 6s. at wood chopping for any length of time is not what you aim at?—Oh no, there would not be one of them allowed to remain more than three months, without the permission of the Committee.

9400. Now you have spoken about the men; have you done anything for women?—We have nothing of that kind for women. Our Ladies' Auxiliary have a sewing-room, where they employ respectable women at sewing, between 70 and 80 every day just now.

9401. You simply pass the women on to the Ladies' Auxiliary and they give them employment?—Yes.

9402. Do you know what wages they earn at that?—About 3s. 6d. a week, and they have soup and bread given to them during the day.

9403. Do you know how many meals?—Just one meal. They are there from 10 till 4, except Saturdays.

9404. Where do these women live?—They have houses of their own. A number of them live in single apartments, some of them have parish relief. They are willing to do some kind of work, and we give a little to help them in that way.

9405. And the work they get is permanent?—If they like to make it so.

9406. Has the Ladies' Auxiliary no three months' limit?—No, they have no limit. They allow them to remain there as long as they wish.

9407. I suppose requiring a certain task of work, good behaviour, and compliance with their rules?—Yes. All these cases are enquired into before we send them there.

9408. You have got 70 women and say 50 men that you deal with?—Yes, and in our Labour Yard we had 35 yesterday. It is a place for wood-chopping—apart from the Shelter—for men who have homes of their own, but who are out of employment, and are willing to do something rather than ask for charity. We cannot employ more than 40 men, as we have no machinery for more. In the Labour Yard they begin at 9 in the morning. In the summer at 9.30, and they close in the evening as soon as it is dark, about 4 just now; in the summer about 5.30. They have an hour for dinner. The reason for our not beginning in the morning till 9 or 9.30 is that they may have an opportunity of enquiring for work at the gates of the public works in the morning. If any man wants to get away to look for work he gets permission from the Superintendent to do so.

9409. Have you had this Ladies' Auxiliary in operation for a long time?—It has been in operation for ten years.

9410. Can you tell us how many women pass through that? That is to say, got temporarily relieved there, and got into some permanent employment in the course of last year?—I cannot say. The Ladies' Auxiliary issue a report of their own, and I have not got a copy of it.

Mr. John
Traquair
Strang.

18 Dec. 1894.

9411. Well, take the men; how long has your Night Shelter been an Industrial Shelter?—Only since 16th November—practically a month.

9412. How many men have passed through it?—The number of men who have passed through it have been over 60, and there are 44 in it just now.

9413. Sixty have passed through, and of these how many have got into permanent employment?—None yet.

9314. When I speak of passing through it I mean entered, remained in it, and quitted it for permanent places?—None have quitted it for permanent places.

9415. But 16 have left it?—Yes. We have got 44 just now, and the others have left because they did not care to do the work.

9416. After a sojourn of how long?—Some of them a week, others a fortnight, and so on.

9417. None of them have left for permanent places?—None.

9418. Take the Labour Yard; you have had that for more than a year?—For ten years.

9419. How many had you in at the first of your year?—From the first of November last we offered 617 during that time work in that Yard.

9420. And how many accepted it?—251.

9421. And of the 251 have you any statistics showing how many stayed with you, passed through, and got permanent employment?—Well, I have not got the figures, but a good many left after remaining four or five weeks, or getting permanent employment. If, at the end of the time, four or five weeks, they had no prospect of work, we might renew the period, but we have occasionally got work ourselves for some of the respectable men in the Yard, but generally we left the men to look out for it themselves.

9422. Have you any classification of the men who took the work?—They are chiefly labourers. I have no classification this year.

9423. Have you no classification of those throughout the year?—We had a classification of those who applied to us.

9424. Are there many artisans or tradesmen?—Not many of them. About 50 per cent. would be labourers. Then there will be hammermen, blacksmiths, and such like.

9425. Take skilled tradesmen, not one class; is there 20 per cent. of them?—Oh yes, fully that.

9426. That will leave us 70 per cent.? There must be more than that. Would there be 25 per cent. blacksmiths, carpenters, and so on?—I think you might say 75 per cent. of labourers, and the balance are artisans and tradesmen. If I had known I would have brought down the book.

9427. The 251 men who accepted work in the Yard were chiefly labourers?—Yes.

9428. Do you find that the artisans who have been accustomed to skilled work and good wages will accept your work?—Not readily.

9429. Have you many agricultural labourers?—Not many of them, mostly labourers in shipyards and foundries, and that sort of men.

9430. What are their wages in the city when at work?—From 18s. to 20s. per week.

9431. What do they make with you?—Well, a man can make with us on an average from 1s. 2d. to 1s. 6d. a day. They are put on piece-work. Last week there were two men who made 2s. 6d. a day.

9432. Were these old stagers?—No, they were not. They were strong men, and they seemed to know how to do the work. Their work was wood chopping.

9433. Fifteen shillings from 9 to dark, that is 9 to 4 o'clock, that is seven hours with an hour off for dinner, that is six hours' work, and the possibility of making 15s. a week?—It is only temporary, however.

9434. But you keep them as long as they like there, or have you a time limit in the Labour Yard?—Four or five weeks, if they do not get work before that time.

*Mr. John
Traquair
Strang.*

18 Dec. 1894.

9435. You turn them out?—Yes, we must make room for some others, and we tell them that they have been long enough in, and that they must make a trial to get work. If they satisfy us that they cannot get work we give them an extension of time if we have room.

9436. They make, according to you, from 7s. 6d. to 9s. generally, and in some exceptional cases they go up to 14s. or 15s. for their week's work? That is for six hours' work a day?—Six to seven hours.

9437. Well, six hours in the winter?—Yes.

9438. Where do these live?—Various parts of the city. Many of them live in the East End. Some of them come all the way to us from Govan and some from Partick.

9439. Have you any classification as to their being married or single?—Yes.

9440. Are there many of them married?—A good number, and we give preference to the married men.

9441. Are the majority married men?—Yes.

9442. In the Night Refuge, they are, of course, single men?—Yes, or widowers without family. They are mostly single men.

9443. If a man had a wife or family, would you take him into the lodging-house?—No. We would communicate with the wife and find out why she was away from him, or whether he had left her, and we would recommend him to the Yard. The Shelter is not intended for married men.

9444. In dealing with these men, both in the Shelter and in the Yard, are you particular as to character?—We are not so particular as to character in giving them work, as we are when it is a grant or a loan that has to be given to them.

9445. But, for instance, is there any stipulation as to abstinence or sobriety before you take them into the Shelter?—Oh yes. One of the rules is that no man who is under the influence of drink will be admitted. Of course he may have been given to drink.

9446. You insist upon him coming in sober, and he must behave himself while there?—Yes.

9447. And of course he could not get drink there?—No—only when he may get permission to go out, and of course he would not be readmitted.

9448. How much do they earn in the Shelter?—6s. is the amount they are expected to earn, which is the cost of their keep.

9449. Do you pay them in money?—No, in food. Anything they earn above that is placed to their credit, and they get it when they leave, unless they forfeit it by misconduct. They sign an obligation to that effect when they enter.

9450. None of the men who have left you have had anything yet?—Nothing except one who had to be taken to the police office for disorderly conduct last Saturday night. He was fined 10s. 6d. or seven days, and he had something to his credit. He was a good workman. He had received permission to go out, and got under the influence of drink. He did not say where or how he had got it, but he had no money from us. When he came back he was very abusive and used bad language, so much so that the police had to interfere.

9451. He had some money with you?—Yes. He had a small sum at his credit.

9452. That will be forfeited?—Yes, according to the rules it should be forfeited. He was one of those men employed casually outside at some work for the Corporation.

9453. You send out men from your place?—Oh yes. We invite the public to send to us for men when they want work done. We had four out yesterday.

9454. How do they get paid when they are out? They will get full pay?—They are paid so much a day, but it is paid not to the men but to our Superintendent, who places the amount to their credit, after deducting the cost of their keep in the place.

9455. For outside work a man will earn from 15s. to 20s. a week?—2s. 6d. a day.

9456. How long had that man been at work?—He was there for a week.

9457. You would not consider it a legitimate employment of the balance to pay the fine?—I do not think so. I am afraid the Committee would not think so.

9458. Do you propose to extend this system of Shelters?—We of course have room for extending our present Shelter. There is accommodation there for over 100 men, but meantime we have only made provision for 50.

9459. Have you a Labour Colony or anything of the sort in Kyle Street, Dobbies' Loan?—That is the Industrial Shelter. It is not a Labour Colony.

9460. Now you come in contact with a large number of tramps, I suppose?—A great many tramps. A great many of them come over from Ireland.

9461. They ask assistance from some of your subscribers and they send them to you?—Yes, they do. A man comes over from Belfast, and he is no sooner on shore than he is begging assistance from somebody. They come over entirely penniless, and he is usually wanting to get back again. They often apply to Messrs. G. & J. Burns for a passage back. The firm send them to me and I deal with them. We have a great many American tramps.

9462. Well, what do you do with them?—We send them back, if we are satisfied that the statement they have given is correct.

9463. What do these men come across here for?—They say they come across for work, and they think they can get it in Glasgow.

9464. How long are they here generally before they fall into your hands?—Sometimes a day, but seldom more than a week.

9465. I have been informed by the Association for the Relief of Distressed Foreigners, which I believe works with you, that the foreign tramp in his lodging-house has frequently lists of every one with a smattering of the different foreign languages, and hints as to the story that is best suited to extract money from them. And I was advised, therefore, never to assist needy foreigners applying for relief, except through the agency of the Society. Have you any reason to believe that any similar system exists among the native tramps, that they have ledgerised the people from whom they might get assistance?—I have not heard of that, but I know from experience of the foreigners that come over here that half of them are rank impostors. They come over here and give a wrong name and tell a wrong story, and information is very difficult to be got regarding very many of them, but I have an arrangement with the Foreigners' Relief Society in Leith that if I want to send a man home to his own country I do not give him the passage warrant, because he might contrive to sell it in Leith, but send the order to the Leith Society, and they see him away by the steamer. In that way we get the man back to his own country. In many cases an order has been returned to me, as the man had attempted to sell it and did not want to go home.

9465A. Do you make any similar careful arrangement to prevent him disposing of his ticket to Leith?—We give him the railway ticket, and see him off in the train.

9466. And when you send a man back to Belfast?—We give an order to Messrs. G. & J. Burns, asking them to give the man a passage. In no case do we give money for warrants for passages, either by train or steamer.

9467. How many people apply to you for relief, or are referred to you in the course of a year, that is, to the Charity Organisation Society?—Last year we had applications for 11,107.

9468. How did you deal with them?—Of these 5773 were applications on behalf of the Children's Clothing Scheme. Setting aside the 5773, there were 2660 dismissed. They were found to be undeserving. Some had withdrawn their applications. They had found work, they said, and did not require any assistance from us. Others we found to be quite ineligible for various reasons. A good many had given false addresses. Others were found to be cases entirely for the Parochial Board to deal with. Then we disposed indirectly of 1600 by referring them to such local institutions as were found to be suitable for them, and to private parties who wished information regarding them before they gave any assistance; and others were referred to the various Charity Organisation Societies throughout the kingdom who wished information from us.

9469. Others, you say, were sent to the various Charity Organisation Societies?—Well, information regarding them was given. They were not on the spot. They belonged to Glasgow, and they were applying to these Societies, or some of their subscribers, and they wanted information from us about them. Then we assisted directly ourselves, because there was no agency suitable for them here, 1415 by giving money grants and loans, and paying fares.

9470. You assisted directly 1415?—Well, of that number we assisted 862 by grants, loans, fares, lodging, and clothing; and 431 were assisted by employment, temporary employment and casual employment, and employment in our Labour Yard, and a number of women we get office cleaning for, charring work, and sewing.

9471. That includes your Labour Yard?—Yes, that includes the 251 men. Then we assisted 122 medically by giving them lines to the infirmaries and convalescent homes, and providing professional attendance at the homes of the applicants. According to the law of Scotland, an able-bodied man who has a sick wife or child in his house cannot get medical relief from the Parochial Board. He is refused it, and sent to us, when we provide the necessary medical attendance.

9472. What is your machinery for it?—We have four doctors—one in each district in the city; North, South, East, and West—and the charge they make is merely a nominal one. They are willing to give their services at a very small rate.

9473. These were cases, I suppose, of a nature too trifling for the infirmaries?—Well, they were not suitable for the infirmaries, and could be treated as well at home. A number of them got lines into the infirmaries from us, because they did not know where to get them, or the people to whom they applied did not want to give them the lines and sent them to us.

9474. Now you had 862 to whom you made grants and loans, and paid fares, and lodging tickets and clothing; what is the usual amount of the grant?—From 5s. up to £2, according to what the Committee think is required at the time.

9476. You distinguish between your grants and loans?—Yes, the loans are not given unless people are able to give us some personal security.

9477. Do you expect these grants ever to be refunded?—Some of them do occasionally refund them without being asked.

9478. Big ones?—Not very large ones. Perhaps £1.

9479. Out of £50 granted how much would you expect to get back?—Not very much in the way of grants.

9480. But you do sometimes get them back?—Yes. We do not ask them to repay. It is a donation given to them to help them, and some of them make a point of repaying, but very few of them.

9481. Then for loans you require some security?—Yes, we always ask for some personal security, if it is above a pound—that is, that some other person becomes responsible for the payment of it.

9482. Do you insist upon the person being a solvent person?—He must be a person who is able to undertake the small responsibility.

9483. Have you often to come upon the surety?—Only once or twice. Not during this year, and during last year the loans have been very well repaid by the parties themselves.

9484. How much were your loans last year?—They would be about £30. Not very much; the Committee is very careful as to granting loans.

9485. The fact is, that the original purpose of your Association was not to disburse charity at all, but simply to make inquiries and to prevent the overlapping of charities?—Yes, and to repress mendicity.

9486. And this extra work has been entirely forced upon you?—Yes, by the very nature of our work we have been compelled to a large extent to become the almoners of the public. A number of people themselves give us money to disburse. Some even on behalf of their own clients.

9487. Have the London Charity Organisation Society gone into any of these schemes?—Not the Shelter, but they do not need to do so in London. Last year I had a talk with Mr. Loch, the secretary, on the matter. He did not think it was a wise thing for us to do, but I explained to him the difference between the English and Scotch Poor Law.

9488. Give us it?—An able-bodied man in Scotland cannot be dealt with by the Parochial Board.

9489. Well, that is true; but the cases that your Shelter is intended to deal with, are they necessarily such cases as in England would be dealt with by the Parochial authorities?—By the Casual Wards.

9490. But the Casual Wards do not take in men permanently? It is only for a night?—The man has to remain three nights.

9491. He may remain?—He has to remain if he is to do his work. I visited St. Giles Casual Ward in London a year ago. I may be misinformed, but I understood it was three days before he could accomplish the amount of work he had to do.

9492. About women, you do nothing for them except what is done by the Ladies' Auxiliary?—That is for sewing; but there are a great many respectable widows we assist by grants or recommend to other institutions, and we put the names of respectable women upon our lists for work for office-cleaning and such like.

9493. You have found employment for about 400 people in the course of the year. I suppose you have got machinery which enables you to find employment for about that number, and you mention that they work at wood-chopping, stone-breaking, and carpet-beating?—Yes.

9495. Is there nothing beyond laundry work and sewing that suggests itself to your mind as a possible employment for women?—Not in the meantime. The difficulty is about interfering with other trades. It always leads to an outcry.

9496. In the matter of wood-chopping, who does that apart from you and the boys at Mr. Quarrier's Home?—The Parochial Boards all do it.

9497. Are there no outdoor labourers that do wood-chopping?—There are some wood and coal merchants do a little in that way.

9498. Do their employees not grumble at the bread being taken out of their mouths?—No; we pay more for wood-chopping than they do, and we sell at the same rate, and we buy our wood in the open-market. We don't get any advantages in any way.

Mr. John
Traquair
Strang.

18 Dec. 1894.

Mr. John
Traquair
Strang.

18 Dec. 1894.

9499. What profit is to be made at the wood-chopping?—There is none by us, for we lose over £200 a year because we have always more men than we require, and they are unskilled and unaccustomed to the work, and when they get into the way of it they generally fall into other work.

9500. Now about the stone-breaking: how does it work out financially?—I think we lose on it too, but I am not able to say anything as to the results of that yet, as we have not sold any of the stones that we have broken.

9501. When did you introduce the stone-breaking?—Just at the opening of the Shelter.

9502. I think you had it in the Labour Yard?—We have it in the Yard, because we have no room for it at the Shelter. It is in connection with the Shelter.

9503. How much is the task of a stone-breaker for his shilling a day?—He is paid at the rate of 2s. per cubic yard of stones, which is the usual rate.

9504. Do you know what the ordinary stone-breaker on the roadside may make?—I do not know, but I am told they make very good wages.

9505. Your stone-breakers have only to break half a yard in order to earn their shilling?—That is what each man would require to break. When we wanted one or two from the yard to chop wood at the Shelter, two of the men declined to go, as they were doing so well at the stone-breaking.

9506. Stone-breaking is a business that is more valuable as a means of living outside than wood-chopping?—Oh yes.

9507. What sort of stones is it you break?—A sort of whin.

9508. The usual stuff that is used for macadamising?—The same metal that is used by the Corporation contractors. The Corporation have undertaken to take it from us through their contractor, if we make it of the same metal and have it properly broken.

9509. You have never ascertained from the contractors what the ordinary stone-breaker working for himself can turn out?—His wages are about 24s. a week, I understand.

9510. At 2s. a cubic yard?—It is 2s. 2d. the outside rate, I think, but we pay only 2s.

9511. That is about 11 cubic yards in a week. Close on 2 cubic yards per day is what they must turn out?—Yes.

9512. And your task is only a quarter of that?—Yes.

9513. Of course a fresh hand cannot do anything like the full amount of work?—Oh no. There is a knack in nipping the stone and in the way of holding the hammer. A great many at first break the hammer handles, because they are not breaking stones in the right way. We have at present an experienced stone-breaker to teach them.

9514. Do you find that the men rapidly pull up in the amount of work they can turn out?—Oh yes. Those who are willing to work very soon get into it. But our Superintendent tells me that very often when a man earns his shilling he does not care to work another hand's turn.

9515. Do you encourage those men who exhibit this spirit?—No; we compel them to work on. When they have earned their shilling they want to get out, but they have not a sufficient excuse, and as they evidently wish to evade doing any more work that day, the Superintendent refuses to allow them.

9516. Now, in the matter of tramps, from what you have told us a very large percentage are undeserving?—Yes.

9517. I suppose you come across a number of decent workmen?—Yes; but a large number are undeserving, and will never be anything else unless severe measures are taken with them.

9518. You mention that you assist some of them by providing them with lodgings outside your Shelter: how do you do that?—We give a note to the Superintendent of one of the lodging-houses to provide the man with a night's lodging and food.

9519. And that is strictly non-transferable?—Strictly; it is a note to the Superintendent, and he charges us with the cost. Each individual costs us 9d. We give extra to a man of that kind.

9520. What does he get for the 9d.?—Porridge and milk in the morning, and if he remains on during the day, as he sometimes has to do under special circumstances, he gets soup and bread, or perhaps tea, if he prefers it, and he gets porridge again to his supper.

9521. You stated just now that the undeserving class of tramps would always form a very large percentage of the tramp class unless some stringent steps were taken: what steps would you suggest?—I would confine him and make him work.

9522. You could hardly do that for merely tramping?—And begging; the tramps are begging.

9523. Of course, a large number of them?—They exist in that way. If they are tramping they are begging.

9524. Well, but how to get at the beggar?—I think the police ought to look after them very sharply.

9525. Well, people are loth to complain about begging?—Yes; I know.

9526. The existence of your Society gives them a sort of sop for their conscience. They give the man a reference to you, having paid their subscription to you, and they think they are assisting him if he is deserving; but if they have not got an outlet in the Charity Organisation they may give him a penny and never dream of complaining; is that not so?—That is quite true.

9527. You have done your utmost as a Society to try and induce people not to give alms, and I suppose you have absolutely failed?—We fail in some respects; but there is a certain class of people who will give, who cannot resist an appeal from any of those persons coming to them; but we have made very great progress in the way of preventing indiscriminate charity. It is not nearly so common as it used to be.

9531. You have spoken about 5773 people, or applicants, who have been assisted through the Children's Clothing Scheme. What is that?—They have not been assisted to that number. There are 5773 children applied for. They do not apply themselves, but applications on their behalf come to us through school teachers or the police, and through visitors in connection with churches who come across them and consider them to be needy cases. They represent 2342 families. These children were all under fourteen years of age. We clad, after due investigation, 3518. 1011 were not clad by us, but were referred to other agencies to be dealt with in a way that we could not do.

9532. As for example?—Well, there were a great many of them put under the supervision of the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Society, and with salutary effects in many cases I am glad to say. After a considerable amount of watching some of them have done their duty to their children.

9533. Others?—Others were declined entirely. 1244 were declined. They were in receipt of Parochial relief, and were therefore receiving, or entitled to receive, the necessary clothing from the Boards in virtue of being on the roll; and others were found not to require any assistance.

9534. Now take the case of the 3518 you assisted: what protection did you take to prevent the clothing being misappropriated?—In the first place every article was stamped, both boots and garments. Intimation was sent to the pawnbrokers through the police that the articles issued by the Society remained the property of the Society, that they bore certain marks, and that it would be illegal to take them. Then the police in the district were advised by the convener of our Committee that there were children clothed in such and such a place, with a request that they were to keep them under their supervision. The school teachers were also advised regarding those who were attending schools. We had all these checks. The pawnbrokers, I am glad to say, have co-operated well with us.

9535. Have there been any attempts?—There have been a few; not more than a dozen came before us last winter, and all these were unsuccessful. The pawnbrokers sent notice to us through the police.

9536. How long has your scheme been in operation?—It commenced last winter.

9537. And it was successful?—It was successful last winter. I do not think the public or any one knows the amount of labour that has been undertaken in connection with it. It is not the mere giving the children clothing, but it has brought before us a great many distressing cases of children neglected by parents not doing their duty towards them who were perfectly able to do it. Attention was called to the matter, and they were put under the supervision of the Cruelty to Children officers, and a great change took place.

9538. In the investigations into these cases you saw a great deal of the more squalid side of Glasgow life?—Some of it exceedingly bad. Some of it revealed a revolting state of child life which one would scarcely think possible.

9539. I saw in a paper yesterday the case of a man, a labourer, I think, who had been found dead in his house; and when the police went there they found no bed, only a few rags on the floor, and a lot of children lying on that—in fact the most abject state of dirt and misery. The man had been in ill-health and had died, I suppose. That is not a rare occurrence—I do not mean the man dying, but I mean the squalidness?—Oh, there are a great many cases we come across where there is not a thing in the house.

9540. Where do the children lie?—On the floor, in whatever clothes they may have, in their dirt and misery.

9541. I have asked you this for this purpose: do you think, in the case of children brought up in that condition, it would be any great punishment to spend a few days in a prison cell?—For the parents?

9542. No. Do you think it would be any great punishment on the children to exchange sleeping on the floor in their ragged clothes, without much covering and without fire, to exchange that for a week in the cell of a prison; do you think that imprisonment would be likely to have any deterrent effect upon such children?—I do not think it.

9543. You have seen so much squalor in the lives of these children, and I suppose young persons, that to many of them there must be mitigating virtues in prison life in regard to comfort, good feeding, and so on?—Oh yes. It would not have any effect on the children. They are not able to control themselves.

9544. I am not talking of the children. I am asking you to give us your opinion as to what you have seen, and it is for us to judge of the deterrent effects. Many of these children are petty criminals, many of them up for thefts, and so on?—I have not come across any.

9545. No?—Not in connection with our clothing scheme. We have had a large number passed through our hands—5773—and I have not seen a single report about them being guilty of theft.

9546. I was not casting any aspersion upon your children, but there are a great many taken up for petty thefts, and they are all found in reformatories and jails?—I do not approve of them being sent to prison.

9547. I did not express any approval. You think they would be much better kept out of prison?—Yes; they would be better taken from home, but not to prison. There should be some way of dealing with them in an institution.

9548. In connection with tramps, you have not told us anything as to the children: are there a great number of children of tramps going about?—There have not many come under our notice in Glasgow. There are more, I believe, in the country and other places. The tramp who passes through Glasgow is the single man or the man who has deserted his wife or family in some other part of the country.

9549. But have you had the case of a man applying to you with children?—I have had cases of men turned out with their children from their houses in Glasgow, and we have had to lodge them for a time.

9550. What do you do with the wife and children in these cases?—They are lodged also.

9551. Where do you send the wife and children?—To the Night Asylum. A lodging-house will not take a man and his family. You must send the man to a men's lodging-house, and the woman and her children to a female lodging-house, and the female lodging-house does not care to take in children.

9552. Then, about the Night Asylum: you know it?—Yes.

9553. How are the inmates treated there: do they get supper after they go in?—Yes; and they get something next morning.

9554. How do they sleep?—On a shakedown on the floor.

9555. Or do they sleep on the boards?—No, they have something to lie on, but it is not comfortable; I have not seen it, but it is not the bare floor, indeed I was asking that question yesterday.

9556. (By Col. M'Hardy.) What is the general character of the men who come to you for relief, I mean the adults, are they people of irregular lives?—Well, a large number of them are men who have been in employment, labouring men who have been thrown out of employment by dull trade. They have, unfortunately, small wages, and they have, still more unfortunately, large families. They are not many days out of employment until they are on the rocks and require assistance. We have a great many of that class.

9557. That is a resident class you are speaking of?—Yes.

9558. When work fails in the country generally, I suppose the numbers applying to you must increase enormously?—Principally in the winter.

9559. Now I understand you to say that the great bulk of them, when they get the test of labour which you set them, leave it?—A great many of them do. Some of them refuse entirely to take any work.

9560. I think you say about 60 per cent. of those applying won't work?—Yes; some of them go for an hour or two, and some of them for a day, and then they leave.

9561. How do you explain them going away when you tell me that they are really men who have been in work and have lost that work through trade variations, but that they won't work for you, the great bulk of them?—Well, I cannot tell why they won't work. They prefer to have assistance and to go about looking for work for themselves, some of them say.

9562. That is going about Glasgow you mean, I suppose?—Yes.

9563. But the numbers that go about Glasgow begging are apparently comparatively small. The judicial statistics returns for last year show that there are only 460 convictions for begging altogether?—Yes.

9564. I want to get at the life of those people—the 60 per cent. of those who apply to you and who refuse your labour test—can you tell us how they exist?—They must be begging, but I cannot tell exactly: I am not prepared to say definitely.

9565. But it is the great majority of the people you meet with?—That is the fact. Those that come before us are offered this work, and they refuse it.

9566. I should like to press this question, because it seems to be the great majority of the people you deal with; have you never looked up or found out from the police or any other way what they do, or what becomes of them?—No.

9567. Labour that you give them is not very severe, and apparently from what you tell us and the Chairman it is only a quarter of what the ordinary working man does?—That is the cost of his keep. He must earn that in a day. Of course if he earns more than that it is placed to his credit. He must at least earn his own keep in a day.

9568. But I understood they did not earn very much more?—They are not disposed to earn very much more evidently from what our Superintendent tells me.

9569. I can understand that the thoroughly untrained man in breaking stones may not do nearly so much as one who has been at it all his life, but if these men are labouring men who have been thrown out of work, they must be acquainted with the use of tools, the ordinary tools for labouring work, and they can certainly produce more than half a yard cubic a day. Your Society as soon as they come up to the minimum does not urge them to go on and really to work so as to amass money for the coming day?—Well, we don't urge them to do any more than will keep them for the time being. Our work is simply work instead of relief. We want to tide them over the time being. We are not wishing to give them good wages, so as to induce them to settle down there.

9570. But you can sell the stone?—At a loss.

9571. I do not understand why you do not urge these men to do more than they do. You apparently are winking at their doing very much, provided they pay for their cost of lodging?—No, we encourage them to do more by telling them that if they earn over and above their cost, it will be placed to their credit.

9572. Yes, but I cannot understand that the ordinary working man of this country, unless he is a waif, if he saw his chance of making 2s. 6d. a day, would not make it. How do you explain that?—There are a lot of these men, so far as we see, who are apparently able enough, but they don't wish to exert themselves.

9573. But that is not the ordinary working Scot, the man who is thrown out of work by the action of trade causes. If he is a loafer, if these men are a fraud, too lazy, I can understand all you have told to the Chairman, but I cannot understand what you told him just now that these are simply men just thrown idle, by the circumstances of trade, against their will?—Well, a great many of them are that.

9574. But still these men won't make 2s. 6d. when they get the chance?—They won't make 2s. 6d., but they make more than those who are of the loafing class.

9575. You say that very, very few make more than 1s. a day, that very few of them wanted to make more. What I am wanting to get at is whether you are correct in saying these men who have come to you are really working labouring men with every desire to work hard, or are simply more or less the loafing class of men?—Well, I would say that about one-third are of the loafing class.

9576. Not more than that?—Not more.

9577. We have arrived at this, that of those who come to you two-thirds refuse work, and of the one-third that do accept the work two-thirds are simply men out of work from circumstances of trade, and the remaining one-third are of the loafing class?—Yes; it is those who have accepted work only that I have to speak of; I don't know about the others except that they refuse our work. Of that number there are a great many quite willing to work and try to make the most they can. There are others who, whether from physical incapacity or unwillingness I cannot tell, do not, I suspect perhaps it is both.

9578. What I wanted to get at is this: have you through your Society sufficient means to offer work and to provide work for every man who is anxious to work but has not got work in Glasgow?—Not if there were a large number of them. We would require to apply, as we have done before, to the magistrates to provide work.

9580. Apparently by increasing your labour test a little bit you would knock off another third?—Yes.

9581. So that possibly you would get at the residuum who are anxious to work?—Yes. Even at present, I might say, we would require an extension of our machinery. As it is we have not got sufficient to overtake all that apply. We have to refuse every week a number of men who want to get work.

9582. (By the Chairman.) Have you got a pay-sheet for the Shelter or the Yard?—We have a pay-book which our Superintendent keeps in the Yard.

9583. Could he give us a week's pay-sheet of each?—Yes.

9584. Will you send them to the Secretary?—Yes.

9585. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Your Society has been formed for the purpose of centralising benevolent efforts?—Yes; to prevent overlapping.

9586. Now, there is a Society called the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society in Glasgow which exercises itself largely in obtaining labour for prisoners?—Yes.

9587. In what way do you co-operate with that Society?—The Superintendent, Mr. Lawson, when he cannot get work for some of his prisoners or has a little doubt about a man, and wishes him tried for a short time, sends him with a note and asks me to give him a fortnight's work in our Yard, and report to him how he gets on.

9588. So that you are in full touch with that Society?—Yes.

9589. You don't, I understand, pay rent for the Yard which you occupy for stone-breaking and wood-chopping in Alexandra Parade?—No, we get it rent free from the magistrates.

9590. What area do you occupy; roughly, is it 2 acres?—It is about 1 acre.

9591. What would be the rent of it, supposing it were charged by the Corporation?—I should think it would be £30 or £40 a year, judging by what was asked for a piece of ground next to our Shelter in Port Dundas about the same size, and which we were looking at about a year ago. They wanted £40 a year, or £2 a square yard if we would buy it.

9592. As to the artisans who come to you, as distinct from the labourers, are these artisans first-class workmen?—No; I am not prepared to say they are. There might be one or two among them.

Mr. John

Mr. John
Traquair
Strong.

18 Dec. 1894.

9593. As a matter of fact it is a thing unknown for a first-class workman, except under the most exceptional circumstances, to be wandering about in search of employment?—In our experience there is something radically wrong when he is; it is drink or something.

9594. But the normal, well-doing, first-class workman, have you ever seen him begging or requiring relief from anybody?—Well, we had a few cases of that kind during the recent great coal strike.

9595. In an exceptional time?—Yes.

9596. But it is a very rare thing to find in this country?—Very rare; there is something radically wrong when a regular, well-behaved working man is out.

9597. You told us some very interesting things about the numbers who came into Glasgow by sea in search of work: can you give us the number of those that you dealt with?—No; I have not got any record.

9598. How many have you sent back to Ireland in a year?—I cannot just detail it; I have not got the particulars.

9599. Could you give us an approximation?—In summer time especially we have two or three a week.

9600. Sent back?—No; coming over from Ireland and applying. They are not all sent back, because we find some of them are not telling what is correct.

9601. How many are sent back?—Perhaps 20 or 30 in a year.

9602. That is a small number?—That is out of perhaps about 50 applications to me.

9603. But of course the number of people coming to Glasgow from Ireland in order to work in Scotland at potato digging, harvest work, and other things is enormously larger than the figures you have given?—Oh yes.

9604. So that it is comparatively a small number?—Yes, of Irish.

9605. Is any objection made by any of the Irish authorities to your sending these people back?—No.

9606. Never heard of that?—No; but I have difficulty in getting information from the Irish authorities about these people. It looks very much as if they did not want them back.

9607. (By Miss Stevenson.) Do the women employed through the Ladies' Auxiliary undertake the making of clothing that is given to the children under the scheme for clothing destitute children?—Not altogether; they get a part of it to do.

9608. Who does the rest?—The rest was done by the ladies themselves last year.

9609. You have not in connection with your Association any workroom for women analogous to the Labour Shelter you have for the men?—No, not beyond what is kept up by the Ladies' Auxiliary.

9610. You said that when married people came to you, you could not get lodgings for them without sending the man to one place and the woman to another; have you no lodgings in Glasgow for married persons and women?—No; not together, unless in the ordinary private lodging-houses, which we don't deal with. It is only the Corporation lodging-houses we send to.

9611. And the Corporation of Glasgow have no such lodging-houses for married persons as they have in Edinburgh?—No.

9612. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Is begging and vagrancy in your opinion adequately looked after by the police?—Yes; I think it is looked after very well by the police. I am of opinion that there are a great many cases that elude the vigilance of the police, but that is not their fault.

9613. Are there very many inveterate beggars in Glasgow and suburbs?—There are.

9614. And the police don't deal with these people?—Because they don't come under their notice. The people to whom they apply don't report them, and the police don't know of them. The police may see a man or a woman going up a close, but it is difficult for them to tell what they are doing, or what errand they might be on.

9615. Do the police interfere at all with single men or women and children who go into back courtyards and sing all day long for alms?—I am not aware of them doing it.

9616. Was not your Shelter in Kyle Street instituted as a feeder to a prospective labour colony?—No, it was not.

9617. Was there during the negotiations with the Association for Improving the Condition of the People no such idea mooted?—Well, the Association for the Improvement of the Condition of the People meant it to be a feeder to their labour colony when they got one started, but I have often told them that I thought there was a more effective and less expensive way of dealing with these men than that. When a man is sent to a labour colony what is he to attain to? He is simply perhaps to make his own bare living; but the object of this Shelter ought to be to get a man lifted out of the state into which he has fallen and get him back to work, where he will earn eighteen to twenty shillings a week. He will never earn that in a labour colony.

9618. That is your view; but there was an idea at the time that the Shelter was started that it would be a feeder to the labour colony?—That is so.

9619. You don't restrict a man as to work?—The more work a man can do the better for himself.

9620. Do you mean to say that you don't come across good artisans searching for employment?—They don't apply to us nor to any relief association.

9621. But do you know if there are skilled artisans, many of them, in Glasgow in search of employment although they don't come under your cognisance?—I believe there are, but they don't apply for charity.

9622. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Did you say that your labour test, speaking generally, was a means of distinguishing between the mere loafer and the man who wants to work?—Thoroughly.

9623. Then, when you had the Shelter on the old principle, was it taken too much advantage of by the loafer without the labour test; was that not the way you began first, with a Shelter where there was no labour test?—No; our Labour Yard was the first begun; we had no Shelter. Before we opened our Labour Ward we gave assistance to able-bodied men, but the Committee considered that the proper kind of relief to an able-bodied man should be founded upon work. It is not degrading to give a man work to do, though at a small rate. A number of them prefer it. They say they don't want charity.

9624. I think you said you would like to have your machinery extended?—Yes.

9625. Do you mean by that that you would like a greater variety of work introduced?—Yes, more work and more room to give more men work, and a variety of kinds of work.

9626. What variety would you prefer?—That is exercising the attention of the Committee just now in connection with the Shelter. We have got stone-breaking, wood-chopping, and carpet-beating, and we have got an offer of hair-teasing from one of the public institutions in Glasgow, and we have also had an offer of teasing rope, that is, teasing old ropes back into hemp. I don't know exactly what other kinds of work might be given, but we are on the look-out for other kinds.

9627. Have you any opinion as to the respective merits of indoor and outdoor work?—We would prefer to get them all outdoor work.

9628. Do you think their chance of getting work afterwards would be better by putting them on that kind of line?—Yes, I think so; many of them would be picked up and would get into regular work in that way. We have a few, as I explained, doing outside work just now from the Shelter.

9629. Is there a restricted scope for stone-breaking and wood-chopping?—We cannot supply the demand for firewood at the present time.

Mr. John

18 Dec. 1894.

Mr. John
Traquair
Strang.

18 Dec. 1894.

9630. In regard to the stone-breaking, is it not the case that the breaking of road metal is now done pretty much by machinery?—I believe there is a great deal of it broken by machinery.

9631. Do you call the wood-chopping skilled labour?—It requires a little practice. The man requires to know how to hold his hatchet and the wood so as not to chop off his fingers, and he requires to be careful at first till he gets into the way of it. At first we got the men to saw the wood, but now we get it sawn for them by the aid of a gas engine.

9632. You don't make any arrangements for getting them work?—Except by asking the public in our annual report to apply to us when they want respectable men or women. They sometimes apply to us.

9633. Do you consider it would be of importance in your machinery if you had a labour bureau?—Well, my answer would just be what I said at Rochdale last year, at the Conference there. One of the newspapers here in Glasgow had something of that kind last winter, but it was not very successful. They offered to advertise free of charge, and they had a large number of applications, but it was a very small number that they evidently got into work. I explained that there was no need for employers of labour to apply to a labour bureau, because they have at their gates every morning plenty of people applying for work from whom they can select.

9634. Then, has a working man out of work suddenly arriving in Glasgow any difficulty in finding out your place; how does he find it out?—There is no difficulty apparently. They seem to be no sooner in the city than they find it out. They apply generally to some private individual at first, from whom they get a note or one of our investigation tickets, and they find us in that way.

9635. Suppose a man comes to your door, and has no ticket or friend, do you put him on the way to get a ticket from a subscriber?—No; we take his name down if we think he is a bona fide case.

9636. And if he is absolutely destitute he is sent to your Shelter or elsewhere?—Yes.

9637. There is no difficulty in a man coming suddenly into Glasgow getting shelter?—So far as we are concerned there is no difficulty, but inquiry is made afterwards about them.

9638. You say you would like to lock up the beggar; you would have a certain number of convictions, I suppose?—Well, I would not shut him up on a first conviction, but I would on a second. Alongside that I think there should be some plan or system whereby a magistrate, having a case of that kind, should pass him on to some agency for work, with a request to give him work, and report how he is doing. If a man leaves in a short time and is again found begging, then I would deal with him.

9639. Would you shut him up permanently?—I would send him to prison.

9640. Would you make the law more stringent?—I think it would need to be more stringent.

9641. (By the Chairman.) We were told that there were 5300 people who last year sought and got shelter for the night in the police offices of Glasgow; do you know anything about that?—No.

9642. Bailie Chisholm, when he was asked whether there was any provision the same as casual wards in Glasgow, said no, but that there were a considerable number of people who came to the police offices for protection and were kept there for a night. As a fact, 5304 persons did at their own solicitation receive protection in the police offices last year. Captain Boyd, the Chief-Constable, corroborates that. He said they had a great many people who came and asked protection and shelter for the night. You have heard now that there are 5300 of these people who applied to the police last year for shelter—that is nearly as large a number as applied to you altogether, in fact it is a larger number of adults than applied to you altogether—and you were not aware of the existence of this?—I was not, and I am surprised to hear it.

9643. And you have no case referred to you by the police from that lot?—No. [Witness then withdrew.]

Mr. John
Traquair
Strang.

18 Dec. 1894.

Mr. Robert
Patrick
Wright.

MR. ROBERT PATRICK WRIGHT, F.H.A.S., Professor of Agriculture in the Glasgow and West of Scotland Technical College, called in and examined.

Mr. Robert
Patrick
Wright.

9644. (By the Chairman.) You are Professor of Agriculture in the Glasgow and West of Scotland Technical College?—I am.

9645. You were one of the Committee appointed by the Association for Improving the Condition of the People to inquire into and report on the subject of labour colonies, and with that view you visited Germany?—Yes.

9646. The Committee consisted of Professor Mavor, yourself, Mr. Motion, and Mr. Speir?—Yes.

9647. Tell us the general principle of these labour colonies?—The general principle of the colonies is to establish farms where work can be provided for any men who apply, and who say they are out of work. In return for their work they receive practically board and lodging, with, in certain cases, a slight addition in wages. That is, I think, the central principle of the labour colony.

9648. You divide them in this pamphlet of yours into two classes—self-contained or non-competitive and competitive? Some of them produce simply materials for their own maintenance and others produce for sale in the markets?—That is so. They are generally divided into these two classes, but the distinction is made more precise in our recommendation than it is in reality. The recommendation submitted the two alternative methods, but in Germany I do not think the two alternatives are so distinctly separated. Perhaps I should say that, apart from that visit, I visited some other colonies this summer.

9649. What colonies did you visit in connection with the deputation?—As a member of the deputation I visited the labour colony in Berlin itself, which is not a farm colony, but has a small farm colony connected with it, and the farm colonies at Fredricks-wille, in the province of Brandenburg, and at Rickling, in Schleswig-Holstein. We also visited the Salvation Army farm colony at Hadleigh-on-Thames in Essex.

9650. Then let us take the colony at Berlin; how does it work?—It works successfully.

9651. But let us have the machinery; how are the men admitted?—I shall have to refer you to the report. The inspection of the city colony fell more to Mr. Motion; I was connected more with the inspection of farm colonies. In the case of the farm colonies the men are admitted on their own application. I am not quite certain if there is any difference in regard to the labour colony in the city. Referring to the supplement to the report I see that the principle appears to be the same, namely, that men are admitted when they apply.

9652. The Berlin place is more of a receiving agency?—The Berlin colony, so-called, was originally so. It was established altogether apart from the farm colony system, and the managers emphatically advised us that no colony should be started on the same principle again, and that it was extremely difficult to manage the men apart from the farm colony, to which the men could be drafted.

9653. I think there is a statement in your report as to the men's earnings and their cost?—Yes.

9654. A man goes in there, and he is obliged to do a certain amount of work. His maintenance costs about 3s. 6d. a week?—The total cost of food, as stated in our report, is three shillings.

9655. And besides they are obliged to pay on his behalf twopence a week for insurance for an old age

Mr. Robert
Patrick
Wright.

18 Dec. 1894.

pension and a halfpenny a week against sickness?—That is not within my province; I do not remember about it.

9656. Well, let us take one of the pure farm colonies; how are the people got to the farm colonies?—The men apply. They simply go to the farm, and are generally received if they are men in good health. They decline to receive men who are sick. They decline also to receive men who are too old to earn their own living by working. Every able-bodied applicant who says he is in a state of poverty is received, provided there is no record against him as having been an unmanageable vagabond in any of the other colonies.

9657. When he gets there has he to come under any obligation to stay for a certain time, or is there no limit as to what the amount of time should be?—He can remain. There is in each of the colonies a different regulation in that respect. In some of the colonies the men are received for two or three days—generally that is the principle—to see if the colony life will suit them, and if they will like it. After that they have to sign an agreement as a rule to remain for a few weeks. The length of time is variable in different colonies. Subsequently there is no fixed agreement. They simply remain till they find situations either by their own exertions or through the exertions of the colony.

9658. But is there any limit at which they are turned out?—The limit in some of the colonies is two years. There is no absolute limit, but it is said that a hint is given to them to leave.

9659. What is the cost of their subsistence?—It varies very much according to the farm that has been selected.

9660. Per man I mean?—Yes; it depends on the nature of the farm that has been selected.

9661. At Schleswig-Holstein, for instance?—Of the colonies visited by us the cost, that is, the deficit incurred—

9662. No; I want to take a colony so far as regards the individual?—The expenditure over and above his food is £8 to £12 per annum.

9663. But the man does not benefit by the establishment expenses?—No.

9664. You have a statement in the report, I think, of the cost of the men?—These are in a measure estimates. They run from three shillings to three and sixpence a week per man.

9665. Does the man get any wages besides?—After having been there for a certain length of time. Each colony has its own regulations. Perhaps when a man has been there a month or six weeks a small allowance is made to him, in addition to his wages.

9666. And that is hoarded up by the authorities?—In the first instance, it is kept to pay the cost of the clothing which would be given to him when he enters the colony. Subsequently it is hoarded up for him by the colony.

9667. Can you tell us anything about the average earnings of the men during their stay in the colonies?—I am not sure that I have any particulars of that fact.

9668. The deficit of which you have spoken of, £10 or £12 a year, there is no encroachment made upon the man's earnings to try and make up that deficit?—No.

9669. In these colonies they have got certain statutory powers of detention and for the purpose of enforcing discipline and legalising detention of the accumulated earnings in cases of breach of the rules of the establishment which don't exist in this country?—They have no powers to detain the men so far as I am aware.

9670. We have a statement made to us that the powers are much more extensive in Germany with regard to people in these colonies?—I understand that these regulations apply to ordinary tramps outside the colonies, but they do not seem to be enforced with regard to men in the colonies. I have never heard any reference to police interference in the actual management of the colonies. I think you will find my statement correct that they do not apply these powers on the colonies.

Mr. Robert
Patrick
Wright.

18 Dec. 1894.

9671. Can you tell me the meaning of this paragraph in your own report?—"It has to be borne in mind that the German criminal law is more comprehensive than our own in so far as it confers more extensive powers over the class of persons for whom the labour colony is intended, that is to say, the laws prevailing in Germany take up and deal with these cases." Can you tell us what powers are conferred by the German laws on persons who carry on or manage or take care of these labour colonies? The point I wish to emphasise is more as to the imprisonment and punishment under the 365th section of the German Code?—Well, it appears to be applied to men engaged in begging and vagabondage. It is not applied to men on the colonies or while they remain on the colonies.

9672. This deficit of £8 to £12 you speak of per head, is it brought out after allowing full value for the man's food by the colonies?—No; that is not so. It is a deficit incurred altogether apart from the original capital invested in the colony, or the added capital value of the colony by improvement or otherwise. It is the annual balance between revenue and expenditure.

9673. But then that is absolutely misleading and erroneous. The farm we shall say cost £1000. It consisted of moorland, and it is improved to the extent of £500 by labour. Is that £500 credited before bringing out this deficit?—No.

9674. Then do you make out that these are paying concerns?—No; I can't say that. Take, for example, the colony at Rickling, where land has been taken to improve. Some think that the whole of the expenditure in the colony has been recovered in the improved value of the land, but no one could definitely prove that, and we were very sceptical in regard to this. It depends very much on the nature of the subject originally taken.

9675. You have told us about several labour colonies. Are they all for the employment of males?—Entirely.

9676. And what would you do with the corresponding class of females?—As far as I am aware there is no system of a similar character for dealing with the female.

9677. There is some machinery for passing on tramps?—There is.

9678. And you cannot explain that?—Not accurately. I have only read about it. There appear to be small stations—herberge—at which tramps obtain a night's shelter, and they are either drafted to the colonies or receive tickets to enable them to get work. It is a sort of lodging-house where they get a night's shelter.

9679. Are they arranged by parishes or supported by a central authority?—I think they are arranged by a central authority. All the farm colonies are associated together, but I am not sure whether the herberge are arranged by that association or a local authority.

9680. Is there any labour test, any equivalent to manual labour for a night's lodging?—I think so.

9681. You don't know anything about labour colonies for women?—No.

9682. I understand there are some compulsory labour colonies?—Not exactly of that nature. The chief branches of the system are three. There is the labour yard in the city, the farm colony in the country, and finally, the House of Correction. I think that is what you refer to in speaking of compulsion.

9683. That is where incorrigible tramps and vagabonds are committed. That is the House of Correction. What is the German term?—I have only got the translation now. I have not got the German name.

9684. And you have not seen any of these working?—No.

9685. Have you any other matter which you can

Mr. Robert
Patrick
Wright.

18 Dec. 1894.

place before us?—Speaking of the question of capital I said that the average cost apart from the question of capital amounted to from £8 to £12 at most of them; but there is one colony, that of Magdeburg, which is said to be self-supporting. That statement is given on the authority of a French Commission which inspected these colonies. The colony of Hadleigh in England has not yet been self-supporting, but a very competent authority—Mr. Moore—on agricultural matters has expressed the opinion that it might be made self-supporting, and I am rather inclined to hold the same opinion, because the nature of the farm has been particularly well-selected.

9686. To what do you attribute the self-supporting nature in Magdeburg as compared with the losing colony?—It entirely depends on the kind of farm and the nature of the land adopted; and in Magdeburg the nature of the farm is largely of the nature of market-gardening, which gives a much larger return than any other mode of farming, the results depending on the various conditions.

9687. But you have said that where the deficit is brought out no credit is taken for the improvement of the land?—Quite so. That raises a point on which it is very difficult to get accurate information, because of all the farms where land has been improved no sale of a farm has occurred, so that only an estimated valuation is available; but on the colony of Rickling some hold that the whole capital has been repaid in the increased value of the land.

9688. You have been at Rickling, and you know the nature of the land?—Yes.

9689. Is that General Booth's scheme?—No, Hadleigh is General Booth's farm.

9690. Does General Booth's scheme include men and women?—When we were there it was entirely male.

9691. Rickling is for habitual drunkards?—No, it is an ordinary farm colony; but there is attached to it a separate institution for habitual drunkards. It is adjacent to it, but not connected with it.

9692. And do the habitual drunkards work on the farm?—The habitual drunkards in the separate institution are kept altogether apart from the colony.

9693. (By Dr. Farquharson.) I think you said that in German colonies they take in men without a character, so to speak?—Oh yes. A man is asked to give a full account of himself, and that account is written down, and then they subsequently make an effort through the officers of the colony to find out through his companions how far his story is accurate; and they say that as a rule they find out pretty well what the man's career has been.

9694. They do not pick men to send to the farms who have had previous agricultural training?—No; they represent all sorts of trades—artisans and tradesmen, and even men of higher education and standing.

9695. Do they find that they soon pick up farming work?—They regard them as inefficient to begin with. The general feeling is that it requires three of them to give labour as good as one agricultural labourer.

9696. That is the first year?—All through on the average.

9697. Was your attention ever called to a report of Sir John McNeil on the four German labour colonies in which he states it would take fifteen to do as much work as one free labourer?—Three or four is the number I have got on all the colonies I have seen, and with regard to the better class of agricultural labour the statement generally was that the better the man was educated the sooner they learned to become efficient labourers.

9698. Their physical weakness does not affect them?—At first it does, but after about two months they generally work well, because they have to lead sober lives under healthy conditions.

9699. Is it found that the purely agricultural labourer does as efficient work as at farms outside?—The purely efficient labourer never goes to the farm colony. It is only the man who has been reduced by drink who goes.

9700. But do not the unemployed agricultural labourers go. I mean a certain number who cannot get work when they want it. Would not their work be equally as efficient as under ordinary circumstances?—That is so.

9701. To what do you attribute the large deficit?—There are large expenses of management to begin with. Then there is the fact that the labour has to be expended in large measure in an unremunerative way, very often in an improvement of waste land. The improvement of very poor land cannot as a rule be made commercially remunerative. To a certain extent it repays the labour, but not fully. Then there is the difficulty, arising from the large number of hands on the farm, of putting the labour to remunerative application. It has often to be diverted to uses merely to keep the men employed. A very great deal depends on the skill of the management.

9702. But you expressed the opinion that if there was good soil it ought to be made remunerative?—It entirely depends on circumstances. If the subject taken is originally of small capital value and is capable of being made very good agricultural soil, then the whole capital might be recouped, but in most cases they have very poor land incapable of being made very good.

9703. But would you charge rent and calculate it?—Properly it should, but I have not included that in the statement I have made.

9704. Does General Booth's colony pay?—Not yet.

9705. Is it likely to?—It certainly fulfils all the conditions of a farm colony better than any I have seen. I have given you Mr. Moore's opinion, and he is a very capable land valuator; and I do not see why it might not become self-supporting, providing too many men are not put on it. If you put more men on it than can be properly employed you cause a deficit.

9706. Are the farms in Germany mixed farms as here?—Yes; as a general rule, however, an attempt has been made to get very poor land.

9707. Have they never taken into consideration the desirability of employing women in agricultural operations? So far as I know it has not been considered. They have always felt it was impossible to put men and women on the same colonies.

9708. But supposing this Committee were prepared to recommend a sphere of labour for chronic inebriates and other chronic offenders, would you not consider that women might be included in that special form of labour colony?—I do not see why they should not; but not on the same colony. You would require separate colonies.

9709. But you do not see why they should not perform work there?—You would require more paid officials and a more expensive management.

9709A. In Germany are the farms worked entirely by the unemployed, or have they any of the chronic inebriates and chronic offenders that we have here?—The statement was made that apart from discharged prisoners 90 per cent. were brought there by drink or sensuality.

9710. Are the chronic inebriates sentenced by the State?—They go there voluntarily, and can come and go when they please. The average duration of their stay is variously given, and I think myself it depends on the character of the superintendent and managers. As far as I can say, the residence on the average appears to be about three months; but while some men remain a very short time, others remain from two to three years, and some even more.

9711. Do they follow them up afterwards?—The colony makes an effort to find occupation for all the best class of men. In some cases they give them certificates of good conduct, but they have no means of following them up further than if their employers chose, or if they give information themselves.

9712. Are they compulsorily kept from drink during the time they are there?—They are not allowed to

Mr. Robert
Patrick
Wright.

18 Dec. 1894.

Mr. Robert
Patrick
Wright.

18 Dec. 1894.

go beyond the farm, and all the colonies are conducted on the temperance principle, except on feast days or special occasions, when they are allowed a little beer, or a man on a special occasion may be allowed 6d. for beer.

9713. What class of agricultural labour do you think best fitted for women?—Market-gardening. The difficulties with regard to women would arise solely where you had heavy work and horse work to do, but on market-gardens it is light labour. Digging is rather heavy work for women, of course.

9714. Is not digging a very large portion of the work?—I am afraid their digging operations would not be very successful. It would have to be done by others.

9715. Would not this difficulty be met by employing a number of hired labourers?—Yes, respectable hired men. You require both more men of the kind and more officials.

9716. (By the Chairman.) How many men would be required per acre for market-gardening. How many free labouring men?—I think one per acre is the maximum that could be employed.

9717. And taking digging into consideration?—Estimating for the whole year round, one efficient labourer per acre.

9718. Then if you employed as much female labour as you could that would reduce it to one for every two or three acres?—Much more, I should think.

9719. How many women would you put on per acre on the highest and most minute form of market-gardening?—The largest number of hands usually employed is one per acre, which includes men and women.

9720. If you allow all these women to do the work of one regular female agricultural worker you could not employ more than six women per acre?—Not so many, therefore you would require a large amount of land to employ them.

9721. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Would you include poultry-farming among the occupations that women might be engaged at?—Yes, it is a suitable branch.

9722. Is it the fact that poultry-farming has invariably failed in this country when tried on a large scale?—Yes; it has failed because it does not give much remuneration. It may pay its way, but there is no chance of a profit except where the labour is given for nothing.

9724. Is it the difficulty about the land?—There is no difficulty over land. It is simply that the prices obtained do not cover the cost.

9725. (By Dr. Sutherland.) How does poultry-farming pay abroad?—Because the labour is not so costly, and they do not include the management expenses, which are so heavy here.

9726. Do you require much land for poultry-farming?—A very limited area.

9727. How many women could you employ on a poultry-farm of 3 or 4 acres?—I do not know, but I will find out.

9728. Would you have flower culture?—That is a branch of market-gardening, of course.

9729. (By the Chairman.) In Mitcham there is a large amount of lavender grown?—Yes.

9730. Then as to dairy-farming?—There is no room for a large number of hands on dairy-farms.

9731. But the London dairies employ a large number. There are the cows to feed as well as the other work?—Yes, of course, but there is not a large number of hands required.

9732. What other occupations would do for women?—Basket-making and various occupations of a light nature.

9733. (By Miss Stevenson.) We were told that most of the baskets that were sold by the itinerant people who go about in vans were made in Germany?—I do not know that, but basket-making is one of the commonest industries that is followed on all the farm colonies. A large number of men are employed in indoor industries in the winter, particularly in basket-making. Packing-box making and net and rope making are other industries.

9734. (By the Chairman.) Is there any other point you would like to bring before us?—Well, with regard to the cost of the farm colony system as compared with the system of relief that was attempted in Glasgow two years ago when temporary occupation was given to men in stone-breaking and various other works in the Alexandra Road, I have compared the figures of the two methods, and I find that the costs of the Glasgow method of relief are considerably greater than those on the farm colonies.

9735. Including capital charges?—Apart from the question of capital; but the capital is fully conserved in the farm colony. There is no loss of capital, you understand. At the same time the Glasgow method is a much less efficient system of giving relief, because it is spasmodic. Such a system of relief is only started in special cases. The farm colony is always there, and keeps those on it under control, whereas the Glasgow method does nothing of that kind. [The witness then withdrew.]

Mr. Robert
Patrick
Wright.

18 Dec. 1894.

Margaret
Watt.

MARGARET WATT, Convict in the Prison of Glasgow, brought in and examined.

Margaret
Watt.

9736. (By Col. McHardy.) This Committee want to know the effect, or what the prisoners think of the different kinds of imprisonment, that is, the way they look at it—the difference between solitary confinement in separate cells, and associated confinement as in Perth. Now you are a tolerably intelligent person, and you have been in Greenock, in Glasgow, and in Perth, so that you know these three. You know this at anyrate, and just tell us what you think of the two kinds, whether you like separate confinement or associated confinement best, and why you do so?—For myself I prefer the separate; but the bulk of the prisoners, all I think that I have come in contact with, prefer the association.

9737. But why do you prefer the separate?—I am not acquainted with any of the prisoners in prison, and I have, of course, very little in common with them.

9738. (By Dr. Sutherland.) But didn't you strongly wish for association in Glasgow?—No, I never wished for it.

9739. (By the Chairman.) You are at present undergoing a sentence of penal servitude pronounced when and for how long?—I was sentenced on the 31st October last for five years.

9740. For theft?—Yes; I was charged with theft.

9741. You have had several convictions?—I have had four convictions before.

9742. All for the same thing?—All for that.

9743. And you have had another penal servitude sentence?—This is my third of penal servitude.

9744. How long were the others?—The first was five years, the second was six, and this is five years. I had nine months' imprisonment before that.

9745. Had you any short sentences?—No.

9746. Were you ever in the police office before that?—Yes, I have been in the police office, and had a few days' imprisonment, but that was on a charge I never was guilty of.

9747. You only once had a short sentence?—Yes; that was the nine months for theft.

9748. But have you never had any shorter sentences?—Yes; some of fourteen days.

9749. Any of them for theft?—No.

9750. Drink?—No.

9751. What was it?—Well, it was going home at

Margaret
Watt.

18 Dec. 1894.

night. A policeman charged me with interruption, and I was never guilty of it, and that was the cause of my being in prison.

9752. How is that?—Just because of being sent to prison for what I was not guilty of. I thought that having been sent to prison I would do something deserving imprisonment.

9753. Now, you have been very often there; I suppose after the first time you did not think much about it?—After being in prison I did not care though I never was out of it, because once one is put in prison, character is gone.

9754. What were you before you got into this sort of life?—I never was at work or anything.

9755. What was your business?—I was married. I kept house for my father before that, and then again after my husband's death.

9756. What age were you when you got this first sentence?—Forty years of age when I got the nine months.

9757. But at the sentence you got before that for solicitation?—It was some two years before that.

9758. You were thirty-eight?—Yes.

9759. Never in for drink?—No; I never was the worse of drink.

9760. And since then you have been how long out?—When I came out from the nine months I was only three weeks at liberty when I was apprehended and got five years. Then I was not quite out of prison three months when I got six years; and I was only seven weeks out, and five of these I was in Edinburgh Infirmary, when I was apprehended again in Greenock. I was really only thirteen days at liberty. I have been about six months altogether out of prison during the last eleven years.

9761. Now, let us take the first time you were apprehended. You say you were wrongfully apprehended for importuning; what did you get?—Fourteen days. Of course there was the option of a fine.

9762. What fine?—Fifteen shillings.

9763. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Was that in Glasgow?—Yes.

9764. (By the Chairman.) Were you very hard up at the time that you could not raise fifteen shillings?—Of course I would not allow any one to know that I was in prison at all.

9765. Was your father alive then?—No; he was dead.

9766. You did not raise the fifteen shillings?—No.

9767. When you came out you never were apprehended on the same charge again?—Yes; three times I think I was.

9768. Did you try to get work after that?—I was sewing and knitting in my own house earning a little, but you could not make much at that. But then I could not go to any one I knew after being these fourteen days in prison.

9769. You were thirty-eight before your first fourteen days; well, how long was there between your first and second and third convictions for importuning?—I can't tell you.

9770. Would there be a month?—Oh yes; longer than that.

9771. They extended over a couple of years, have you not told us?—Well, I could not make up that couple of years between the fourteen days and the nine months.

9772. Did you come across any women who had been in prison on a similar charge when you were there, and do you know anything of what became of them?—No.

9773. You don't know any of them who have got long sentences since?—No. Of course there were a great many women sent to prison on that charge, and we were all together.

9774. Then you must have seen a good deal of them?—Yes; a great many of them.

9775. And have you ever seen any of them since in a convict prison, for instance at Perth, where you were in association?—I think I saw one, Catherine Dawson, while I was in association at Perth.

9776. In Perth you were in association, and I suppose you talked or communicated with the others?—Oh yes.

9777. Well, had many of the women there started with a lot of small sentences?—The most of them started with a great many; very few with long sentences. Most of them had a great many convictions for short sentences.

9778. Now, what is your idea about these short and frequent sentences: do you think they do any good, or do they accustom people to the life of prison?—I do not think imprisonment does any one good, either long or short.

9779. But then what would you do, take it in the case of a person who is rightly convicted of some crime? Suppose that a man were to give you a very violent thrashing, or were to steal your possessions, you would not like that, and how would you prevent that? What sort of punishment would you suggest?—Well, I think that any one who lifts their hand to another, or ill-uses them in any way, they are deserving of being punished.

9780. But you don't like imprisonment?—No.

9781. But you cannot suggest any other plan?—(No answer.)

9782. You like solitary confinement?—Yes.

9783. I suppose you have had three probations of nine months each?—One year each.

9784. That is three years?—Yes.

9785. You have had three years and nine months solitary?—Yes.

9786. What do you object to in the association. Female convicts are not hustled about, as I have heard it phrased. You have not much shifting about from place to place to do in association?—No; you have to be in a class-room so many hours a day.

9787. A class-room must be rather instructive and entertaining?—You are in there sewing instead of in your own room, and you can talk to any one of them about, and you hear what is going on.

9788. You are not prevented talking?—Oh no.

9789. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You are working at present in the sewing-room?—Yes; for a day or two.

9790. Do you like that?—No; I would as soon be in the cell.

9791. (By the Chairman.) How would you amuse yourself?—Sew a little.

9792. You are, I understand, a well-educated woman?—I can read and write.

9793. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Tell us what you don't like about association; do you like talking to the other women?—No; I do not.

9794. But you talk to some of them?—Oh yes, of course.

9795. Is it not more pleasant to speak to them than to sit dull in your cell?—There are a great many things you don't care much about. I don't care much about what the prisoners have to say.

9796. What do they speak about?—They speak about their adventures outside, and talk about how clever they are, and so on.

9797. (By Dr. Sutherland.) When you are not in association how many minutes a day, in the way of conversation, are devoted to you by all the officers?—I don't know.

9798. Surely you have some idea of the minutes a day devoted to you by officers in the way of talk? When it is all counted up would it be a quarter of an hour a day?—Oh no; they only come to give you your food or work.

9799. No conversation?—Very little.

9800. Would you have five minutes' conversation a day?—It might amount to that in the course of a day.

9801. (By the Chairman.) But still you prefer that to the other?—Yes.

9802. (By Col. M'Hardy.) But sometimes you have wanted to be associated?—No; when I was in Perth, I asked you to be excused from my association.

Margaret
Watt.

18 Dec. 1894.

9803. You were sometimes associated; was not that so?—Yes.

9804. And when you had not been getting on so well you were associated and got on a little better for a bit?—I don't know.

9805. (By the Chairman.) You say you never drank: were you ever up on any charge connected with drunkenness?—No.

9806. Not even when you were taken up for solicitation?—No.

9807. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Have you always been a nervous woman?—Yes.

9808. (By the Chairman.) What was the charge against you this last time?—Theft.

9809. But how was it alleged to have been managed; what did they say you did?—They accused me of entering a dwelling-house in Greenock and taking away a suit of clothes and a watch and various articles.

9810. There was no drink in that?—No.

9811. Nor the time before?—No.

9812. Nor the time before that?—No; I have never been charged with drink.

9813. You must know some of the women you have been in association with; when they are going to get out how are they looked after? At Perth there is a Prisoners' Aid Society, has it aided you?—No.

9814. Never?—No.

9815. How much money had you when you got out last time?—I had ten shillings.

9816. What did you do with it; did you come to Glasgow?—Yes, I came to Glasgow and then I went to Edinburgh. I wished to put in the whole of my time and not to be on license at all.

9817. The time before did you stay out the full sentence?—No; but I wished to be in the whole of it the time before too. I think any person on ticket of license is worse than being in prison altogether.

9818. Did you ever come across any female prisoner who thought the same?—No; I have not. They are all very anxious to get out as soon as they can.

9819. What do you intend to do this time; to put in the whole time?—Yes, I should like if I could.

9820. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Did ever your fellow-convicts tell you that they were hunted by the police while on ticket?—Yes.

9821. Is that the reason you wish to remain in prison?—No; it is not exactly that.

9822. (By the Chairman.) Your first sentence you came out on ticket of leave?—Yes.

9823. What had you to complain of?—Well, I had nothing to complain of in regard to the police or any one annoying me, but of course to have a paper of that sort in your possession you have just a feeling as if you were—hunted?

9824. What did you do when you came out; did you go to any work or try to get any work?—No, because I have always come out of prison not fit for work. I am not very fit for work at any time, and I was anything but well when I came out of prison.

9825. What did you do the first time you came out when you were on ticket of leave?—I was out for nearly three months.

9826. How did you live that time? You were not in hospital that time?—Yes; I was for a short time. I got one pound when I came out the first time, and I was able to take a house—a single apartment. I had a month's rent in advance out of the pound. That amounted to 11s. 8d., leaving me about 8s. I was ill, and just a few days after I went to the Western Infirmary. Well, I was to get other 10s. a fortnight after my liberation. Of course, I was able to be on my feet. I went to the Infirmary for out-door attendance, to get medicine. It was Dr. Alexander, the first Governor of the Infirmary, I saw, and he said it was not out-door advice I required but that I required to go in. He gave me a note to come down and see him, and he told me not to trouble about a line, as that could be got afterwards. Well, I went the next day and was admitted. I thought, of course, I would be able to get out of the Infirmary to go and get my paper signed and get the money that was to come to me, but I was not allowed to get out of my bed. Of course, I did not like to write to the police office from the Infirmary, so I asked to get away. They were very much against my getting away, but then the rent of the house would have been due for another month. So I left, and I was just going down twice a week and getting medicine.

9827. That is, you had eight shillings and then other ten, that is eighteen altogether; how long did that keep you?—It could not keep one very long.

9828. Did you get any work?—No; I was not fit for work, and besides, the very idea of having a ticket of license would prevent any one from going to look for work.

9829. But some of the women who are out on ticket of license must go to work?—Well, of course, I was guilty of theft.

9830. Since you have admitted that, that relieves me from any delicacy in asking you whether you had done anything in that way for maintaining yourself?—Yes, before I was apprehended. There were several charges of theft against me when I got six years.

9831. Now, I suppose, you look upon prison as your home?—No; I do not.

9832. But you seem to like it better than being out on ticket of leave?—Yes; I would rather be in prison than out on ticket of leave.

9833. You would not be rather there than get out at the expiry of your time?—No.

9834. When the prisoners come out of prison, we have been told that there are a lot of people very anxious to give them drink?—I have never had any one seeing me when I came out of prison.

9835. And you have never been given a help by the Prisoners' Aid Society?—No; when I came back from Edinburgh, after coming out of the Infirmary in Edinburgh, Mr. Dovey, I think his name is, paid my fare to Glasgow.

9836. That was the Prisoners' Aid Society?—Yes.

9837. When you came to Glasgow where did you lodge before you got a house of your own?—I was in a temperance hotel. That was when I first came out from five years on ticket of leave. I went that same day, and next day I got a house taken.

9838. But did you go to a temperance hotel with a view to any work or in the way of knowing of any work?—Oh no; it was simply for a night's shelter. It cost me two shillings.

9839. (By Col. M'Hardy.) I do not think you have made this matter just clear. You have told us your own views about separate confinement and association, but I would like to know—you have heard them talking a lot at Perth—I want you to tell us what the female prisoners generally like. Do they prefer Perth to separate confinement?—They prefer to be associated.

9840. Every one?—Yes; every one I have come in contact with.

9841. The conversation they carry on when they are allowed is not very instructive you have told us?—Not very. Of course there are a great many of the women in Perth that know one another outside, and they are acquainted with one another's friends, and they like to talk about their old acquaintances.

9842. (By the Chairman.) There are a lot of them there in for homicide and some for murder: do these people talk about their crimes and their exploits, and what they are in for?—Oh yes.

9843. Is there any reflection in their case of public opinion when a person has been guilty of any of these graver crimes: would the convicts at all dislike to be associated with a convict in for very serious crime?—Yes; I think there are not many convicts care about walking with a woman who is convicted of murder.

Margaret
Watt.

18 Dec. 1894.

Margaret Watt.
18 Dec. 1894.

9844. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Is that so?—Yes, that is so; and yet they think, of course, they are far more respected. They think that the people seem to have more respect and more sympathy for a murderer than for any one who has committed some paltry theft.

9845. You mean the prison officials?—The prisoners think so.

9846. You say that the prisoners think that the people have more sympathy and more respect for them, but who do you mean by the people: do you mean the warders?—Yes.

9847. Do the prisoners ever complain of having too much to do or too little?—They never think to complain of having too little to do. I have heard some of them complain about having too much, but they don't have much work to do in prison.

9848. (By the Chairman.) Not even the convicts?—No.

9849. Then, do you get better food in a convict prison?—Yes.

9850. Have you any harder work to do as a female convict than as a prisoner?—No; you have less work and better food.

9851. So that it is rather a better thing?—Yes.

9852. Women never get the plank bed?—No.

9853. Not even the first month?—No; there is always a mattress. [The witness was then removed.]

18 Dec. 1894.

Mr. Archibald Dempster.

MR. ARCHIBALD DEMPSTER, Inspector of Poor for the City Parish, Glasgow, called in and examined.

Mr. Archibald Dempster.

9854. (By the Chairman.) You are Inspector of Poor for the City parish?—Yes.

9855. What is the population of your parish?—176,777.

9856. And the number of paupers?—Altogether 5507.

9857. Does that include lunatics?—The lunatics number 571.

9858. How many men and women?—I can only give you males and females for the outdoor and the poorhouse.

9859. Well, give us the number of children chargeable to your parish?—Upwards of 400.

9860. Is that in the poorhouse or boarded out?—Boarded out—326 boarded out.

9861. And in the house?—In the house there are generally over 100.

9862. Can you say the cost of your inmates, not the lunatics?—About 4s. a head per week.

9863. Does that include administrative charges?—It includes everything.

9864. And capital?—We have no capital account now.

9865. How much is that allowing for administrative charges and for board?—Maintenance 2s. 9d. per week; management 7½d.; house accommodation 3½d.; medical relief 5½d. I am only speaking about the poorhouse just now. That makes up 4s. 2½d. I think.

9866. What is the average cost of the pauper in Scotland?—About 4s. 3½d. per week, or £9, 9s. 11½d. per annum.

9867. That includes items of management, maintenance, house accommodation, and medical attendance?—Yes.

9868. And only deals with the inmates of poor houses?—Only.

9869. Is your cost of 4s. 2½d. per week exceptionally low?—It is low.

9870. What does the average cost run up to in other places?—It varies, but it runs to 5s. 5½d. and 6s. 1½d.

9871. Where is the 6s. 1½d.?—That is the Hamilton Combination.

9872. What is it in Govan?—4s. 9½d.

9873. In the Barony?—5s. 5½d.

9874. In St. Cuthbert's, Edinburgh?—4s. 3½d.

9875. In Old Machar, Aberdeen?—5s. 5d.

9876. Then from that I suppose about 5s. a head is the average rather than a little over 4s?—Yes; about that. I have Lochgilphead here, which is 6s. 5½d., but that is a very small Board.

9877. Have you much trouble with migratory paupers?—A good deal.

9878. How do you deal with them? If a man comes to you and says he is ill and has no money and asks relief, I suppose you send him to be examined by the medical officer?—Yes.

9879. You can do that at any hour of the day?—Yes.

9880. And if he is pronounced not able-bodied you are obliged to take him in?—Yes.

9881. Do you consider it is possible for the medical officer to detect any alleged ailment which a man may put forward as a reason for his not being able-bodied?—Not at the first examination in many cases.

9882. So that as a general rule on the first examination men are taken in?—They are taken in certified by the outdoor medical officer. The man is admitted only under the certificate of the medical officer outside, and the doctor inside examines the man again and consults the out-door medical certificate, and then he sends the man to the hospital if he thinks this suitable.

9883. Are you much troubled with people going in and out?—A great deal.

9884. Do many of them get into prison when they are out?—Sometimes they do. Sometimes they are in prison before they come back to us again.

9886. In the poorhouse?—I would approve of that, as our power just now only extends to three days.

9887. But that is not sufficient? What would you propose as the period of detention?—I would try to begin with a fortnight or a month, but I could not go further than that to begin with.

9888. Would that be as a general rule or simply in individual cases?—As a general rule.

9889. Would you require power to be given you in respect of a special individual, or general powers bearing on the general inmates?—We would require to get power from the Local Government Board, and I understand they can give us power for a month without any legislation.

9890. Without legislation?—I think so.

9891. Do you know the Act?—There is no Act. It was a rule of the Board of Supervision. It is according to the rules they had under the Act of 1845, and they thought they were justified in making this rule for three days.

9892. Their rules require to be approved of by the Secretary for Scotland?—Exactly.

9893. Now about people with children. You alluded to boarded out children. What is their number?—Over 300.

9894. Are you ever troubled with dissolute parents asking you to give up a child?—Occasionally, but not very often.

9895. If you are what do you do?—We do not give up the children.

9896. Under what power do you detain them?—We go under a recent case in the Court of Session. That Court held that if a person was incapable of looking after his or her children the Parochial Board had the right to detain them.

9897. Can you give us that case?—I will endeavour to get it and supply it to the Secretary.

*Mr. Archibald
Dempster.*

18 Dec. 1894.

9898. But you think there is enough power under the Act?—Yes.

9899. You do not want any more powers for the detention of children?—No. We were not aware until recently that a Parochial Board could send a child to board in the country, notwithstanding that the mother objected to it. Consequently now we have begun a new system. We are sending out children to board in the country from the poorhouse. A woman, say, comes in with three children, and we say to her we are going to send these three children to board in the country. Although she may say she will not allow it we do it all the same.

9900. Under what power?—Under the opinion of the Local Government Board.

9901. That is another matter on which they can make rules?—They have not made a written rule, but the Secretary has told us that is the opinion of the Board of Supervision.

9902. Have you any written document?—Yes.

9903. Will you give us a copy of it?—Yes.

9904. You do not want any more power regarding children?—No.

9905. We were told regarding itinerant tramps in Edinburgh that they had a great deal of trouble with them for this reason. They will go into a parish in Edinburgh and when it came on summer time they would clear out, and they would go on getting relief at the next parish, stay a day or two, and then go on to another parish, and go all round the country in this way, and the bills would be sent in from each parish in which they had sojourned to the Edinburgh parish?—Well, we have not very much of that. We do get claims from other parishes stating that our paupers have been staying with them.

9906. It has not been a nuisance to you?—Not great. We are more annoyed with the dissolute class in Glasgow. For instance, a woman with children when she leaves the House—these are not the kind who go through the country—goes into the heart of the city. They stay there either a week or two with a friend perhaps, and come back to the House again. We have not many of the class who go through the country in the summer-time and come back to us in the winter-time.

9907. Do your paupers all go back to your parish, or do they go to the Barony or the Govan parish?—They come back to our parish, because the settlement is mostly with us.

9908. If a person was not able-bodied—one of your paupers—went to Govan, for instance, would he or she be relieved there?—Yes. They are relieved wherever they go. They must be relieved if they are unfit for work.

9909. Do you expect any work from your paupers?—We get some work, but not a large amount of it.

9910. What kind of work? Take females, what do they do?—Sewing, washing, stocking knitting, teasing hair, laundry work, cleaning. That, I think, is about all the employment for women.

9911. Then the men?—Those who are tradesmen get joiner-work, slating-work, and there is also work for blacksmiths, shoemakers, and bakers. We try to give them work according to their trade, but there are a great many labourers—the largest number of men, in fact, are labourers who come to our poorhouse—and some are employed cleaning windows. Others carry the food from one part of the House to another, and some work in the garden; and there are other employments like that.

9912. Then if a man does not like to work, what means have you of persuading him to do it?—We have a test ward, and at this moment there is not one in it.

9913. Explain what that ward is?—It just used to be a place for cutting sticks. We did not keep very many of them in it, because isolation is the thing for a test, whereas if you put in 18 or 20 it was no test at all.

9914. How do you compel them to work there?—

We put a saw into a man's hand and some wood to cut up, but we do not exactly define how much work they were to do in one day. We put a man with them, and he sees whether they work or not.

9915. And if they do not work?—If they do not do so, they are brought before the Relief Committee and are discharged from the poorhouse.

9916. But if a man had a settlement in your parish, and he was held not to be able-bodied?—We get the doctor's certificate first. The doctor may say, "In fair health; able to work; no special ailments." Well we can dismiss that man and let him go to the Sheriff if he wishes.

9917. But then you would have to pay his legal expenses and your own?—That is only 3s.

9918. We were told that the expense of defending these cases was much larger?—I never defend them. I would rather keep them, because the defence of a single case before the Sheriff would come to £12 or £15, as you have to pay both your own agent and the agent on the opposite side.

9919. Well suppose you have turned out a recalcitrant man, you will have to pay 3s. and take him back?—Yes. It is about that, or 2s. 1d., or something like that.

9920. I suppose you will have to take him back?—Yes, if the Sheriff orders us to give him relief.

9921. Have you had any man who has gone through this ceremony two or three times?—Yes.

9922. Have you anything in the way of rewards or punishments?—No, no rewards beyond workers getting better diet.

9923. Any meagre food for badly behaved men?—No.

9924. And you find the people get along very well without them?—Yes, most of them agree to work.

9925. Of your paupers what proportion would you say were decent respectable people who have come down to you through no fault of their own?—I think about a half, and the other half are from intemperate habits. We have 1400 this morning, and I think about a half of these have come in from intemperate habits.

9926. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Supposing powers were given you to detain a troublesome inmate for the first time for 14 days or 30 days or longer, would you think of mixing up these people with the respectable poor?—We could not help ourselves.

9927. But if you had sufficient accommodation you would not do that?—We would classify them according to their character.

9928. Supposing you got power to retain restless, refractory paupers, have you got disciplinary and penal powers to deal with them inside? They would not then be voluntary paupers, they would be there against their will. Have you sufficient powers to deal with them if they are refractory?—They would just remain in the House and go through the whole course along with the other inmates, that is to say, they would go to worship in the morning, get their breakfast and their dinner and their supper together in the hall.

9929. But don't you think it is desirable to classify paupers, seeing there are 50 per cent. respectable?—I go in for classification largely.

9930. In suggesting a fortnight as the period in which you would detain a restrained pauper for the first time, do you think a sliding scale by which you would increase the terms would be advisable?—I would have no objection to that, according to the degree of their shortcomings. It would be a very good thing.

9931. (By Col. M'Hardy.) You said there were a considerable number of paupers who go out and in, sometimes in the prison and sometimes in the poorhouse? The number, as far as I can make it, is 130 that are common to the prison and the poorhouse in the City Parish?—Yes.

9932. You said you thought it would be desirable to stop them by detaining these people in the poorhouse?—Yes.

*Mr. Archibald
Dempster.*

18 Dec. 1894.

*Mr. Archibald
Dempster.*

18 Dec. 1894.

9933. Would there be any difficulty in doing that if you had power?—No. I do not think so.

9934. Are they principally women?—No, both sexes.

9935. The men, I presume, are elderly, if not old?—The large proportion of them old.

9936. And I suppose the women middle-aged and old?—Yes, old too.

9937. You do not think that any difficulty would arise in detaining them?—I do not think so.

9938. Would they not try to get out?—Yes, but they would not come back so soon to the poorhouse if they did. They would not care about coming back if they knew they were to be detained for a month or six weeks.

9939. Or a year?—It would check them coming back, certainly.

9940. And where would they go?—They would go to the slums. They generally go there and stay amongst their acquaintances when they are out of prison and out of the poorhouse.

9941. And how would they exist?—A lot of these people are able to get work occasionally by doing cleaning and such like work.

9942. But I suppose principally by begging?—No doubt.

9943. So that it would be better possibly to have them in the poorhouse than living this indiscriminate existence?—Certainly, better off the streets.

9944. (By Miss Stevenson.) In regard to the education of children whom you board, you said you thought you had sufficient power to deal with them against the will of their parents, first under the order from the Board of Supervision, and also under a recent Act; but under the provisions of the recent Act is it not necessary for you to prove that the parent is an improper or insufficient guardian of the children?—You are quite right.

9945. And if that parent chooses, she can appeal to the Sheriff?—To the Court of Session.

9946. I understand it is the Sheriff Court, and that you would have to pay her defence expenses?—No doubt of it.

9948. Then you have no desire that the means of defending your action should be made more simple and less expensive than at present?—I would not like to go to the Police Court with these cases.

9949. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you mean to say that you would act on the statement of the Secretary of the Board of Supervision in regard to those children without written instructions?—They have written me a letter.

9950. (By the Chairman.) A copy of which you will send us?—Yes.

9951. We were told that under the Industrial Schools Act it was rendered illegal for a Parochial Board to pay for the maintenance of children in Industrial Schools, who were sent there at their own instance; have you ever sent any children to Industrial Schools?—Yes; I have taken them to the Court and got them committed, and I became liable to pay half-a-crown per week while they were there. Then there are claims made upon me for Industrial Schools; if, within three months of the committal of the child, either at the instance of the School Board or any other parties, they are chargeable as paupers, the Parochial Board is then liable. That is to say, a widow with three children may be on the roll of the City Parish of Glasgow. One of her children may be found on the street by any of the officers. He takes it to the Court, and it is there committed. The officers find out that the woman belongs to the City Parish, and I am liable.

9952. Have you many of these half-crowns to pay?—About £30 a month.

9953. So much as that?—We pay for the Industrial Schools every year £329, 17s., or about £30 a month.

9954. What does Government give you for the lunatics in your asylum?—We sometimes get one thing and sometimes another. Just now Scotland gets £90,500 and an extra grant of £25,000.

9955. It is no longer so much per head?—No; it used to be.

9956. How much did you use to get per head per week?—4s. a week.

9957. And can you tell us the sum that you used to receive? Is it larger or less than 4s. now in proportion?—I think it is less in proportion now.

9958. Is that owing to the increase in your number of lunatics?—Yes; they give only a certain sum per annum, and they have done that now for a year or two.

9959. And lunatics are increasing?—Yes, and that increase extends.

9960. That is a grievance, as they don't pursue the same system in England?—No; they don't.

9961. In England they give according to the numbers?—I understand they do.

9962. For any scheme we propose for dealing with habitual criminals—you say there are a great number of them frequent the poorhouse—do you think it would be fair to accept contributions for their maintenance from parochial funds?—From parochial funds?

9964. Supposing it were not under parochial government?—It would be under government, I suppose.

9965. But assuming it were not under a Parochial Board?—Then I do not think we should have anything to do with it. Not if the government choose to have a place of their own. If they do that, they should pay for that. We would have no control over that, you see.

9966. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Visiting members from your Board might be appointed?—Yes.

9967. (By the Chairman.) Have you any control over the Industrial Schools to which you contribute?—No, but we would like to have. We have visiting powers.

9968. That is a precedent established by law?—Yes, that is so. But then we have simply visiting powers.

9969. If you take boarded out children or lunatics sent to any parish, you have no control over them?—No, but we are building asylums for ourselves to cure that.

9970. But at the present moment?—No; we have no control over these asylums.

9971. (By Dr. Sutherland.) But you send visitors to the asylum at Dumfries?—Yes; some of our members go to the Crichton at Dumfries.

9972. (By Col. M'Hardy.) What is the objection you have to paying money for the Reformatory boys? Why do you want to control it?—Because we would perhaps not approve of these places at all. We could keep them in our own poorhouse. If you have a large institution, with a large staff of people that you have to pay for, you should try to have them all under your own control.

*Mr. Archibald
Dempster.*

18 Dec. 1894.

Mr. Archibald Dempster. 9973. And that is the objection you would have in the case of a special institution for habitual offenders?—Yes.

18 Dec. 1894. 9974. When probably you would be able to keep them in the poorhouse?—Yes.

9975. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You have indicated that you have no desire to herd together the dissolute and respectable, but that you have to some extent to do so, owing to the inadequacy of your accommodation?—Yes, but we might extend our poorhouse.

9976. (By the Chairman.) You have spoken about paying 2s. 6d. to these Industrial Schools Boards. The amount recovered against the parent is as large. How is it you get off with 2s. 6d.?—That is all Government asks. Why, I do not know.

9977. They give 6s.?—Or is it 5s.? I know the Government contributes so much.

9978. And they have the right to recover, against a parent, any sum which he is able to pay, not being more than 5s.? Is there any limitation which ren-

Mr. Archibald Dempster. ders them content with the 2s. 6d. instead of taking the other 2s. 6d. also?—I have often wondered why we were only asked to pay 2s. 6d. I suppose they think they might get as much from the parent.

9979. But they do not sue the parents?—Well, I do not know.

9980. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Are you aware that Government subscribes 6s. a head for these Industrial School children, and those on board the Training Ships, and that these institutes are controlled by Visiting Committees?—Yes.

9981. Well, then, is there any reason, if you contribute a part of the keep of those derelicts of society, under altered conditions, why similar inspection should not be sufficient?—The Government have inspectors for these institutions.

9982. But the Committee has control over it?—Yes, but the Inspector can go even into the accounts. But we have not that power. We have only the power to visit. [The witness then withdrew.]

Mr. R. P. Lamond.

MR. ROBERT P. LAMOND, Writer, Glasgow, called in and examined.

Mr. R. P. Lamond.

9983. (By the Chairman.) You are a solicitor practising in Glasgow?—That is so.

9984. And you have written a work on the Poor Laws?—Yes.

9985. And paid considerable attention to the subjects which come under the remit to this Committee?—Yes, especially certain sections of it, and more particularly Sub-section D.

9986. That is especially the law as to habitual drunkards?—Yes.

9987. You think there is a very considerable proportion, even of the well-to-do classes, who are habitual drunkards?—A large proportion.

9988. And many of these are professional people?—Yes, and men of ability.

9989. And a few have been ladies?—Yes, whom I have known.

9990. Will you inform the Committee of the age at which these people become habitual drunkards?—Generally from 35 to 45 years of age, and the habit runs from ten to fifteen years, usually ending in premature death or imbecility.

9991. What are the causes that have brought on intemperance?—With men I should generally say loss of means, disappointed ambition at not getting on in the world; and another frequent cause with young people especially under 30 or 35 years, is that of convivial habits leading to habits of tippling which get confirmed. With a large class of men overwork, combined with a highly nervous system, induces them when under pressure to take pegs or supports, and that gets confirmed and leads them to require the constant aid of these drinks.

9992. And about women?—With them the cases have not been so numerous. They have generally occurred through circumstances connected with maternity, bad nursing or the like; and I have also observed it has occurred where husbands have been more or less confirmed drunkards, and the wives have had free opportunity of getting the drink and falling into the habit of taking it.

9993. You think the Act of 1879 and the subsequent Act might be amended in some way, so as to make it better fitted to meet the cases in question?—I think the statute requires strengthening. It seems to me the cause of its failure has been its permissive and voluntary character. My view is that it is contrary to human nature to find men of this class who will voluntarily go before a magistrate, and write themselves down as habitual drunkards and seek a remedy at their own hand.

9994. You would propose to make provision for the compulsory committal of inebriates by their friends?—I think the relatives and friends who are interested in the person should have the power of setting the law in motion.

9995. Would you expect, for instance, a wife dependent upon her husband's means to set the law in operation?—If she was a wife with a family, she would have a deep interest in getting protection and in setting the law in motion, just as in the case of the husband becoming insane.

9996. But do not the wives endeavour to conceal the fact or suspicion that their husband is insane?—I do not know; they may conceal it from others; they cannot conceal it from themselves. The fact is that when the drink habit becomes very confirmed the wife soon sees it. He becomes facile and dissipates his money or fortune, and the wife is the first to feel it.

9997. In a case where there are sons in the family there would be less difficulty probably?—No doubt.

9998. And especially in the case of the working classes, where the sons would be generally independent of their father?—But I would not leave it all to relatives. I do not see why a partner or friend should not take action, just as in the case of lunacy.

9999. You make that suggestion, but a man's partner might be actuated by dishonourable motives?—Yes; there should be safeguards.

10,000. A man's wife or a wife's husband might be actuated by improper motives?—I would hope that would be the exceptional case.

10,001. But it would be necessary in every case to have safeguards?—I think that is so if there is to be a compulsory law, and there seems room for it; but there must be safeguards for liberty.

10,002. And what do you propose?—There are two ways in which it might be dealt with. We had in the last century in Scotland an old process which was designed to protect people against their own "facility," that is, if they became "facile" from drink or in any other way. There was the law of what was called "voluntary interdiction" or "compulsory interdiction;" that law was designed merely to protect their estates, and that law might be revived, with the power to sequester the individual, when he was remitted to a retreat or place for treatment.

10,003. Do these two processes still exist?—They have fallen into desuetude. Their date is the 16th or 17th centuries; but there is no reason why that law might not be revived and improved upon. I believe there is some such law in operation in France.

10,004. Can you give us the date of the last case in this country?—I have not taken a note of that, as this has only recently occurred to me. The cases required to be taken to the Court of Session, and I think the last case was in 1768 or 1769.

10,005. And were the applications generally granted?—Yes, generally.

10,006. The application might be made by the

- Mr. R. P. Lamond.
18 Dec. 1894.
- individual himself or by his friends?—Yes, and if by friends, the subject was convened, and could be heard in his own interest.
- 10,007. In the case of committing a man to a retreat for habitual drunkenness, he would be sane, and therefore quite competent to make a will?—Yes, he might.
- 10,008. But would your process restrict him in the matter of will-making?—He could not make a will of an absurd kind, because he could not grant any deed without the consent of the interdictors, who would be his nearest friends generally.
- 10,009. Would you propose to put a habitual drunkard while under restraint under restriction?—Yes, under a modified restriction.
- 10,010. Will you supply us with passages from authorities explaining this process?—Yes.
- 10,011. Is there any analogy to that process in the English law?—No, it was in the Roman law, and our law was based on the Roman law.
- 10,012. Then in that case would it be in all countries whose law is based on the Roman system?—Yes, I think you will find it in France.
- 10,013. If you could find that any such process runs through the laws of the various States that have adopted Roman law as the basis of their jurisprudence it would be valuable?—Very well; I will look out the authorities. Another plan is really to treat the subjects very much as you would treat a lunatic. Drunkards might be regarded, for the purpose of their treatment, and for that purpose only, as non sui juris, and, subject to necessary safeguards, you might apply the statute of 1857 in the Lunacy Law; but I would set the law in motion at the instance of the subject's relatives, and I would not have it as in the Lunacy Act, that any young medical man just licensed can give the necessary certificate. I think that is a dangerous power to put in the hand of any medical man. There ought to be stronger medical evidence.
- 10,014. In the proof of habitual drunkenness, would you have medical certificates as statutorily necessary, or would you allow the Sheriff to take evidence on the point, and simply satisfy himself on the matter; or how would you deal with the matter?—If you are to deal in the broadest way and to have special legislation for restraint and curative treatment, he ought to be convened before a sheriff or magistrate, and there ought only to be a certificate granted on the fullest evidence, but it should not be left to the discretion of a sheriff or magistrate to say what evidence he will take.
- 10,015. According to the Lunacy Laws, we have been told that the Sheriff has certificates placed before him. He sees they are in order?—As a rule he seldom sees them at all. He signs his name a thousand times de plano. It is done as a matter of form, and that is the danger.
- 10,016. But that would never be proposed in a case of this sort. Would it not be better than requiring certificates to be treated in that manner, to require the case to be proved to the satisfaction of the Sheriff?—Yes, and then let the Sheriff in his discretion sequester the person and commit him for three or six months, or whatever period might be thought advisable.
- 10,017. You say three months or so. Under the Lunacy Laws it is for three years, isn't it?—I think it is not for a definite period. You must have renewed certificates, but there is no period fixed in the original committal.
- 10,018. (By Dr. Sutherland.) He may be committed for three years, but unless there is another forthcoming, he gets his discharge?—But there is never a committal for a given period.
- 10,019. (By the Chairman.) But you would have a fixed period?—Yes, and it should be renewable as was found necessary; and I think that confinement under the Act should not be held to dissolve contracts.
- 10,020. Contracts, what do you mean by that?—
- A man might be a partner in a great concern, where he had large interests, and I do not think it should cancel his interest in the copartnary. If you make him what is in law the equivalent of a lunatic, of course it would.
- 10,021. That is a point to be avoided, then?—It would result in his vacating office. He might be a sheriff or a magistrate himself, or a town-clerk, and it would never do to have his office vacated when there was a chance of his recovery. That would prejudice the individual's patrimonial interests.
- 10,022. Under the present Act, supposing a sheriff or town-clerk goes into a retreat, there is nothing in the present law to cause him to vacate his post?—No, but the present law is absolutely ineffective for the purpose for which it was designed.
- 10,023. It meets the case well enough in the cases of those persons who submit voluntarily and go to a retreat?—In Scotland there are none; there is not a retreat. I know there are in England.
- 10,024. But are you not aware there are several unlicensed retreats in Scotland, and the people go there and remain for long periods, in some cases?—I know there are asylums.
- 10,025. No; inebriate retreats. At Queensberry Lodge, which we visited, we found a lady who had been there for four years and upwards?—In an unlicensed retreat? Then she is not under the Act.
- 10,026. But if the retreat had been licensed under the existing Acts, her status would not have been affected as a lunatic's would?—No, not under the present Acts.
- 10,027. How would you have provision made for the payment of the maintenance of the working-class people?—The class of people I was more inclined to speak of was the well-to-do habitual drunkards. By this I mean people having an income between £200 and £2000 per annum, and therefore there is no question of difficulty in dealing with these cases. They have the means. With working-class people it is more difficult to tell what to do.
- 10,028. You would not have their upkeep paid out of public funds?—No.
- 10,029. Have you ever considered the case of the Police Court drunkard?—Not at all, he is out of the scope of my observation.
- 10,030. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Among the causes of the drink-craving would you include heredity?—Yes, I have observed it.
- 10,031. Would you put that high among the predisposing causes?—I may say I have gathered information on this point not so much from my own observation as from reading reports of asylums, and it stands pretty high there; just as in the case of insanity heredity is pretty high up in that, and it is the same with drink no doubt. But I think the causes I have named are probably the more operative causes.
- 10,032. What sort of proof would you require to justify the amount of detention that you recommend? What class of evidence?—I would like to see evidence that would satisfy a jury of any important fact. Say from two or three people who had not a mere accidental or casual acquaintance with the subject, but a pretty lengthened and fairly intimate acquaintance—a companion who knew the man's habits and saw him not merely intermittently—two or three persons of that sort.
- 10,033. Plus medical certificates?—Yes.
- 10,034. (By Col. M'Hardy.) And possibly police evidence?—Yes.
- 10,035. (By Dr. Farquharson.) That is to say, the medical evidence would only be one part of a chain of evidence?—Although the evidence was otherwise clear, I would still have as a further safeguard medical certificates.
- 10,036. The people you are talking about now are not those who come before the world as breaking the law?—No.
- 10,037. They are those who drink in a quiet manner?—Yes, in a domestic way, so to speak,—after business hours.

10,038. Who would put the machinery in operation?—The family, I would say, because they are most deeply interested.

10,039. The police would take no part?—No; this kind of people that I have in my eye are not boisterous or fatuous or furious. They simply get soaked, and neglect their affairs and ruin their families. They get into an imbecile condition.

10,040. Do you think this class of people is on the increase?—They are not diminishing, probably because there are more facilities nowadays for getting all kinds of drink than there used to be.

10,041. You spoke, I think, of rapid death?—As far as I have noticed the thing runs over about ten years, and the life then runs out.

10,042. From the beginning?—That is, of the habit being observably confirmed to an intelligent person. Of course, there must have been some excess in drinking before.

10,043. Would you think there would be much hope of reclamation in the case of a man who had gone say for five years?—I think so.

10,044. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Would not the procedure now adopted in regard to dangerous and offensive lunatics fully meet your view? At the public inquiry such lunatics have an opportunity of examining the witnesses?—I think the less public the examination the better.

10,045. At the inquiry before the Sheriff, the individual cited as a habitual drunkard would have the same opportunity of defending himself as the dangerous lunatic?—Yes.

10,046. Then you have an analogue in the system pursued in connection with such lunatics?—Yes; only I think you might stop short of relegating this class into the same class as the criminal lunatic.

10,047. It is the procedure. Bear in mind that it most thoroughly guards the liberty of the subject?—I think a procedure might be carved out of it.

10,048. (By Col. M'Hardy.) I suppose the procedure would be more civil than criminal?—Yes.

10,049. So that it could be done with the least possible publicity?—Yes, and least pain to the family.

10,050. What would be the possible cost to a family of the sort of procedure that you were hinting at?—I think the whole cost might be limited to five guineas. I would certainly empower the Sheriffs of counties to undertake this duty. The old process before was confined to the Supreme Court of the country.

10,051. You suggest, I think, that two medical certificates should be produced by people applying to the Sheriff, or whoever the legal official might be?—Yes, but these need not cost much.

10,052. The cost of the inquiry, if it were civil, how should that be borne?—It ought to be borne out of the individual subject's means and estate, whatever they are.

10,053. (By the Chairman.) How are the expenses in lunacy proceedings met?—The relatives or persons interested in the lunatic who applies pays for them.

10,054. (By Col. M'Hardy.) It is necessary apparently to get at some approximate idea of the cost. In the case of a family having £200 a year, possibly it might be that a considerable part of that sum would be necessary for the upkeep of the family, say £155?—It depends on the number of the family.

10,055. Well, it would not be available for a costly process in law?—I think this would be a matter—as is the case in certain matters in the Sheriff Court—where there should be a statutory scale of fees, so that lawyers would not be interested in making fees out of the case.

10,056. There would be a good deal of evidence?—Not necessarily; and where the family and friends were working for the sake of the individual and the good of the family itself, the friends would be the witnesses, and they would not ask money at all.

10,057. The subject, however, could resist the action?—The subject against whom the case was set in motion would have the opportunity of resisting it. That would be in the interest of general liberty.

10,058. How would you deal with people whose income was below £200?—That certainly is a more difficult matter to deal with.

10,059. But more important?—It depends on the numbers involved.

10,060. I suppose the number with incomes under £200 a year is considerably greater than those over it, and the proportion of cases would correspondingly be greater?—On that assumption I have not considered how the expenses should be dealt with.

10,061. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Would not the great proportion proceed in forma pauperis, as in lunacy?—Well, it might be so; but it is amazing how much money the artisan classes, who are the more numerous classes, can raise. They club together in a wonderful way where they have cause to do it.

10,062. But it would be rather a severe tax on a poor family?—Yes, it would.

10,063. (By Miss Stevenson.) In regard to your opinion as to the management of the proposed retreats of these people, do you consider they should be under any public management, or might there be private establishments on the same lines?—I think the statute of 1879 very fairly satisfies reasonable conditions. The State has a certain control over the license of the individual who has the house. He should be amenable to the law as well as the unhappy subject.

10,064. You do not consider there would be any danger arising if such a place were kept up for the pecuniary benefit of the licensee?—I think there would be danger in that case.

10,065. But on the whole you would consider it better that they should be like the district lunatic asylums?—I think the statute of 1879 is very satisfactory in that regard as to the position of the retreats.

10,066. (By Dr. Sutherland.) There are private lunatic asylums kept up for the gain of the owner?—Yes, but they are under the supervision of the Lunacy Commissioners.

10,067. Would not a similar supervision for inebriate retreats meet your view?—There is no objection to any one carrying it on for private gain provided he is under the supervision of the law.

10,068. (By the Chairman.) You are aware there are a great many places such as Magdalene Asylums and places like the Queensberry House where people can go voluntarily and remain for long terms?—But in these cases you cannot keep them in.

10,069. But they are kept under remarkably strict regulations as to going about, and in some cases are not allowed out for a year, not even to church. Do you think these places ought to be inspected?—I think they should.

10,070. You would lay it down as a general rule that all places where individuals are kept under law ought to be inspected?—Yes, subject to State inspection. It is in the interest of everybody. [The witness then withdrew.] See appendix, No. XXIX.

The Rev. John
Alexander.

THE REV. JOHN ALEXANDER, M.A., Chaplain of H. M. Prison of Glasgow, called in and examined.

The Rev. John
Alexander.

10,071. (By the Chairman.) You have been chaplain of Glasgow Prison for three years?—I have.

10,072. And you come across a good number of habitual offenders?—I do.

10,073. You have given us a detailed classification of them which I am afraid is too detailed for us to adopt for practical purposes. You also make some general proposals regarding the habitual drunkard. Let us have your opinion regarding the Homes and Shelters that are at present in existence?—I approve

The Rev. John Alexander. of them decidedly. I am sure they do a great deal of practical good.

18 Dec. 1894.

10,074. Have you come in contact with many of the inmates?—I take a great interest in these Homes.

10,075. Do you follow up the women from the prison to the Homes?—Yes, and I see them in some instances after they come out of the Homes.

10,076. Have you traced up many of them after leaving the Homes?—Not further than what the matrons tell me.

10,077. I thought possibly you might have some evidence to check it?—Sometimes they meet me in the street and will tell me they are doing well.

10,078. Do you meet many of the women who have gone through the Homes in prison again?—Yes, I do, especially from the Whitevale one, where the term was six months; but from the other Home, where the term was twelve months, there were not nearly so many; and in the Magdalene Institution, where it is two years, they do well. Six months is far too short a term.

10,079. But they have increased the term now?—Yes, I understand so.

10,080. If the terms are increased to twelve months or two years it makes a break in your opportunities of seeing them?—I go monthly to these Homes.

10,081. You propose adult reformatories?—Yes, for those who have got into drunken habits, and women who cannot control themselves.

10,082. And small offenders?—Yes, because there are some who do well when they are under control.

10,083. You propose different methods of dealing with girls and women and lads and men; but as a general principle you attach considerable weight to a proposal to increase the punishment in "geometrical progression." What do you mean by that?—I mean 7, 14, 28, 56, and so on. A great many offend because they run the risk of getting a short or a long sentence; whereas if they knew decidedly that the next sentence would be exactly double the last, many would think more about committing the offence, or might be more careful. Many say to me, "I never got 30 days in my life before, and it will be the last."

10,084. And do they keep that promise?—Yes, I find that in many cases they do.

10,085. You get an immense number of prostitutes, and they get an immense number of 30 days?—Yes, they do, and 14 days, many of them.

10,086. And suppose they get 60 days?—Some of them will never reform. They do not wish to reform.

10,087. Take the prostitute class in Glasgow; I understand 30 days is the general thing?—Many of them get 14, and many get 30. They are getting 30 days just now, in order to keep them off the streets at the New Year time.

10,088. But does it have a deterrent effect?—No, it does not upon those who have become habituals; but the remarks I wish to make—as I have said in a note in your hand—I mean to apply not so much to those who are at present themselves bad women, but in order to deter the younger ones.

10,089. But by taking a train to Edinburgh these prostitutes can get very much shorter imprisonment. You are aware of that, I suppose?—I did not know that.

10,090. And they can ply their trade in one place as well as another; but if they do not avail themselves of the facility of paying 4s. or 5s. where they can ply their trade with less risk of long sentences, does it not show that they do not care very much about the 30 days?—But if they knew that they would get 30 or 60 days, it would frighten them.

10,091. But would not they go to Edinburgh?—But would it not apply to the whole country?

10,092. Ah! that would mean affecting the whole statute-book. These generally are your proposals. With respect to girls under 17, are these hopeful at all?—There are some hopeful, and some that are wayward—some very weak and foolish.

10,093. For girls under 17 you suggest, I see, that their first sentence should be a year in a reformatory. Do you mean their first appearance before a magistrate, or for being drunk and disorderly?—They always get a warning. I would give them a warning first, and then one year in a reformatory. That is, where a girl is known to be a bad girl.

10,094. And the second sentence three years, and then firmly dealt with by imprisonment—the sentences to be increased in "geometrical progression"?—Yes. I begin with 7 days, and go on to 14, 28, and so on.

10,095. After getting out of the reformatory?—Yes.

10,096. Is there any precedent for sending them so short a term to a reformatory? It is the case that a girl of 17 at present cannot be sent to a reformatory. This would be an adult reformatory?—Yes, I would make them work for their living there.

10,097. For unmarried women you suggest detention for life?—I say in some cases it would be better if they were detained for life, because there are women who no sooner get out of any of these Homes than they begin to drink again.

10,098. And six appearances in the Police Court you think should bring them under the category of habituals?—Yes.

10,099. There are men and women who are practically prisoners for life as it is. They are always going in and out of prison?—Yes, they are in for a little, and then out for a few days or so, and in again.

10,100. Magistrates, you think, should be superseded by Stipendiaries to adjudicate on habituals?—I think Stipendiaries would be the better form.

10,101. Why?—Because they would have more time. All their time would be devoted to their duties.

10,102. But why not avail yourself of a Sheriff, who is to be found everywhere in Scotland?—You could not have a Sheriff in the Police Courts.

10,103. We would remit the cases to the Sheriff, whereas there are no Stipendiaries in Scotland?—There was a Stipendiary in Glasgow.

10,104. Yes, but there is not now?—No, not at present.

10,105. But why do you propose a Stipendiary as opposed to the Sheriff?—I am not opposed to any of them. I just think they would have more time, and they would take more interest in those who came before them constantly, because some who come constantly to the prison would be ashamed to be coming up before the same judge.

10,106. Do you find shame a weakness among many of your people?—Yes, some of them have said to me that part of their punishment was standing up before Stipendiary Gemmel, who had interested himself in them, and they said they were very vexed about it.

10,107. You come across a good many of these individuals. Do you assist many of them to find places when they get discharged, or to pull themselves together and lead a new life?—I do not do anything further than recommend them to the agent of the Society. There is a paid agent, and he has two clerks, and they look after the males; there is also a female agent to look after the women.

10,108. And is work got for the women?—They cannot get places for women easily. The amount of work for women of that kind is not plentiful.

10,109. We came across a Roman Catholic clergyman connected with the prison in Edinburgh, and he appeared to have interested himself in various prisoners. Some he had sent to the country he had found to do well. We also found a Presbyterian Chaplain who had interested himself in various prisoners, notably one male habitual offender, whom he had got a country job and kept him six months out of prison?—I have got hundreds set up. I take an interest in them in this way, that I recommend them to the agent of the Society after I inquire into their wants. I go also and look after some of them at times.

Alexander.*

18 Dec. 1894.

10,110. You visit them?—Yes, I go and visit some of them after they have been out of prison, but the paid agent of the Society gets them the work.

10,111. Do they tell you confidentially anything about their habits and feelings as to how they regard imprisonment, or whether a young man or woman who gets into prison finds it not so bad as he expected?—There are some who say it is not nearly so bad as they expected, but most of them look upon it with horror.

10,112. You think that is the case?—Yes, out of thousands who pass through, I am sure there are hundreds who do not come back, or, if they do, it is at a considerable interval; but of course there are the hundreds who come constantly who have little or no feeling.

10,113. It is more punishment to the casual than to the habitual?—Yes, it is.

10,114. (By Miss Stevenson.) In connection with the apprehensions of those women, do you ever hear complaints from them that they have been taken up merely on suspicion?—Many.

10,115. Have you heard them say that if once they have been in the hands of the police for this offence, they are liable to be taken up frequently?—Yes, I have heard them say that.

10,116. Do you think that is ever really the true state of the case?—I have no more than their own word for it, but the manner in which they tell me the story seems to make me believe in some cases that it is true. In the Police Court I understand they are all brought up in batches, and the police who are to be witnesses in the various cases are there, and the result is that a woman, a stranger, has to stand up before thirty or forty strange policemen, and they can recognise her on the street again, and some say they have been taken up and sworn to as being seen when it was evident that they had been seen in the Police Court at one time.

10,117. Do I understand these women are not tried singly and individually?—Yes, but I think they ought not to be brought up in batches, but brought in singly and tried.

10,118. How many are brought up at a time? Do you mean that four or five are brought in and tried for this offence?—They are tried singly, but they are brought into court in batches, one case after another is brought up and disposed of.

10,119. So that a woman who is there possibly on suspicion might be recognised on a future occasion as having been in the Police Court before, and presumably was a prostitute by repute?—Yes, that is so.

10,120. (By Col. M'Hardy.) You have taken some interest in seeing if anything could be done for the prisoners discharged?—Yes.

10,121. How many cases have you paid particular attention to?—Perhaps 1200 or 1300.

10,122. What has been the general lines on which you have gone in trying to do something for these people?—I have given them recommendations for clothing when necessary, and also for admission to the model lodging-houses. Others I have recommended to Shelters, and others I have advised to have goods for hawking, in order that they may start earning in a little way.

10,123. Which has been a most successful line?—Yes; it gives them a new start.

10,124. And out of those you have sent away out of the city to their homes in the country, are there many cases in which that has been successful?—Yes, those who are sent to quiet country places especially do not seem very soon to come back again, and I think that is a very good way of getting them reclaimed.

10,125. But they are not very willing in some cases to go back to their homes?—Some are ashamed to go home, while others are willing.

10,126. That, however, has been the most successful treatment?—Yes, where it has been managed.

10,127. You were suggesting an increase in the sentences as a method of reformation?—Yes.

10,128. You have seen a good many prisoners with long sentences pass through the prison—with long sentences which were even repeated?—Yes, but not doubled.

10,129. Do you think what you have seen of sentences passed upon convicts justifies you in thinking that a long sentence is much more deterrent than a short one, and that it is necessary physically to withdraw persons for a time from the society they keep?—To-day I met a woman who had served her time for eighteen months, and after being several weeks out of prison she got three days for being drunk. For seven weeks she had tried to do well, but she had given way to drink again, and I expect she will go on drinking and commit a theft and get a long sentence. The long sentences in many cases have not the deterrent effect one would like to see. There are some people who do not seem to be deterred by any sentence.

10,130. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you find that felons, thieves, garotters, and housebreakers, and so on, are habitual drunkards?—No.

10,131. You do not think it consistent with their profession that they should be drunkards?—I find, on the other hand, that they themselves take advantage of drunken men.

10,132. And that they themselves are perfectly sober when they are committing the act?—Not always; many of them say they drink.

10,133. You would not expect a man who was under the influence of drink to carefully plan and successfully carry out the robbery of an individual or of a house?—No, I would not.

10,134. Do these thieves, garotters, and housebreakers present the physical appearance of the habitual drunkards—men and women whom you see in prison for brief sentences?—They have a peculiar formation of the head, to begin with.

10,135. Would it be right to say that in Glasgow the 500 women who pass so frequently under your notice, mostly as prostitutes, are virtually habitual drunkards—in other words, that prostitution and drunkenness in Glasgow among that class are synonymous terms?—There are habitual drunkards who are not prostitutes, and prostitutes who are not habitual drunkards.

10,136. If you got all the women in Glasgow with ten convictions and upwards in the year, do you think that there are many who have not had prostitution as part of the charge?—I cannot say.

10,137. You suggest six convictions as the definition of a habitual drunkard?—In most cases.

10,138. Over what period of time would those six convictions extend?—I would not recommend any time. At least, I could not say whether in a year or six convictions right off; because there are some who might be three times this year, and they would not be in prison again for six or nine months, and I could scarcely think these convictions should be counted.

10,139. Then your six convictions would be in one year?—Yes; perhaps.

10,140. You are somewhat severe on young unmarried women?—Yes. I say that those who have no wills of their own, the stupid, ignorant, I would say their period of detention should vary, but in a number of cases their detention should be for life; because they succumb to temptation, and if not confined in some place they would appear again and again.

10,141. But do you think public opinion would support you either in the life sentence or in the geometrical progressive system of sentences which you suggest?—I do not see why it should not. There are many prisoners who would be deterred if they knew the sentence that was coming next time; but as it is now, one day they may get seven days, and another three days, and so on.

10,142. But it is not the case that the late Stipendiary Magistrate of Glasgow let off one half of these drunken offenders every Monday morning?—I cannot say. [The witness then withdrew.]

MR. WILLIAM QUARRIER, Superintendent of the Orphan Homes of Scotland, called in and examined.

Mr. William
Quarrier.

18 Dec. 1894.

18 Dec. 1894.

10,143. (By the Chairman.) You have done an immense amount of work in the way of reclaiming children?—I have been at that work for thirty years.

10,144. Can you tell us how many children have passed through your hands?—Children, young people, something like ten thousand, independent of what I call casuals. These have all passed through our Homes.

10,145. Will you explain to the Committee the main features of your work? Tell us first about your Homes?—The Homes are for orphan children.

10,146. Tell us about the James Morrison Street Home in Glasgow?—It is a night refuge for homeless children, a home for working lads, and for young women who are in danger of falling into crime. That is its threefold position. We keep children, working boys, and young women.

10,147. How do the children come there?—They come usually by civilians meeting them on the streets—through Bible-women and others, and the police occasionally bring them.

10,148. How many children do you find shelter for there?—We have accommodation for something like 120 in James Morrison Street.

10,149. Now we pass from children. How many young women have you got?—About thirty.

10,150. They are sent by ladies who take an interest in your work?—Yes, who take an interest in the girls who have been put out of their places through bad tempers or otherwise, or driven out by a drunken father to seek their own living; and sometimes I have taken them from other relatives if I thought they were doing them an injury.

10,151. And the boys?—There are about sixty of them, apprentices who do work throughout the city and lodge with us.

10,152. But your main work is among children?—Yes.

10,153. And you regard James Morrison Street as a depot from whence you select children for the Homes at Bridge of Weir?—Yes, it is the office for passing them on to the Bridge of Weir.

10,154. But in addition you get children from all parts of the country?—Yes.

10,155. Now as to the Bridge of Weir Homes, how many have you passed through them?—Since we built the Homes there in 1876 and opened them in 1878, about 3000 children have passed through them. Formerly the work was done in the Govan Road, where we rented two houses. We have forty-eight buildings belonging to the Homes, and these are all located at the Bridge of Weir with the exception of two.

10,156. But you carried on the same work at the Govan Road Buildings, and what you are doing now is the same work on a very much more improved system?—Yes, very much.

10,157. You take them out to these Homes, educate them to a certain extent in industrial matters, and after two years' residence you send them out from the Homes?—That is about the average, and we draft to Canada perhaps 250 annually, and probably about 200 throughout this country.

10,158. How many do your Homes accommodate?—We have now about 1200.

10,159. Boys and girls?—Yes.

10,160. They live in the houses, which are carried on as far as possible on the family principle?—Yes, a father and mother are over each house and they have 30 children under their care.

10,161. The children you have to deal with, I suppose, are quite as bad a class as find their way into Industrial Schools and Reformatories?—They are a similar class. There might be some better, because we take a family away, whereas the Industrial School cannot take a child until a certain age.

10,162. You take children who come into your hands through the misfortune of parents and without anything being alleged against them?—Yes, we take infants even of a few weeks old, as well as a child of 16 years, so that our work meets the family wants. I have taken as many as seven children from a widow.

10,163. Do you think these two years' supervision sufficient to enable the children to be drafted off to Canada?—My experience for the last twenty-three years has satisfied me of that.

10,164. You have a depot in Canada?—Yes, superintended by my daughter and her husband.

10,165. Who were with you on this side for a long time?—Yes.

10,166. And they place these children with farmers in the country?—Yes.

10,167. And you have a huge mass of evidence showing that the great majority of them do well?—We have evidence by reports and by actual visitation by my son-in-law and others. We have actual evidence to the extent of 98 per cent. of the children in Canada who do well, and there are 4000 of them there altogether.

10,168. 98 per cent.?—I would find a difficulty in finding 2 per cent. that have gone wrong in the twenty-three years.

10,169. And you find the farmers in Canada very glad to get them?—That is just the material they want. They grow up with the people. They are thoroughly healthy. We do not send any unhealthy, or any who are known to have pernicious habits, out there. We are just as anxious that the Canadian people will be satisfied with them as we are to have them placed there.

10,170. You have a number of children adopted?—Under ten years the children must be adopted, and above twelve they are placed in service, with the provision that education must be carried on.

10,171. But a lot of young children are adopted by childless couples?—Yes.

10,172. In connection with the children generally, you find that drunkenness has an enormous deal to do with their being placed in a condition in which you are obliged to keep them?—Yes, a very large share.

10,173. What is the cost of maintaining your children?—We passed through the Homes last year something like 1500 children, and our expenditure is something like £14,000 or less than £10 per head, or if you say the actual number that resided with us was 1200 all the year round, it would then amount to something like £10 to £12 per head.

10,174. Does that include sending them out to Canada?—Yes, everything; and we have two schools also in the Colony, I may say.

10,175. And are the schools inspected?—We do not take a penny of Government money. We have fourteen school teachers, and these are busy at the work. We have gone on the lines of taking nothing from Government. We try to help the country.

10,176. What do you teach boys and girls? What employment, I mean?—We teach girls house-work after schooling. Then some are taught laundry-work and dressmaking. We do all that with our girls, while some of them also are trained as assistant teachers.

10,177. You have a dairy also, I think?—Yes, and there is a farm which we bought last year. We intend to have a model there, as well as at the group of Homes.

10,178. Do you employ the girls at the dairy just now?—Not much. We buy most of our milk from the next farm. We could not very well spare our girls; there are such a large number at school. They have been overlooked by the School Board. Even after twenty years of School Board work, I may give as an instance, that I brought a girl of 13 not long ago from Inverness, and she is not able to read yet. We very often get those who are missed by the School Boards.

10,179. And do you find large numbers in Glasgow and Edinburgh?—Yes, we have 150 from

Mr. William
Quarrier.
18 Dec. 1894.

Edinburgh, who have not been properly looked after and educated. I think out of that 150 there would not be more than a dozen who had passed the fifth standard.

10,180. What do you make your boys work at?—There are a number of trades, such as shoemaking, baking, blacksmithing, gardening, joinering, and painting. These all go with the fathers in their trades. A lot of the boys go with them in the work they carry on.

10,181. The "fathers," that is the heads of the houses, I suppose?—Yes, and each father has so many boys at his trade, and so manages them.

10,182. You are very ingenious in the way of finding means of employment. Supposing you had girls whom you could spare to work, what sort of work would you advise for them?—Service.

10,183. Have you any poultry-farm about your place?—Yes.

10,184. And is it worked by girls?—By boys.

10,185. It would be very suitable for women?—Yes, I might fall back on them for that, and with our new farm we may be enabled to do so.

10,186. How many hens have you?—500.

10,187. How much land?—About an acre and a half set apart for that, with a beautiful house called "The Hen's Paradise," which is splendidly fitted up.

10,188. And how many boys can you keep working at it?—There are about a dozen; but there is also a kitchen-garden at which they work, and also attend to the hens.

10,189. Have you had any epidemics amongst your fowls?—None.

10,190. How long have you had them?—For about four years.

10,191. How does it pay?—Splendidly. It has not cost a penny, I think. We do it by collecting all the brock of the village every morning, with potato peelings and refuse and tea-leaves and little bits of fat, all of which is boiled together.

10,192. Tea-leaves?—Yes; the hens are very fond of that. We find they like that mixture very much. I mean to extend that sort of work when we get this new farm into proper order. We mean to have 1000 hens.

10,193. You have no machinery?—We have a steam-engine of 12 horse-power that we mix our dough with in the bake-house, do our laundry-work and our joiner-work, and other work when necessary.

10,194. You are not in the way of making firewood?—We did so in the Govan Road Home, but since we went to Bridge of Weir we have not made firewood.

10,195. Did that pay?—Yes; it pays if you can buy your wood at a certain price. If you can buy broken wood at 10s. a ton, I believe it will pay to break it up; but if you have to pay 20s. a ton it won't.

10,196. How does the number of children in your Homes compare with the number in Industrial and Reformatory Schools in Scotland?—I should say there are as many children in our Homes as there are in all the Industrial Schools of Glasgow put together. I think that is about the number. I was summing them up about a year ago, and I think we took more children in than all the Industrial Schools in the city put together, including the Training Ship.

10,197. Do you think it is necessary to have such long confinement for juvenile delinquents as they are subjected to in Industrial Schools?—Not in most cases, but when you have bad influences in the city outside, what are you to do?

10,198. What you do is to ship them off away from it?—That is just the saving of them.

10,199. But of course that could not be done with Reformatory children?—No; you have to keep them a certain time. With me, I do not need to keep them any stated time, because they are not committed children.

10,200. Do you ever have any trouble about the people demanding back their children?—A lot of trouble that way, and if they can satisfy me that they are honest and able to keep their child, I do not refuse to give it back; but if it is a mere excuse, I shall hold on to the child according to the law.

10,201. That is under the Act passed a few years ago?—Yes, the Custody of Children's Act.

10,202. Then after you have sent a child abroad, have you any parents or friends demanding their custody?—Yes, sometimes they get into better circumstances, and they will wish me to get the child back, and I say, "If you wish it back, then you will have to pay for its passage or wait till the child earns the money."

10,203. How does the law stand on that point?—I have been in court two or three times with Roman Catholic children, and the law cannot touch any one who has sent a child to Canada in a proper way, or make him bring it back.

10,204. It is mostly on account of religious differences?—Yes, it is mostly that.

10,205. Put aside those questions in which religion intervenes. Take the case of the Presbyterian children, who doubtless are the great mass of your children: have you had any trouble otherwise?—No, no difficulty with people wanting their children back on the other side.

10,206. And practically no difficulty about parents wanting their children back here?—It is very little when the number of cases—600 new cases each year—is taken into consideration. When you take such a large number in every year, you would say my trouble is very little, and it is usually with people who have no home for the children.

10,207. You have a lot of imbecile children?—Yes, we have a few in our invalid house. There are 30 cases of incurables in the girls' house.

10,208. You do not make any objection to any kind of child?—No, we take any child if it has no father or mother.

10,209. And if it is imbecile you take it?—Well, there is the Larbert Institution, and I never like to cross and take cases that other institutions should take.

10,210. One of the elements that you lay very great stress on in exerting a good influence on the children is the home influence?—Yes, a father's and mother's influence.

10,211. And I believe the chief father goes so far as to give the inmates a halfpenny or a penny a week?—A penny every Saturday night, to spend on sweets if they like. That is their heritage independent of any gift they may get, and they are at perfect liberty to use it in the store. Last year we used over a ton of sweets. There were £20 worth, all bought by the children.

10,212. And you find the very roughest of them become civilised?—I am astonished to see that children who could not be managed by their mothers or uncles or aunts are managed as we succeed in doing it. It is a surprise to me every day of my life, for we do not take children that anybody else can manage or keep.

10,213. Take the juvenile offenders, those children who go into Industrial Schools or Reformatories, do you think they could be dealt with in a short time?—I am positively sure they could, because I have had offenders who have been imprisoned, and I have had them out of prison, and they have afterwards done well; and I believe if they had not their surroundings outside it would make all the difference. A boy who has been convicted once, I should say, if he is not habit and repute, there is great hope for the boy if he gets into a Home such as ours.

10,214. In connection with these children you must have seen a great lot of miserable homes?—Most of them have no home at all.

10,215. You used to go about closes at night?—Yes; and have seen many a poor widow left with three or four of a family in what you would call a comfortable condition, and in a few years she has become utterly helpless and her health gone. She

Mr. William
Quarrier.
18 Dec. 1894.

- Mr. William Quarrier.*

- has been turned out by the landlord, and a neighbour takes her in, and she applies to me, and I take her children. I have just been informed of a case of a mother who has died of consumption and has left four children, three of them at home; and even although they are of consumptive parents, I will take the whole of them in. That is the sort of work we do.
- 10,216. You have the history of all the children?—Yes.
- 10,217. Have you any examples of the children of drunken parents turning out drunken also, or do they generally turn out sober?—I do not believe in any hereditary taint except sin.
- 10,218. Then you don't think they turn out drunkards?—No; I could cite scores of cases taken from the most drunken homes that are virtuous and well-doing to-day in Canada.
- 10,219. Then, again, the children of criminals?—The same thing applies to their children. If you can get them young, say six years old, their passions and manners and sight become sharp about five, and if you can give me any young child from any home under five, I will be bound for it that that child will have none of its father's immoralities and drunkenness. Both parents may be drunken and everything that is bad; that is my experience.
- 10,220. I suppose a lot of your children now in Canada are getting old men?—I suppose we would have fifty marriages last year.
- 10,221. How often have you been out to Canada?—I go out about every second year, and I have seen 500 or 600 during my visits. My son-in-law and a brother and an assistant and others are constantly going about visiting them.
- 10,222. You all do this from love of the work?—There is none of us in the work for a salary, and we have about 90 workers or helpers altogether.
- 10,223. And of course that being the case, the work is done with much more heart?—Yes, and much more time is spent on it. I often say to friends who want a situation that our place is not the place to go to, but if they want to do good to their fellows, they will get bread and water and something else added to it, and it is marvellous how we have been kept up by a band of workers that are of the same spirit as ourselves, that work for the good of others. I must say that while you might get a certain result from what you may call purely Government institutions, where officialism comes in, you would hardly get the same moral and physical results.
- 10,224. Do you believe that habitual criminals could be dealt with by such influences as you bring to bear upon them in your Home?—Young or old?
- 10,225. I suppose young more than the old?—The young I think so, because I have had many cases reformed.
- 10,226. In your girls' place in Morrison Street you don't take prostitutes?—No; we draw the line there.
- 10,227. What do you do with them?—We send them off to the Magdalene; but unless we can make it clear that the girl has gone wrong, we give her a chance.
- 10,228. And do you take up children eligible for parochial relief?—I take about 100 pauper children from each Board of the City every year.
- 10,229. They do not board them out?—There are a few Boards throughout Scotland who have no boarding-out places, and I have taken them without any guarantee.
- 10,230. And do they contribute?—Some of them may give me £10, but it is a voluntary thing, and I do not insist upon it. You see my object is to save as many as I can without having respect to any locality or any denomination at all.
- 10,231. I doubt whether any Parochial Board has any legal right to spend money in support of any institution. It has legal right, however, to pay in respect of a child boarded out?—Mr. Campbell, General Inspector, Board of Supervision, was down in 1888, and gave a very glowing report of the Homes, which was presented to Parliament, and in that blue book the Homes are held up as the finest and best in the country. He only regretted that the Boards had not power to place children with us and pay for them.
- 10,232. But have the Boards any power?—Simply they are obliged to do it in another way.
- 10,233. But they board out children?—Yes, but not in institutions.
- 10,234. (By Miss Stevenson.) But there is an institution at Aberdeen, Mr. Japp's, and another at Smith's, where they pay for children?—I do not know how they do it. I do not think the law allows them to keep children in institutions. They should be kept in private houses.
- 10,235. (By the Chairman.) I suppose that is regulated by the Local Government Board?—That may be so.
- 10,236. In which case they can alter the rule. In fact, if they have a rule, it applies to these other institutions as well as to yours?—Yes. But my Homes are purely voluntary, and that would constitute my difficulty.
- 10,237. (By Miss Stevenson.) You spoke of the number of homeless children that you sheltered in James Morrison Street. Do you mean by that that these children had no guardians or parents?—They have mothers, most of them, who are houseless and dependent on the charity of neighbours day by day.
- 10,238. I suppose in all cases you follow up the children to find whether or not the statement they make that they have no home is true?—In every case we follow the statement up by close investigation.
- 10,239. But I suppose you mean that these children have no place to go to?—For instance, there was a mother in on Monday; she had not a place to lay her head. She had three children; she had been three nights in the Night Asylum, and could not go back a fourth.
- 10,240. But she could have gone to the Poor House?—I recommended that.
- 10,241. I think you said you had about 130 young people in the Home altogether?—Yes.
- 10,242. How many would be children?—They are mostly above fourteen there, as you see it is a working-boys' Home.
- 10,243. But about the homeless children?—About a dozen at a time, because they are drafted off. It is a night refuge for any child who may be found.
- 10,244. But you seldom find a child who has no guardian or parent?—They will tell you they have none, but we generally find they have, although I have waited six months before finding them.
- 10,245. You said, I think, that a large number of the children who came to you had escaped the School Board; but is it not a fact that a great many of the children sent to you are sent through the action of the School Board officers?—Some are, but I help hundreds of children that the School Board cannot touch.
- 10,246. You say you have a number from Edinburgh?—About 150.
- 10,247. Have you ever inquired into their history?—Largely drink.
- 10,248. But I mean through what agency they came to you?—Quite a large number from the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Society.
- 10,249. But you did not go behind that agency, because, as a matter of fact, I know a great many children are sent through the action of the School Board officers, and is not that the case in Glasgow?—No; you see a mother that cannot get bread for her children, what can she do? Somebody must give her bread, or else the burden of her children must be taken from her.
- 10,250. But you made no inquiry as to whether these children had ever been on the School Board or not?—We usually take the facts from the mother.
- 10,251. And you never verify them?—We verify the standard of the boy by our school.
- 10,252. But I think you would find that most of these children had been looked after by the School Board officers, and that, through the difficulties in getting convictions, they had not been able to force the children into school?—Quite a number of these cases do come to us.

10,253. What I meant to point out was that School Board officers were not so neglectful as apparently your statement would infer?—I do not say so, but I think the officers spend too much of their time in the School Board offices. I think they should be out more.

10,254. In regard to the application by parents having children restored to them in the cases where you emigrate children, I understand you require the parents to sign an agreement to allow the child to go, but that in law it does not hold good if the parent changes his mind?—No.

10,255. (By Col. M'Hardy.) I did not understand quite what you said about Reformatories being hampered by time?—You see if a boy is sent for three years to an Industrial School, he cannot be dismissed till the three years are up, or if he is sent for five years, he cannot be dismissed unless he is sent out two years on license, which is sometimes done.

10,256. And how does that affect them adversely?—It puts a stigma on a boy when he is convicted by a magistrate.

10,257. I mean in regard to the time he is detained?—I would say that if you could put more of the voluntary principle into your Industrial and Reformatory schools it would be better for the children, but the officialism is such that it sometimes takes out much of the moral and the spiritual good.

10,258. You mean to say the spirit of the person who has charge of the institution is lost by formalism of some kind or another?—Yes.

10,259. I want to keep upon this point of time. Perceiving that the influence is good, I suppose, for one year, would it not be better if it were for two years? I do not understand how the prolonged detention, as you would seem to suggest, operates as an evil?—I would say that institutional life under any form is an evil, and if you can bring more of the home life to bear upon the children, then you will have the greater results. I do not think I have found in my own case that those children who are longest with me are the best.

10,260. And what is the average length of time that you think it advisable to keep those children?—I think about two years, although we may keep some as many as five years. From some infirmity of body or otherwise they may not be fit to go away.

10,261. Have you made up in your mind the maximum time a boy should stay in those Homes?—I think after two years it is best for the boy to go.

10,262. Because the boy you think may become too habituated to the place?—Yes, and the routine too mechanical.

10,263. Become crystallised?—Yes.

10,264. And you think the same sort of influence may be at work in a Reformatory?—I think it is likely to be more accentuated in a Reformatory.

10,265. Then in any scheme of reformation of habitual offenders you would attempt to limit the number in the institution as far as possible?—Yes.

10,266. And either work with limited numbers, or as nearly as could be on family lines?—Yes, but let the children be removed from their parents, if they have any.

10,267. How have you determined the limits of these separate Homes that you have?—The numbers are limited by the capacity of the house. The household is 30, we say.

10,268. But you built the house?—Yes, to hold 30.

10,269. You had made up your mind that 30 was the proper number?—I would say that more than 30 is injurious.

10,270. That is even a large number?—I would say 20.

10,271. Financial reasons to a certain extent affected you?—And the changing of so many to Mr. William Canada prevents the staleness of the work. There is a revolving, so to speak, every year out of the house.

10,272. A yearly revolution, as it were?—Exactly.

10,273. And in all this reformatory work you think it is necessary that things should be kept alive?—I believe that to be the life of the children in the future.

10,274. Can you give us any notion how to proceed with adults who have dropped away from goodness?—I know of nothing that will do it but love. Law will hardly do it; but if you have to deal with a habitual drunkard, whose senses have got so marred and so debased, then you must put law to that man till you get him to understand what love is.

10,275. I daresay you have thought of such things. Would you mind letting us have your views a little further in detail?—If you ask me about a drunkard as a habitual criminal, I would say that he should be confined by the testimony of the neighbourhood in which he lives as a pest to it.

10,276. But after you have got him, what would you do with him?—Say, give him six months, and during the six months you try to cure him of his drunken habits by those methods that have been adopted, and that you had cured the appetite for drink, that man might be allowed out before his term was up.

10,277. I think all the medical evidence seems to hint that the various medicinal retreats are failures?—I am not sure that they are failures. I insist on detention for a habitual offender.

10,278. If you are throwing out the drug remedies how would you proceed?—I see no cure for a man like that unless his heart be turned to kill his appetite.

10,279. Well, then, how would you proceed?—There is nothing but love can make love, and a man, may be, who has gone through the same fire himself and been cured, may be able to bring pressure on his fellows, and the likelihood is he will be able to keep him.

10,280. In fact, you want a master-hand?—Yes.

10,281. But would you have an arrangement built upon the lines of your own institution—that is, upon having a variety of small homes, or would you disperse these people?—They would be better dispersed than in large numbers.

10,282. Would you have them congregated or single?—I should say 10 or 12 in a suitable building.

10,283. How long would you keep them?—That is difficult to say, but until the appetite was cured.

10,284. He would work?—I would insist upon that; and if he had a family, I would try to get him to make sufficient to keep his family.

10,285. Do you find any difficulty in getting these boys to do work?—No difficulty whatever.

10,286. None of them show laziness?—They have been spoiled often before we get them, but they soon come to it and do it willingly.

10,287. And you think his eagerness to work is the index of his reformation?—We say to a lad that if we can do him any good by sending him to Canada we must see evidence that he is fit to be sent, and you have to do the same with the drunkard. You might give him two years, and tell him that if you saw evidence that he had improved, that he might be admitted out before the time.

10,288. But it would not be a good thing for him to go back amongst his friends?—No.

10,289. And with the women, how would you proceed with them?—Theirs is a very sad case. I have tried women even of education. There was a teacher I had in the Govan Road Home. She could speak six languages, and she lived with me for a good few months without ever going out. I let her out, however, one Saturday night, and she promised to come back all straight. I did not see her again until Monday, when I went to see her in a house in the northern quarter of the city; and she was almost in a nude state.

Mr. William
Quarrier.

18 Dec. 1894.

10,290. A proper house?—It was just a poor woman's house. She had been found lying on the stair and was taken in.

10,291. (By the Chairman.) Did you get any good out of her?—No good; she had to go.

10,292. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you think the same lines of treatment for delinquent children are at all applicable to adults?—I do not think children need half so much as adults.

10,293. The habits of the adults are confirmed, you think, and the reformation is a more difficult task?—You have to be more rigid with the adult and more placid with the child, whose failings you have to overlook, and get him to realise that you are caring for him.

10,294. You do not approve of fixing the sentences passed on children sent to Reformatories?—I do not think it is good at all.

10,295. You would rather go in for a system of indeterminate sentences?—Yes, longer or shorter.

10,296. Do you classify your children at the Bridge of Weir?—No, they are all mixed.

10,297. But if there were a wide range of ages, would you not classify them?—You would not cure a bad boy by classifying him with the bad boys. If you want to tame a wild horse, you must put him alongside a tame one. My experience is, that a bad boy who is put among a lot of good children is bound to submit to the overpowering good that is there; and it does not need force.

10,298. Of course you attach great significance to the fact that you send your boys to Canada, and the Canadian Government have no objection?—Yes.

10,299. I suppose the Canadian Government would refuse to receive the adult offenders of this country?—And rightly.

10,300. You are also aware that children from the Reformatories are sent to Canada?—A few; not many.

10,301. Are the results satisfactory?—They are not so satisfactory, I understand, as ours.

10,302. I have seen a boy from a Scotch Reformatory in the Toronto Jail. Is that your experience?—98 per cent. of our boys do well, and I am sure Mr. Massey, the governor of Toronto Jail, will testify to that, and that he has not had any of our children under his charge.

10,303. Yes, I know; he told me that himself. Is it the fault of the father or the mother which for the most part results in the children getting into your hands?—My children come to me because they are fatherless, and many of them come to me because their mother cannot manage them; and I get the material in such a state of confusion, that I have to undo the wrong and build up the child aright.

10,304. Do you find drunkenness more common among women than men in the class you get the children from?—The cases with widows especially might also be balanced, but when a woman goes wrong she goes very wrong.

10,305. Am I correct in saying that a very large part of your work is of the kind undertaken by the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Society?—Yes, there is a large quantity.

10,306. If it were said that that Society rescues in Edinburgh three children for every one in Glasgow, that would not be at all a correct representation of the work that is done here?—The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children in Edinburgh does not do half the work of the Society in Glasgow.

10,307. It falls to your hands?—Yes, and other agencies.

10,308. (By Dr. Farquharson.) You do not attach so much influence to heredity in drink as some other witnesses we have had before us?—My conclusion is just the result of observations I have made amongst the children.

10,309. You attach more importance to surroundings than heredity?—I do. The surroundings are a very large factor in the future of a child.

Mr. William
Quarrier.

18 Dec. 1894.

10,310. You do not find your children ever relapse in a mysterious kind of way; for instance, from no other cause than going back to their parents' habits?—I find if a mother will against my will take her boy out of our Home, that the mother has come back to tell me that she has made a mistake in taking the child out and training it her own way. I believe there are 90 per cent. of parties who have taken their children away, thinking they could manage them after two years of my training, and when they were put back in their old surroundings they went wrong again.

10,311. What do you attach most importance to? Getting the child early?—Yes, and away from its surroundings. A child that is in the habit of going to saloons and theatres and other questionable places, will do anything to gratify its desires, and needs to be removed entirely from their influence.

10,312. Then even in heredity you would take the tendency away by changing its surroundings?—I have proved that by thousands of cases.

10,313. (By the Chairman.) About the effect of whipping on juvenile offenders. Do you get many boys who have been whipped by the Police Magistrates?—Not many. I do get a few from the Magistrates, but they send them to the Industrial Schools. It is law keeping law; mine is purely voluntary.

10,314. I do not mean the Magistrates sending them to you. A boy is up for some trifling affair, throwing stones at windows, and he is ordered to be whipped. Do many of them become inmates of your Homes afterwards?—Not many.

10,315. What is your opinion as to the effect of the whipping. Does it degrade them?—I do not think it does good.

10,316. It is a very undesirable thing to send juvenile offenders to prison?—I think, if that can be avoided, it should never be done.

10,317. In cases where you must have some other punishment, would whipping appear to be better or worse than prison?—I think if that boy could be got into a true moral surrounding he would neither need whipping nor imprisonment.

10,318. But if the Magistrate has only the option of whipping or imprisonment?—I would say the whipping would be the better of the two.

10,319. Have you any corporal punishment at your Homes?—I do not believe in whipping above 14 under any circumstances.

10,320. But have you the usual system of palmies?—We have the tawse; but I have inculcated that they should never be used, and that moral power is better—that the boy should stand in a corner for an hour if he has been misbehaving. The tawse are thus very seldom seen. Indeed, owing to one of the female teachers being inclined to use them, I burnt the tawse a few years ago. We find that keeping a penny off a boy on Saturday, or sending him off to his bed when all the rest are out at cricket or football, is a far worse punishment than the tawse.

10,321. So that these punishments will be applicable both to boys and girls?—Yes, they are.

10,322. It is even less desirable to send a young girl to prison?—You will never make anything of sending a young girl to prison.

10,323. Can you make any suggestion as to how to deal with cases of this kind?—I think there should be something outside the prison which should take hold of her on voluntary lines.

10,324. But we cannot do that. In many places there are what are called certified cells, where prisoners may be detained for a short time. Do you think it would be an improvement to confine short-sentence cases there rather than send them to prison?—I do not think it does them a bit of good. The moral power is the thing to wield, if you can. [The witness then withdrew.]

19 Dec. 1894.

10,325. (By the Chairman.) You have no official connection with the prison?—No, but the Catholic priests who visit the prison are members of my community and live with me, and I have had experience of many habitual criminals.

10,325a. And also I suppose of a large number of the poorer classes?—Yes. I should say besides that, that I had a note from Dr. Sutherland about this matter, and I brought it before the Senior Priests' Union of the Clergy of Glasgow. They appointed a small Committee to consider the matter, and the views I give you are their views as well as my own.

10,325b. Would you just tell us your views on the subject of intemperance, and the connection of intemperance with habitual offenders in the first place. I suppose you have an immense amount of intemperance?—No; I would not say an immense amount by any means. We have a large amount, but not immense.

10,325c. We shall take it as contrasted with other towns. Have you any experience of other towns?—Yes, I have lived in Liverpool and in London, and I should say in regard to our people that they contrast very favourably with the Catholics—I mean the Irish Catholics—of Liverpool, and Manchester, and London.

10,325d. In Glasgow, could you give us any idea of the Catholic population?—We calculate it at between 150,000 and 160,000.

10,325e. Is that based on the census?—It is based on the census returns we make up in each of our parishes, and also on the baptisms.

10,326. This Catholic population is divided into two portions, the Irish and the Highland, is it not?—We don't make any distinction.

10,327. But practically there are the two nationalities?—Yes, there are.

10,328. You have no means of saying how many belong to the one section, and how many to the other?—I could not exactly say, but the Highland portion would be comparatively small, I should say 3000 would be the outside.

10,329. What do you estimate the Irish population of Glasgow would amount to—about one-fourth of the entire population?—Between one-fourth and one-fifth, but I am taking in the extended boundary just now, including Govan.

10,330. That is a larger proportion than exists in Liverpool, is it not?—No; we are more than one-fifth there, we are over one-fourth.

10,331. In Liverpool we find that the number of arrests for breach of the peace, petty assaults, drunk and incapable, and drunk and disorderlies, were last year only 19 per 1000, and in Glasgow 60 per 1000 of the population?—I do not think that the number of convictions and arrests would be any index of the amount of intemperance that prevails. In our district, St. Rollox for instance, I see that there are ten, twelve or thirteen cases on the Saturday, but that would not give you any index of the number of cases of intemperance. There are more cases of intemperance in Liverpool, though not convicted.

10,332. But you will notice the class I am speaking of—petty assaults, breach of the peace, drunk and incapable, and drunk and disorderly—these are all petty offences?—Yes, but I am talking of cases of drunkenness, although they commit no breach of the peace. They are much better here, as we ourselves see from the number and appearance of the children in attendance at the schools and Sunday Schools, and of the parents of the children coming to church. These all show that our people are very much more temperate and sober here than in Liverpool.

10,333. And notwithstanding that the number of arrests is under one-third of the number of arrests in Glasgow?—Possibly.

10,334. Is that owing to the superior activity of the police in Glasgow?—I could not judge that. I could not compare the police, I only take the cases; and I may say that these cases which come within the knowledge of the police, it is these hard cases that we must deal with. Experience is that those who have been convicted the second or third time, their case is very hopeless under existing arrangements.

10,335. You have been in Liverpool yourself?—Yes, for some years.

10,336. Well, you have not observed any difference in the action of the police, nor of the class of people that would be taken up?—No.

10,337. You have told us that your Glasgow area—what is the diocese?—I am speaking of the city of Glasgow only. The diocese includes many of the outside towns and districts.

10,338. We shall take the city of Glasgow, including Govan. Do you think that Glasgow is the more disorderly, or more intemperate place, than Govan?—Much the same here as in Govan. I might say also that, of late years, drunkenness has been very much less amongst our people since the League of the Cross—a temperance society founded by His Grace, the Archbishop—was founded; it has worked an enormous change in the habits of our people.

10,339. I ask you about Govan?—Govan is practically the same.

10,340. We find that Govan has only 28 per 1000 of arrests for these offences, which is less than half what occurs in Glasgow?—Well, of course such people are drawn to the centre of the town. Then there are those who are in the model lodging-houses, in the central districts, you might naturally find more cases there than in an outskirt like Govan. For instance, in St. Rollox, where I live, our people who get drunk do not get drunk so often with us as when they go down the town.

10,341. But does not that counterbalance itself—the south-sider will get drunk in St. Rollox?—No; the people from the districts find their way to about Argyle Street and Trongate, and the frequented parts of the city. The Govan people may get drunk there, and perhaps be counted amongst the Glasgow cases. In St. Rollox the number of cases brought up amongst us is very small, but some of our people may have perhaps been arrested and brought before the magistrate in the Central Division.

10,342. Have you any suggestion to make on behalf of your Senior Priests' Union, as to how the very regrettable amount of drunkenness that prevails might be diminished?—Of course it is a very big question, and takes in more subjects than can fall under your inquiry. For instance, we believe the housing of the poor has to do with it, and also the high rents. We have a strong feeling also that the want of rational amusement may have something to do with it. In connection with our Church it is obligatory in every Catholic church of the Archdiocese of Glasgow that there should be a temperance society, and it is obligatory that there should be halls for amusements and different games, and we find that these halls of amusement make all the difference in the world. The parishes provided with them find it much more easy to keep the men sober than the parishes without them; so that, if by any public means places of recreation could be provided instead of the public-house as the sole place, much good might be done.

*Father John
M'Mullen.*

19 Dec. 1894.

10,343. We shall take the case of an amusement which is perfectly innocent and healthy—football, say. We have been told by certain people that football matches lead to a great deal of drinking and, in fact, to a considerable amount of drunkenness—that is distinguishing between drinking where it does not become a police offence, and drunkenness where it does!—I would rather differ from those. Naturally, where there is a very large number, say 10,000 or 15,000 people gathered together, a certain number will get drunk there as they would have done elsewhere.

10,344. Take another case—races and excursions. We are told there is an enormous amount of drunkenness. For instance, Ayr has a very large ratio of arrests, and the explanation is the excursions and the races!—Yes, but you would have to take the percentage of the number of excursionists. A number of those persons, did they remain in town, would get drunk at any rate. Accompanied by a number of priests, we had a large excursion of our own in the country, several thousands, of whom a good many would have got drunk if they had remained in town, and, as it was, we had very few.

10,345. But don't you think in your excursion, accompanied by a number of priests, there would be less drunkenness!—Yes, there would be less on that account than might be otherwise.

10,346. Do you think there would be less drunkenness still if you had these amusements of which you spoke!—Yes.

10,347. I simply put that proposal to you in regard to amusements, in case it is decided by our inquiry to make any recommendation!—Just so. Then I might say, as regards the drink traffic, we hold that the number of public-houses is far beyond the requirements, and that this constitutes a danger to the working classes.

10,348. Have you anything to suggest on the administration?—We feel in regard to this that the present licensing laws are not carried out with that strictness that they might be.

10,349. There is one particular point about the publicans. They are guilty of a breach of the licensing laws in supplying drink to drunk persons!—We have often debated that question. There are some publicans—perhaps we can hardly say whether a majority or a minority—who are very conscientious; but there are others who are not so. There is no doubt that the publicans know drunkards who go in and get drunk week after week. They are known to the police, to their neighbours, and to the publicans, to be drunkards, and yet they are supplied in these houses till they are very drunk.

10,350. To supply a man who is a drunkard is not an offence, but to supply a man who is drunk is an offence!—Well, I speak of a man who is three-fourths drunk, and will certainly, if supplied, become very drunk. We do believe that supplying to these does take place. We have actually seen cases.

10,351. The police authorities complain that it is very difficult to get evidence in these cases, and I have been unable to find that any voluntary organisation assists them in obtaining evidence!—There is a suspicion that the police are not altogether free from blame in this matter, but it is a mere matter of suspicion. There is a suspicion that the police allow certain publicans off, and that they receive bribes. I cannot prove it, but there is a suspicion of that—that feeling is pretty wide. Then, again, we feel that drunkenness, as different from drunk and disorderly or drunk and incapable, should be made criminal. There should be some stigma attached to it, some means of getting at these drunkards, as this larger class does a greater amount of injury to their families and to the community than the comparatively small number of drunk and disorderly.

10,352. What means would you suggest!—Those who have more experience of foreign countries, and how these things are managed in other parts, should know better. Our idea is that there should be a list drawn up of persons declared habitual drunkards. This list should be supplied to the police and to the publicans, and the latter prohibited, under penalties, from serving such persons with drink. That would not, of course, always succeed, but it might have a healthy effect.

10,353. You do not mean merely the police court habitual!—No, the drunkards in family.

10,354. Are you in favour of compulsory segregation, at the instance of their friends, of the non-criminal habitual!—Yes; but before they are compulsorily separated there should be some other means taken.

10,355. They should be named, and publicans prohibited from serving them!—Yes; you could forbid the publican knowingly to supply habitual drunkards. These might obtain drink where they are not known, but in many cases the fear of being put on the list would have a deterrent effect.

10,356. Yes; but how would you make up the list if the man had not come under the notice of the police!—They do come under the notice of the police. At present as long as a man is not disorderly he is not arrested, but the police see him going home drunk. Again the name could be put on the list on the application and proof of the family or neighbours of the drunkard. We would press that habitual drunkenness, though not disorderly or incapable, should be made an offence. They are sinning actually against the family.

10,357. Yes; but if you take up these, you will take up six people in every hundred men, women, and children in Glasgow every year, if you extend the interference of the police so as to include every man who is staggering home singing a song!—I speak of habitual drunkards.

10,358. We know that the number of instances of police court cases is very small compared with the actual number of cases, and that the harm that is done by these habitual drunkards, although they have not broken the laws of the city, is incalculable. We are fully aware of all the evils of drunkenness. I shall ask you, therefore, not to elaborate that point of the subject; but your plan of dealing with them would be that if a man was frequently seen evidently intoxicated, though not criminally intoxicated, that the police should note him and his name on the list!—Yes, there should be a black list, and it should be supplied to the publicans. This would be the first step. If, after a certain time, the drunkard did not reform, his name should be entered on a public list. Thus a greater stigma would be attached to drunkenness, and a healthier public tone with regard to it engendered. As to the publicans, they should be punished for knowingly serving drink to those on the lists. It would be difficult for publicans to recognise the drunkards in every case, as it would be difficult to prove such knowledge against the publicans, but if a number of cases were prosecuted, in time the effect would be good. There should also be a public list.

10,359. After that, would you individually, or your union, be in favour of letting a man, at the instance of his friends, be brought before the sheriff, and on evidence be declared an habitual drunkard, and committed to some retreat or reformatory!—Decidedly;

*Father John
M'Mullen.*

19 Dec. 1894.

- Father John M'Mullen.*
[19 Dec. 1894.]
- after a certain time or warning being allowed him. We do not want to take him right off without a chance.
- 10,360. He would not be taken off without a chance if the sheriff had to take evidence that he was really an habitual!—Yes, but this power is so great, and interferes so much with existing ideas, that we think that the individual should have a chance of reformation; that he should be informed by the police that this compulsory separation would take place in his case if he did not draw up.
- 10,361. You have not been brought in contact with the habitual criminals to any exceptionally large extent?—We have not any exceptional knowledge, but it is a matter which, like other matters, we meet every six or eight weeks during the year, and discuss in reference to our people. We feel that in regard to habitual criminals the cases are, under existing circumstances, hopeless—at least almost hopeless. At present when they get out of prison they are met by their companions, and they find difficulty in getting work. They complain also that the police watch them, and that they lose heart, and get into a kind of despair.
- 10,362. We met a gentleman belonging to your Church—Canon Donlevy—in Edinburgh, who went to prison with us. There was a woman, a prisoner, that had been described to us as a desperate pest by the Inspector of Poor. Canon Donlevy said she had a great many good points, and he found her a situation in the country, and she kept square for six months. She might have kept all right, but her affection led her to come to Edinburgh, and she broke away. He promised to look after her again. With your Church and its wide ramifications, could not a good deal be done in dealing with habitual criminals, and transferring them from one place to another?—That is what we think might be done, because, if you remove them from their associations, our experience is that these people have very good dispositions as a rule, and they are not so very much worse morally than those outside; but it is the weakness and the hopelessness they feel.
- 10,363. As a matter of fact you have no such organisation?—No; we have a home at Dalbeth.
- 10,364. That is a reformatory, is it not?—We have also a home for women.
- 10,365. Have you any special knowledge of Dalbeth?—Yes.
- 10,366. Is that the orphanage?—No, the refuge is quite different from the reformatory.
- 10,367. Could you tell us the rules of that place?—The rules, as I understand, are not just so strict as in similar institutions. Not only are those admitted who have fallen into drunken or immoral habits, but also those who are in danger of falling.
- 10,367A. Do you know anything about the working of the reformatory schools connected with your Church?—No.
- 10,368. (By Col. M'Hardy.) There are not any?—Yes, there is a reformatory at Slatefield. There is the Dalbeth Reformatory also, for girls.
- 10,369. There were none in it in 1892, and none in it in 1893. It was closed, I am told, as a reformatory, and it was succeeded as an industrial school?—And refuge. There is an industrial school at Dalbeth, but it is a refuge at the present time for women.
- 10,370. (By the Chairman.) About this refuge, do you happen to know of your own personal experience any cases of women who have gone through that course who have proved permanent cures?—Oh, yes.
- 10,371. Many?—Many. We know of them who have been all right for two years; but the difficulty is that we lose sight of them, either through apathy or from a feeling that they don't like to write to us, lest their employers might know that they had been with us.
- 10,372. I thought that, with the machinery of your Church, you would have been able to look after them?—Yes, but our staff is so few, and our Church has to look after so many things.
- 10,373. Well, I simply wanted to know?—We have not. In regard to these places, these homes and reformatories, we would like very much to be able to extend them, but the difficulty is in the expense. Many of these girls are not good work-women. Of course laundry work is the work we give to them, and as they are not skilled laundrywomen, their work is not so remunerative, and we have to make collections in order to meet expenditure. If we intended to extend them we would need to have very much more means. If the Government would give us some help, we would be willing to extend the system so far as we could.
- 10,374. What would you employ your women at?—Much the same thing as at present. They are supposed to be self-supporting with public contributions, but if Government would give us some help it would make up for the bad work of the women.
- 10,375. But don't you think laundry work is overdone?—Yes; but we might have this Government assistance to make up for that. It takes about £14 a head a year for each inmate.
- 10,376. What else would you have?—There might be knitting and sewing. The knitting is easier than sewing.
- 10,377. And is it more remunerative?—It might be a little. What I do know as regards those who are knitting in their own homes, and those who are sewing in their own homes, is that knitting pays better than sewing.
- 10,378. But you can give us no hints as to any other industrial employment for women?—Of course there are women's employments of different kinds.
- 10,379. Could you add to our category?—There might be some of the girls in these homes who might be a little bit better educated, and there is the illumination of Christmas cards. I know some girls in their homes get employment—addressing envelopes and circulars, and such like.
- 10,380. Fruit-farming has been suggested?—As to anything on a large scale, such as fruit-farming, I do not know that I could suggest anything.
- 10,381. Is there any point that your Union wishes to suggest to us?—I think I have pretty well travelled over the subject.
- 10,382. Do you come across many vagrants?—Yes.
- 10,383. Have you any organisation for assisting them?—No. We have one or two homes for girls from a distance, seeking employment.
- 10,384. There must be a great number of girls coming from Ireland across here?—Not so many of the class of vagrants. Most of them come to their relations or friends.
- 10,385. In search of work?—Very few unprotected single girls come from Ireland.
- 10,386. I should rather have said tramps than vagrants, which include vagrants—that is, honest workmen and workwomen really in search of work, and the vagrant who pretends to be in search of work but does not want it. Have you any organisation for dealing with them?—Well, there is a convent where there is a small home for girls, and occasionally the Society of St Vincent de Paul obtains employment for them in private houses. We think there should be some home for these girls. There are cases of prostitution, we find, among this class.
- 10,387. Semi-state or municipally supported homes?—Yes, if there were help of a certain amount given, we would establish these homes; but we have so much to do with our churches and schools that we cannot do much ourselves, particularly as our people are of the poorer working-class. But we are able to do a certain amount, and we would do a great deal more if we had a little help from the state.
- 10,388. (By Col. M'Hardy.) The Roman Catholic visiting clergymen in Glasgow in the prisons have, as a rule, been Passionist fathers, and not the parish clergymen?—Some years ago it was found that the parish priests were unwilling to take the work at the ridiculously small salary. His Grace the Archbishop asked us to take it, but as soon as he feels he can

- Father John M'Mullen.*

- make proper arrangements again he will take up the work. We have only taken it temporarily.
- 10,389. There are a considerable number of prisoners Roman Catholics; out of 2500 in Scotland, there appear to be 950 Roman Catholics?—Yes; I should say in connection with that, that the tramps in Ireland, who are perhaps the hard cases in their own town, and whom the priests do not like to have about them, generally find their way to Liverpool or Glasgow. They have not all become criminals here in Glasgow, but many have been corner-boys and drunkards at home, and Glasgow and Liverpool are not to get all the discredit of these people.
- 10,390. It is desirable, I suppose, in order to procure the reformation of these people, to treat them as far as you can on a principle of dispersion in homes?—Certainly.
- 10,391. And do you think it desirable that one should try, in cases of Irishmen, for instance, who get into bad habits in Scotland, that they should be returned to their home in Ireland?—I am afraid they would find it very difficult in Ireland in the country parishes, where they usually come from. The people live much better lives there than they do here, and I am afraid that between the parish priests in Ireland and the neighbours they would not feel very much at home.
- 10,392. But they would be surrounded by healthy religious influences?—Yes, if you could provide work for them.
- 10,393. But is there not considerable scope for rough labour work in Ireland?—I think, from the amount of emigration that takes place, that the supply of labour is rather abundant. I have been round Ireland very frequently on missions to the different parishes, but I have not heard of any place where labourers were required.
- 10,394. The Roman Catholic Church at one time had a reformatory at Dalbeth?—Yes.
- 10,394A. And they closed that?—Yes.
- 10,395. In 1892?—Yes, about that time.
- 10,396. What means have the Roman Catholic Church in Scotland for receiving girls who are sent to a reformatory?—As far as I am aware, we have no female reformatory at the present time.
- 10,397. So that there is no provision made in Scotland for these girls, and they have to be sent out of the country, sometimes as far as Bristol, I think?—Yes. There are some difficulties connected with Dalbeth; but as you say you intend to visit there, the Mother Superior will be able to explain to you.
- 10,398. The supply, I think, of reformatory children at Dalbeth failed, owing to the lack of applications for admission. That is what is stated in the report of 1892?—Yes. We have industrial schools for both boys and girls but not a reformatory for girls. We have a boys' reformatory at Slatefield.
- 10,399. What means have you for looking after girls: is there one in Abercromby Street in Glasgow?—In Abercromby Street there is an industrial school.
- 10,400. But there is no reformatory in Scotland?—No. [The witness then withdrew.]

Dr. G. Wilson. GEORGE R. WILSON, M.B., C.M., Physician Superintendent, Mavisbank Asylum, Polton, called in and examined. Dr. G. R. Wilson.

10,401. (By the Chairman.) I understand you have a good deal of experience in connection with persons of inebriate habits that voluntarily commit themselves to your care?—I have had some experience. I have only been at Mavisbank since July, but previous to that I was at Morningside for four and a half years, and all through my life, before and during my medical course, and since my graduation, I have been associated with the treatment of drunkenness.

10,402. They don't take many voluntary persons into Morningside?—They keep down the number as far as possible. In Mavisbank I have had a good many.

10,403. How many?—About fifteen through my hands since July.

10,404. How are they sent in?—They come in voluntarily.

10,405. What does the voluntaryism amount to; do they come in at their own expense, or do they come in because of father or husband or some one else who supports them, and says, you must go in there and we shall pay for you, or you will be cut adrift altogether?—We have all three classes. We have patients—one or two, not many—who come in absolutely of their own accord, who begin to feel the habit growing too strong, and are sensible enough to know that they may get some help from seclusion.

10,406. Before we depart from them, are these people pure drunkards, or are they people who have had attacks of some form of insanity through drinking on previous occasions?—No. As a rule they have not been insane; they are simple drunkards. Then we have the other class who come in at the suggestion of their friends. There is a considerable amount of pressure put on them. Then I would put a third class who come in because it is the last thing left to them. Their friends tell them they are left to sink or swim.

10,407. Well, we shall take the case of those who come in under compulsion of their friends; how many of these have you had under your notice?—I cannot speak absolutely. I should say just now I can recollect three ladies and five gentlemen.

10,408. How long do they stay with you?—They stay varying periods—from six weeks up to six months. As a rule they don't stay out the six months.

10,409. In fact, I suppose you cannot make them come under compulsion to stay?—No; but we have a financial pull over them. We make them pay in advance, and if they are discharged they get their board returned. If they discharge themselves against the advice of the medical superintendent or of the family physician, their board is forfeited.

10,410. That is rather a financial pull upon the relatives; it does not come out of the patients' pocket?—Well, in some cases, of course, it does.

10,411. But I am talking of those who come in under the compulsion of their friends who say to them, 'You must go in or we shall let you sink or swim'?—Well, of course, the pull is largely upon the purses of their friends, but it tells upon them also. In some cases the funds are theirs to a certain extent.

10,412. I suppose your experience is of such a nature that you have not been able to trace the results of six months' seclusion at all?—No; but I know the results in some cases of persons who were at Mavisbank before my time, and had been discharged either shortly before or shortly after I went there.

10,413. And what are they?—They are mixed.

10,414. Have you got any accurate statistics about them?—No; I cannot give you the exact dates and that kind of thing.

10,415. But could you give us anything like the percentage or the exact percentage of cures at the end of a year or two years?—No; we cannot follow them up sufficiently for that.

10,416. These cases you speak of cannot be received or detained by you without the permission of the Commissioners on Lunacy?—They have to apply to the Commissioners to be admitted.

10,417. Have you a form of application?—There is no technical form. The patients simply write a letter to the Board saying they wish to come in, and asking the sanction of the Board to their admission. All these preliminaries are transacted between the patient and the Board, or the patient's friends and the Board. The patient simply comes to me with the sanction of the Board.

10,418. Do the Board ever refuse their permission?—They have never refused permission in my experience.

Dr. G. R. Wilson.

19 Dec. 1894.

10,419. Of course you agree that the lunatic asylum is not the proper place—not a desirable place for these cases?—Well, I am not so strong about that as most men are, because I see a great many disadvantages in having a house, especially a comparatively small house, completely occupied by drunkards. That is not altogether a good thing for the moral tone of the house, and I think an admixture of convalescent patients who are recovering from attacks of insanity, and who are not drunkards at all, has its advantages.

10,420. We were told by Dr. Clouston, the Medical Superintendent of Morningside, that the respectable lunatic objected to the low tone of the habitual inebriate, and was disgusted at being compelled to mix with them; and that, on the other hand, if you had many habitual drunkards or any appreciable leaven of drunkards in the asylum, these men very often spent their time plotting how to break the rules so as to get drink and so on, and exercised a demoralising influence on the patients?—I think there is a great deal to be said about that, but I have changed my opinion since going to Mavisbank. I have not found that the patients object to have voluntary dipsomaniacs as patients. I do not think that, on the whole, my alcoholic patients spoil the discipline of the house with respect to the treatment of the insane. Wherever you have these alcoholic patients they will be scheming and be difficult to manage, but I do not think the house is at all more difficult to manage with its mixed population than it would be if it were simply an inebriate establishment. Of course, it is more difficult to manage than it would be if it were simply an asylum for insane.

10,421. That was exactly Dr. Clouston's point. He looked at it purely from a lunatic's point of view, and said that from the point of view of the lunatic it was undesirable?—I fully admit that. It does make the house more difficult to manage as an asylum. But it has its advantages. In Mavisbank, for instance, you have a population of between 50 and 60 mixed of insane and alcoholic patients. Of these 50 or 60 there are ten alcoholic patients. They are, for the most part, men who are fairly intelligent. They are not demented. They are fairly active mentally, and they add greatly to the life of the place. They do a lot to cheer up the lunatics, and association with them by the lunatics is not altogether harmful.

10,422. We shall take another point. It has been urged upon us by every one who has spoken on the subject from a professional point of view that it was most important on the part of the habitual drunkard to go off work?—Yes.

10,423. What do your patients pay?—They all pay. Our lowest rate is £100 a year, and for the first quarter I always recommend the friends to pay at the £150 rate, if possible, so that the patient may have a man as an attendant to himself, so that he may have greater liberty.

10,424. You order lunatic patients to work for the good of their health, because you find it makes them quieter and makes them sleep better, makes them up better physically, and so cures them better of their disease. People regard that as obviously rational treatment. But, if you have got a man paying at the rate of £150 as an habitual drunkard, you cannot make him work, and you are deprived of the most rational treatment?—But we do make him work.

10,425. Does his friends not say, 'Well, we are paying a high rate for the man, and we do not see why he should work?'—No; the friends are very sensible and acquiesce very fully in what is done.

10,426. What do you make the men work at?—Garden work chiefly but not entirely. I have, for instance, one man working two hours regularly in the garden. I have another alcoholic patient working practically all the time of daylight at a joiner's bench. I have a third who does all sorts of engineering work about the place, and does it of his own accord. The ladies also do their kind of work. It is nearly all sewing; in the summer time we had them working in the hayfield, and also in the garden, but not in the winter.

10,427. I suppose you got them into the hayfield as a sort of frolic almost on their part?—Yes; in fact I had to lead them myself, and they regarded it as a kind of picnic, but it had its effect no doubt, and they work in the garden quite cheerfully as a rule.

10,428. How many do you say have stayed the six months within your recollection, taking those who were in the place when you were there?—I have not had a single voluntary patient remaining out the six months since I went.

10,429. They have all forfeited?—As a matter of fact one man was discharged. His own medical man and I consulted and discharged him before. The others discharged themselves before we brought in this regulation about the money business.

10,430. Then is it your opinion that they had had long enough treatment to be all permanently cured?—Only in some cases; in the aggravated cases I certainly think not.

10,431. What detention would you consider necessary?—In aggravated cases I think you could not do much under a year. I made a mistake in saying we had no case of anyone staying six months. We have just discharged one man who has been over six months, and we call him 'discharged recovered.' I have great hopes of him if he is looked after, I think he is a very hopeful case indeed.

10,432. In your treatment do you eliminate alcohol altogether from the diet of the asylum?—Absolutely.

10,433. Do you try to persuade them to become abstainers?—Yes; but I never ask them to pledge.

10,434. Do they often pledge?—I don't know. I never ask them to pledge, but I always insist so far as I can that they shall be abstainers, and I press it upon them as strongly as I can.

10,435. We have had evidence given on behalf of various alleged cures—secret cures so far—the Tyson cure, the metabolic cure, and the gold cure; what is your opinion regarding these cures?—I disbelieve in them as cures. I think they are only methods of treatment by suggestion; I think they are, on the whole, frauds.

10,436. Well, we have another medical gentleman who proposes to give evidence on the subject of suggestion, that is, hypnotics?—Quite so, but we do not need to go the length of hypnotism. I do a good deal of treatment myself by suggestion. I use in some cases hypodermic injections.

10,437. With what object?—Telling the patient while you are doing so, that this is to take the place of alcohol in his diet; and I think that is all that is in these cures. Some patients believe it, and to a certain extent they have that advantage, but as for a specific cure I don't believe it.

10,438. Or any drug at all?—Not any drug that I am acquainted with.

10,439. In your professional experience and professional reading, there is no drug that is considered as having any specific effect upon the drink cravings?—I do not believe it.

10,440. Strychnia, you are told, is the basis of one or two of these things, but, beyond its tonic effect, I suppose you think there is nothing?—Nothing; it is just a nerve tonic.

10,441. You have told us about referring them from asylums to inebriate homes?—It is not a point I insist upon, but I do not take the objection that most men do to the mixing.

10,442. You are perfectly aware that though inebriates are received in one or two asylums we have, with the exception of yourself, always found the medical superintendents protest against the system, and unwilling as possible to have anything to do with them?—There is another side that may have something to do with that. All these asylums, at least the most of them, are large pauper asylums, and I do not know that these asylums would not be more hurt than mine by introducing inebriate patients, partly because the drunken pauper is probably a worse man to have in one's house than a drunken gentleman.

10,443. But they, of course, would never receive

Dr. G. R. Wilson.

19 Dec. 1894.

*Dr. G. R.
Wilson.*

19 Dec. 1894.

voluntary inebriate paupers?—No; not paupers, but I mean the working-man class, or labouring class.

10,444. I don't know that they generally do receive many of these; it generally appears to be the richer classes that go as voluntary patients?—I have known one or two in Morningside not of the richer class, though not of the pauper class, but an intermediate class.

10,445. (By Miss Stevenson.) Those alcoholic patients you have had, are they generally elderly or young people?—Most of these whom I have had are over 25 and under 60.

10,446. Have you found out that there were any predisposing causes?—In some cases; not in so many as I have looked for. I don't know anything very remarkable in the way of predisposing causes.

10,447. In reference to the employment of these ladies, you say they worked in the garden. Did they do any actually necessary work, or was it simply a sort of amateur work?—It is amateur.

10,448. You have no one there who could really put them through actual work in the way of grafting, and other necessary horticultural work?—No, we have not had our ladies under skilled attendants. We have our men under skilled attendants.

10,449. Don't you think that would be a desirable thing?—Yes, certainly; if it could be done. You don't easily get gardeners who will take the pains to instruct ladies in that kind of thing.

10,450. I suppose the only way would be to have a woman who had been really trained as women now are trained at the Horticultural College at Swanley, to superintend work of that kind?—Then you would need to give her a garden of her own. You might have some difficulty in getting them to work smoothly in a large garden under a head gardener, and alongside a lot of men. You would need to have a ladies' garden and a ladies' gardener.

10,451. But I was thinking of the possibility of an Inebriate Home where this might be one of the regular employments?—Certainly; I don't think you could do better than that kind of employment, and under that kind of supervision.

10,452. Of course the class of patients you have are quite different from those in Morningside or the District Asylum?—Quite.

10,453. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Will you kindly tell us what were the results of the treatment by suggestion which you tried?—I think that that kind of treatment is best suited for treating not actually the drunkenness so much as some of its sensory effects. A great many of our drunken patients complain of various things which seem to them to aggravate their whole condition, and make them ill-conditioned and dissatisfied. They come to us with headaches, for instance, with diffuse pains and weakness in the legs, and that kind of things, and it is for these chiefly that I have treated them by suggestion. The galvanic battery is useful, and also this hypodermic injection is useful. When our patients come to us, especially in the first week or ten days, they feel the want of whisky. In one or two cases I have tried this hypodermic injection of a stimulant kind, which acts as a 'pick-me-up,' to use a slang phrase, and that injection, so far as I have been aware, has taken the place of whisky. When they have had it, they are more content to do without whisky, but to continue it would only be to substitute one habit for another.

10,454. So that in the cure—in the reformation—of an inebriate, some assistance in the initial stages may be obtained from some sort of drug administered somehow?—Certainly, I think so.

10,455. With regard to Morningside, you said that there were some voluntary inebriate patients there, not quite the pauper class, that they were of the working-man order?—Well, they were rather above it. I remember in fact, only two. One was a student, and the other was a skilled labourer of some kind.

10,456. Do you remember how they were paid for?—They were both paid for by their friends.

10,457. Then the charge must have been low?—The intermediate rate at Morningside is £42 a year.

10,458. But were these persons' friends able to pay £42 for them?—Yes, either through their relations or their friends.

10,459. You don't know of any instance of a voluntary patient for inebriety more or less verging upon the pauper class, just above it?—I do not remember any at this moment.

10,460. There are none for whom special rates, more or less nominal, have been fixed?—There is a rate at Morningside, the ordinary £32 rate.

10,461. But nothing less than that?—No.

10,462. (By Dr Sutherland.) At Mavisbank do the inebriates sleep under the same roof as the insane?—Yes.

10,463. Out of your total of 60, your proportion of 15 inebriates is very considerable?—You have gone rather beyond it on both sides. You may take as our average total population 54—it is between 50 and 60; and you may take our average as 12 alcoholic patients, I should say.

10,464. Then the Board of Lunacy,—their only connection with these fifteen you have at present is that they are aware of their presence in your establishment—they have no control over them?—They have full control over them, the same as over a lunatic patient.

10,465. But how can the Board of Lunacy have control over a man or woman who is not a lunatic?—They have been given jurisdiction by law over them, to see that they are properly housed and clothed, and if the patients have any abuse to complain of they have recourse to the Commissioners of Lunacy, the same as our lunatic patients have.

10,466. But does it not strike you as strange that the Board of Lunacy should have control over a man or woman who is not a certified lunatic?—No; because the voluntary patient who puts himself under my charge declines responsibility so far. You see I have complete control over him until he discharges himself from my care, which he can do on three days' notice. But even that three days' notice is something. I can compel him absolutely in every way as I can compel a lunatic. I could use force to him; I could put him under restraint or in seclusion, the same as I can the lunatic patient.

10,467. That power of three days is vested in you by the Lunacy Board?—By the Lunacy laws.

10,468. And yet the people over whom the restraint is exercised are not lunatics?—No.

10,469. (By the Chairman.) The theory is that they come in under apprehension of approaching lunacy?—From some kind of mental effect which has not gone the length of being certifiable lunacy.

10,470. (By Dr Sutherland.) In your experience does the drunkard look upon drunkenness as carrying the same social stigma as insanity?—No; far from it.

10,471. Do you think that drunkards, assuming laws were passed to deal more effectively with them, would care to have the stigma of the lunatic asylum attaching to them,—if a special and inebriate retreat were licensed for their reception and detention?—I am convinced that if I had a separate house I would get many more patients than I do.

10,472. We have been told by the superintendent of one asylum that the habitual drunkards were usually idlers, and frequented the billiard-rooms and were generally a nuisance in the establishment. That is not your experience of them?—You get some of that kind, but my experience is more favourable than that.

10,473. I suppose you would be quite willing to admit that the mixture of lunatics and drunkards may have in some respects an unsettling effect on the former, for this reason, that the drunkard, not being insane, might suggest things to the insane, which might make their control and supervision much more difficult?—I admit that.

10,474. Is it not a fact that drunkards, as a rule, are notoriously untruthful?—There is no doubt about that. It is one of the outstanding things of their mental character.

10,475. Do you find that inebriety exists more

*Dr. G. R.
Wilson.*

19 Dec. 1894.

Dr. G. R.
Wilson.
19 Dec. 1894.

among women or men?—I cannot say about that. I think it is one of the most difficult questions, because women are so secret in their drinking.

10,476. But from the fact that the nervous system of a woman and the diseases to which women are liable are somewhat different from men, do you find that at certain ages and with the existence of certain diseases, more especially uterine, inebriety is more common among women?—My impression is, that in proportion to the amount of drinking, dipsomania is relatively commoner among women than men; but taking them all over I don't know that there are more dipsomaniacs among women than men; my opinion is to the contrary.

10,477. Have you seen hypnotic suggestion used for the cure of any cases?—I have heard of it in some cases coming under the notice of other practitioners.

10,478. Is it not the case that disastrous nervous effects follow frequent inducement of the hypnotic condition in the way, for instance, it is practised in France?—It depends on the extent of the hypnotism, and the frequency of the treatment. I have known disastrous effects follow a deep hypnotism.

10,479. Would you expect any good from the mere injection of distilled water in a case of inebriety?—Certainly.

10,480. Of course they would not experience the effects that strychnia would have in their system?—Certainly not.

10,481. May we take it that the Lunacy Commissioners do exercise a supervision over inebriates, who are neither technically or legally insane, lodged in asylums?—They do certainly.

10,482. With this difference that the inebriate can demand his freedom at the end of three days?—Yes.

10,483. (By Dr Farquharson.) How long has Mavisbank been established?—About fifteen years.

10,484. Has it records during the whole of the period of its existence of their treatment of chronic inebriates?—Not of the results after the discharge of the patients.

10,485. You have not followed them up?—No.

10,486. What is the most prolonged period of detention or occupation that they generally carry out in voluntary cases?—Very few stay longer than three months; most of them stay that come with their board paid up.

10,487. Then the enthusiasm for cure is not very victorious?—Well we have very few who come in from the enthusiasm for cure; the majority come in under the compulsion of their friends.

10,488. Those who came in with the motive of enthusiasm, does the motive last long?—The most outstanding thing about alcoholic patients is their hopefulness, their false judgment, and inability to see their own weakness. A man who has got a fright and come in, and having been six weeks in the house, thinks himself safe, cannot be persuaded against going out and risking himself. They are very sanguine on the subject.

10,489. Then the only compulsion you can use is of a benignant kind?—Yes, but of course that does not amount to much in most cases.

10,490. But a husband may put in a wife and say, 'If you don't go in for a number of years I won't support you'?—Oh yes, there are cases of that kind.

10,491. Do you think the results would be better if you had full powers of compulsion?—Undoubtedly; I think any drunkard who wishes to be cured can be cured under the present system if his friends are properly instructed and deal fairly with him, but the majority do not realise the gravity of their position, and I think you cannot cure any considerable number of them at present. If we had compulsory powers I think we would cure a considerable number of them.

10,492. If you had compulsion, would you ask for a legal minimum of detention, say twelve months or eighteen months or two years?—No; I should rather be inclined to fix a legal maximum without further certification.

10,493. And leave the intervening periods to the discretion of the medical superintendent?—Yes, because I have come across one or two cases in which I had evidence that prolonged detention, even the length of a year would do more harm than good. That is exceptional, of course; but I have seen people who would experience as much harm by staying in a year as others would who go out too soon.

10,494. Do you think they would suffer from a prolongation of the period?—Yes; chiefly because, in our institutions, as at present run, there is always an amount of mental inactivity and monotony in the place, and any one who has been in an asylum knows that it is impossible to make life quite so cheerful and active as a man's life is outside, so that I have sometimes thought there would be cases in which you might say to the patient that he had much better go back to his work and have his mind occupied, so long as he could do so with the help of his friends and relatives. But of course that is exceptional.

10,495. Are you pretty hopeful, that, with the powers you have indicated, you will be able to cure a large number of chronic inebriates?—Yes; very hopeful. In fact, it means a certainty in my mind. I consider drunkenness quite a curable disease, given the proper means of cure.

10,496. At all stages?—Not all stages. There are few stages at which drunkenness is not curable, but there are certain effects that you cannot cure.

10,497. Don't you think physical degeneration would prevent you curing the crave?—In some cases perhaps, but I think the notion of the crave is very much exaggerated. There is very little of that among my people.

10,498. Why do they drink if it is not a craving?—Chiefly habit.

10,499. Just a convivial habit?—More or less, convivial or careless.

10,500. Now, as regards suggestion; do you think you would have any chance of doing anything by suggestion to one of the lower educated class who has got into the drink habit?—More so, I think, than on an educated person, because the method of treatment by suggestion is based on the gullibility of the patient.

10,501. But then if, as you indicated, the effect of the suggestion and the injection combined is to diminish the craving, and the craving is a rare concomitant of the drink habit that gives a very limited range?—I do not think I used the term crave. I said that the patients felt the want of the whisky for the first few days. I don't go the length of calling it a crave. If a man is in the habit of taking six glasses of whisky a day, he naturally feels flabby for want of it, and I sometimes give the injection of strychnia and strophanthus to relieve him, and make him feel more comfortable.

10,502. Would it not be better to give him something in the stomach to make him warm and comfortable?—I think that naturally has a more comforting effect.

10,503. (By the Chairman.) What, roughly, is the percentage of the lunatics who have come under your view whose lunacy you would attribute to drink? Do you think that drunkenness contributes largely to the amount of insanity?—Much more than any other one cause. I went into the subject when I was writing my book, and found it was quite impossible,—at least I thought it was quite impossible—to come any way near a definite percentage, but I should say somewhere between 15 and 20 per cent. of insane persons in Scotland may have their insanity directly traced to alcoholic excess.

10,504. Will that include the number of persons whose alcoholic excesses were due to incipient insanity?—No, but it will include those whose alcoholic excesses are the result of what is called the insane predisposition. You see there is a difference between an incipient attack of insanity and a predisposition to insanity.

10,505. Then, on the subject of heredity in drunkenness, what is your opinion?—That is a most difficult question, because we really know very little about

Dr. G. R.
Wilson.

Wilson.

heredity, and we would need to define it. As to its running in families, if you will allow me to use that phrase, it runs very markedly, as markedly as any other trouble that physicians have to deal with.

10,506. In some families do you find insanity run in one branch, and drunkenness in another?—Yes.

10,506A. Do you think there is any connection between them?—Certainly.

10,507. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Your idea of the drink crave is that it is the want of inhibition?—Yes.

10,508. But you think the great majority may pull up if taken in the early stages?—You have always two factors in drunkenness—environment and the man's own in inclination. In putting a man into an asylum you do away with the environmental factor.

10,509. In your 20 per cent. directly attributable to alcohol, you don't include those cases who are on the verge of insanity, or who are predisposed to insanity?—I do not include those who give evidence of insanity before.

10,510. With regard to the hereditary element, have you ever known of a family of publicans, both father and mother notorious drunkards, and yet no member of the family develop drunken habits?—No.

10,511. If you did know of such a case, that would rather tell against the absolute certainty which many attach to the hereditary idea?—It would tell against the popular view of heredity.

10,512. And you might find, on the other hand, the children of the most pious and virtuous people, who have no temptation to become drunkards, falling victims to drunkenness?—Yes; and that also tells against the popular view, but not, I think, the scientific view.

10,513. Kindly explain what you mean by that?—It is a most difficult technical distinction. When I say of a man that he inherits a tendency to drink, I do not mean his father and mother were necessarily drunkards. I mean that he was born with a particular, unstable kind of brain, which was in his family before him. His father and mother may not have shown it markedly, but some of his relations must have shown some such instability of brain. It may not have taken the form of drunkenness in them, but of epilepsy, insanity, or hysteria. This is a case of drunkenness, not because the man's parents were drunken, but because they had unstable brains.

10,514. Then heredity comes to this—a low-balanced brain in one or both parents?—Yes; you can't get much more out of it than that.

10,515. (By the Chairman.) I want to ask you about opium and ether and chloral drinking?—I have had one or two cases of other habits than the alcoholic habit, but they are comparatively rare in this country. The last patient I had was a morphia patient, by injection. That, I should say, is the commonest of these drug habits in this country.

10,516. Do you think, or is it thought among specialists, that the chloral habit is more difficult to combat than alcohol?—I think it is, on the whole, a more fascinating habit.

10,517. That is rather an important point, from this point of view, that a number of people have said to us, in connection with alcohol, the person is cured of the alcoholic habit, but he goes into environment of temptation, and old comrades want him to drink—it is a social vice. The chloral or morphia habit is a secret vice, and there is no temptation when one goes out to renew the morphia injections. It would seem from that that the old associations do not play so much a part in the relapse as the fascination of the habit?—Quite so; it is the fascination of the habit, but it acts in both ways, because most of those who are morphia maniacs can get morphia in one form or another. The last patient I had to treat was a patient that had to be taken away to practically a desert island, but she had her morphia secreted, and she became so bad that she had to be sent to an asylum.

10,518. Where did she get her quantity?—I don't know.

10,519. How much was she taking?—From fifteen to twenty grains a day.

10,520. How many ordinary mortals would that kill?—It is difficult to say, but if it were divided up amongst twenty I should not be one of the twenty.

10,521. I suppose it would certainly kill any ordinary mortal?—Yes.

10,522. Any two ordinary mortals?—I think you may say pretty certain to kill any four ordinary mortals.

10,523. And she took it without much trouble? Did it make her sleepy?—No; by the time I got her it only soothed her nerves. She was in a state of extreme nervous debility. If she went without morphia she became miserable and uncomfortable, and her skin was tender. Pressing on her limbs, for instance, gave her pain, and she had neuralgia all over. That is what I should call a crave. The morphia acted as a sedative, and removed the pains.

10,524. Did you knock her off at once?—We tapered her off.

10,525. How did you taper her off?—We gave her her own full dose of twenty grains for three days, till she got used to the place. She was a patient who used the needle. I then tried to make her substitute the needle by taking the morphia by the mouth. She rebelled against this, and said she would leave the house if we did not use the needle. We then went on gradually reducing the dose. As a matter of fact, we spread it over six weeks. She was six weeks in the place when she got her last injection. We tapered it down till she was getting water instead of any morphia. In her case also I used the same tonic as I use in the treatment of alcoholic patients,—that is, strychnia and strophanthus, instead of or along with the morphia. She had a sense of strength from that, and she thought she was getting morphia. For the last two days she thought she was getting morphia when she was not getting any. After that she never looked over her shoulder. She was two months in the institution after that, and she went away what we call cured.

10,526. Did she relapse?—She has not relapsed so far as I know, but she was a foreigner.

10,527. Where did she get the morphia?—Her husband was a doctor, and I think she must have stolen it.

10,528. Had she been long at it?—Yes.

10,529. She had never used anything else instead?—No.

10,530. Whisky would have no effect on her?—She took that too. She used considerable quantities of stimulants. She would drink six bottles of beer in a day, if she could get them, but she went off that too as she recovered.

10,530A. Chloral is stated to be a habit that has very much increased of late; have you come across any chloral drinkers?—I have never had a patient under my charge in the institution. I have had three in my comparatively short time for morphia.

10,531. Have you heard or read anything which would appear to give colour to the statement I have made?—No; on the contrary, there are certain things which go to show that chloral is not so much in use as it used to be. We have more hypnotics than we had fifteen or ten years ago. We use other things instead of chloral.

10,532. We heard of antipyrine used as a stimulant, or as a means of intoxication?—I have never had a case of that either. I have had, however, a case of cocaine habit. He was not directly under me, except on an occasion. He was a student, and took to the cocaine shortly after it became popular, and was in the imagination of medical men.

10,533. But it was very dear then—so many shillings a grain—at the time of its introduction?—It was not just at the time of its introduction, but very soon after. I do not know what quantity he used.

10,534. How did he use it?—Hypodermically: he injected it himself.

10,535. What was the effect of it; did it make him

Dr. G. R.
Wilson.

outrageous?—No; dazed and stupid, and presumably very comfortable, but it had considerable physical effects. It reduced his bodily strength very much, and made him weak.

10,536. Is it a fascinating habit?—Very; the effects of cocaine are very fascinating.

10,537. Did you doctor him?—No; he was a patient at Morningside, and he only came under my cognisance in that way.

10,538. Was he a voluntary patient?—Yes.

10,539. Was he knocked off or tapered?—I think he was knocked off completely. Another morphia patient whom we had before that—a lady, who, I think, had indulged for thirty years in morphia—we knocked off within five days.

10,540. I suppose if you had a lunatic with the morphia habit you would not consider her feelings in the way that you would this voluntary patient, who could leave you?—I should not knock it off again absolutely suddenly, after our experience with that woman. I should not, on the other hand, go through the trouble that we had with the other case, that took six weeks.

10,541. Had you bad effects?—Well, we thought we were going to lose the patient for about a couple of days. She seemed to us to be in a precarious state bodily, her heart failed so much.

10,542. Does morphia or opium, or any of these other drugs, give rise to anything like delirium tremens, involving danger to the persons themselves or the people around them?—I have never seen it or heard of it.

10,543. You have never heard of, in any asylum in this country, or in connection with your specialty, of a patient suffering under any mania from opium?—I cannot recollect having heard of any such case.

10,544. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Have you heard of sulphonal or paraldehyde producing these effects?—No, not sulphonal; but I have heard of the paraldehyde habit.

10,545. Is morphinomania quite as curable as dipsomania?—It is quite as curable,—that is to say, you can break the patient more easily of the habit, but whether it is permanent is another question.

10,546. Have you much prospect of cure where morphinomania and dipsomania are combined?—Oh, yes. I think that very many of these morphia patients drink too much alcohol.

10,547. It is to relieve the depression in certain stages of the drug?—Yes. That lady we broke off has been quite cured for three years.

10,548. How did she get the knowledge of hypodermic injection?—The lady whom we tapered off hypodermically had had it prescribed for her medically, and at first she got her nurse to give it to her. Afterwards she administered it to herself. The other lady took it by the mouth. [The witness then withdrew.]

MR. GEORGE NEILSON, Procurator-Fiscal of Glasgow, called in and examined.

Mr. George
Neilson.

10,549. (By the Chairman.) You are procurator-fiscal at the police courts?—Yes.

10,550. You attend the Central Court, and act as procurator-fiscal there?—That is my usual place, although I occasionally attend all the courts.

10,551. At the other courts the police superintendent for the district usually acts as procurator-fiscal?—Yes.

10,552. And in your absence from the Central at the other courts?—The superintendent or a lieutenant acts in my stead.

10,553. What guides you in going to the other places?—Well, it is largely technical. Most cases under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts are prosecutions usually conducted by myself.

10,553A. When there was a stipendiary magistrate in Glasgow, you attached yourself to his court?—Yes.

10,554. I show you this diagram, which represents the number of arrests per thousand to the population in these towns of Scotland, England, and Ireland—apprehensions for breach of the peace, petty assaults, drunk and incapable, and drunk and disorderly. Glasgow is terribly prominent. It is 60 arrests per 1000 for the drunken offenders, as compared with 28 per 1000 in Govan, 20 per 1000 in Leith, 19 per 1000 in Aberdeen, and 21 per 1000 in Paisley. Can you give us any explanation of that?—I do not profess to be at all well versed in the statistics, and I therefore cannot offer any opinion more than that a great number of circumstances fall to be taken into account which vitiate any generalising from the mere figures. I know from my own observations that a great deal depends upon the proportion of policemen to population for one thing.

10,555. What do you mean: that the more police there are the more arrests?—Undoubtedly. I have observed that again and again.

10,556. That is so. Glasgow is the most highly policed place, but the Chief Constable of Govan tells us that Glasgow is not really so highly policed as the figures would show, because certain of the harbour police, I think he said, who are credited to Glasgow really work in a part of Govan, and if they were transferred from the nominal police force of Glasgow to Govan, that would make a considerable difference in the disparity of police force in the one place and the other?—Of course there is no comparison whatever between Govan and Glasgow in this way. I know that a considerable number of disorderly persons from Govan are to be found in Glasgow, compared with very few indeed in Govan from Glasgow. Take Saturday night, for example. Glasgow is the centre of a great population all around, which finds its chief centre of amusement there. Consequently the roll of our drunks and incapables and minor disorders in the police courts on a Monday morning is very largely recruited from the outside.

10,557. But don't you think, in its way, Edinburgh is a place that must form a centre of amusement?—It is the difference between Lanarkshire and the Lothians, which is an enormous difference. You would scarcely believe, unless you saw them, the number of people who come from Coatbridge, Airdrie, and these great mining centres round about.

10,558. And get drunk in Glasgow?—Yes.

10,559. What is your previous experience?—I have had no criminal experience, except in a small way as a private practitioner, until I was appointed fiscal three years ago in Glasgow.

10,560. Do you think the number of apprehensions has any connection with, in Glasgow, the very elaborate special Police Acts and the number of offences that they set up?—I should be inclined to think not.

10,561. In fact it cannot, in the case of these drunks, petty assaults, and drunk and incapables, which are offences all through Scotland?—Yes.

10,562. You acted under the late Stipendiary Gemmel, and you have acted in the Central, and seen a number of bailies administer justice. Was there any marked difference between his sentences and those of the citizen magistrates?—Well, Mr Gemmel was a judge in whom undoubtedly the humane instincts were very strong.

10,563. Well now, take any particular kind of case. How did he deal with drunk and incapables?—He allowed more drunks and incapables, generally, to go with an admonition than is usual at present.

10,564. What did he do in the way of fines and imprisonment for drunk and incapable?—Fines, 5s. and 7s. 6d.—very much the same as at present.

10,565. Taking the fine, is the ratio between the fine and the amount of imprisonment fixed by statute, or does it vary with the will of the magistrate?—It is fixed, or rather, more strictly speaking, it is limited

Dr. G. R.
Wilson.

19 Dec. 1894.

Mr. George
Neilson.

Mr. George
Neilson.

by statute. The Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act of 1881 provides that, 'where a fine does not exceed 10s., the period of imprisonment shall not exceed seven days; exceeds 10s., but does not exceed £1, fourteen days; exceeds £1, but does not exceed £5, one month; exceeds £5, but does not exceed £20, two months; exceeds £20, three months.' The imprisonment, you see, is, 'shall not exceed.'

10,566. Then you say it is not fixed by statute the amount. A man might inflict a penalty of 10s. or seven days, but one man might give 5s. or three days, and another man might give 7s. 6d. or three days, and another man might give 10s. or three days?—Yes, that is so. The period of imprisonment is limited by the Act, not fixed.

10,567. It is in the option of the magistrate, within this limit to heighten or lower the money fines, and to extend or diminish the imprisonment?—Yes.

10,568. It is customary, therefore, to have certain fixed fines and equivalent periods of imprisonment. You have, for instance, 5s. or three days?—Yes.

10,569. Which is common?—That is not by any means. I often notice a certain symmetry is observed. You have 5s. or five days, and 7s. 6d. or seven days.

10,570. But a man may reverse that?—Yes.

10,571. In prosecuting, do you bring forward or do you keep back previous convictions until after the man has been found guilty?—There is a general practice, I believe, especially in certain police courts.

10,572. You are not speaking of Glasgow?—I am speaking generally of a thing that is prevalent in Glasgow as well as elsewhere. There is a kind of general idea that where a person has been tried for being drunk, or drunk and incapable, or for having committed an assault, that the magistrate is entitled to ask, 'Has this man been here before?'—that is, after the prisoner has been found guilty. The law is extremely careful in dealing with the legal position of a prisoner in that case, that you can only aver a previous conviction after he has been convicted; and in certain types of cases, as in cases of assault, you can libel a previous conviction, but you cannot state the fact that the man has been previously convicted if you have not averred it on the face of the charge. Now that undoubtedly, as it stands just now, involves a great difficulty if the magistrate is not to be allowed to ask what previous convictions, or if there are any previous convictions, against a man. It compels the magistrate to give judgment upon an A.B. case. In the case of, for instance, drunk and incapable I have, after full consideration of this question, come to this opinion, that, as the law and as my duty, I, as procurator-fiscal, have no right to state, in prosecuting a case, anything which I would not be entitled to put a witness into the box to prove. In other words, take the case of assault where a previous conviction is not libelled. I have assumed that I have proved to the satisfaction of the magistrate that the assault was committed. The magistrate turns round and asks me, 'Has this man been previously convicted of assault?' or, 'Has he been convicted of any other offence?' My position with regard to that is this, I am not legally entitled to put a policeman, or any other person, into the box to prove that this man has been convicted either of assault or of having been drunk and incapable, and I cannot think that it is my duty or my right to make unsworn, on my own responsibility, a statement that he has been previously convicted. And for that reason I have systematically—and I believe I have the general concurrence of the assessors in the police court—discouraged, as far possible, inquiry not into character but into the question of previous convictions, except in cases in which character is a part of the case. The exception to which I refer specially is the case of prostitution, where you allege on the face of it—and you need to allege on the face of it—that the person is a prostitute; and I consider then that I am entitled to say, 'This person is a prostitute, because she has been convicted here on that charge.' I have frequently put a witness into the box to prove, not only that the person was a prostitute, but, as the best possible evidence that could be led, that she was a prostitute who had been convicted.

10,573. Do you give notice of previous convictions in the case of prostitution?—No.

10,574. We shall take the ordinary case of assault. In Edinburgh, the Chief Constable tells us that previous convictions were stated in proof—that is, before the verdict of guilty or not guilty had been given. As I understand, under Lord Kingsburgh's Act—on which I presume you base—the principle laid down is that previous convictions shall not be brought forward, at all events in certain cases, until it has been found whether a man is guilty or not. If he is brought guilty, these previous convictions are brought forward to enable the judge to determine his sentence. The object of withholding them beforehand is to prevent prejudice being raised by the proving of previous convictions, as bearing upon the simple matter of fact which the jury are appointed to try. As I understand, you keep back previous convictions, not only in proof, but after a man has been proved guilty. We were told that in Edinburgh the practice was to bring them forward in proof, before the verdict has been found. How can you explain to us that discrepancy?—Both things are quite conceivable, because I have personally to do both things in different cases. I might have brought you a case. There is a distinction in law laid down by the High Court in regard to these cases, but in an ordinary police case—take the case of a theft, or take the case of assault—where a charge bears that a person has committed such and such an offence, and this person has been previously convicted, forming a schedule annexed. There is a schedule containing the conviction for assault or theft, being offences of the same type as that which is charged in this case. It would be in the very teeth of the 1887 act to prove that offence, until the magistrate had found the charge proven.

10,575. Would you read us the clause in the 1887 Act which is supposed to guide this?—It is governed by section 67 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, where, providing for the case of trial before a jury, it, by other clauses, is ceteris paribus to apply to cases in the police court, the previous convictions against the person accused shall not be laid before the jury, nor shall reference be made thereto in presence of the jury, before the verdict is returned.

10,576. In cases where there is no jury, the judge is the jury, and the judge finds as to matters of fact as well as of law?—That is one thing, but there is a clause that follows, and this is the clause on which every practice is founded—'Nothing herein contained shall prevent the Public Prosecutor from laying before the jury evidence of such previous convictions, where, by the existing law, it is competent to lead evidence of such previous convictions as evidence in causa, in support of the substantive charge.' The meaning of that, as interpreted, is that, for instance in shebeening, you require to say, in stating a charge, that so and so has supplied liquor without a licence, and this is the second offence. The reason is that you require to set forth what the penalty is, and the penalty is determined by the question of whether or not it is the first or second or third offence. And where you have to put on the face of the charge that it is the second offence, it has been ruled by the court that it is necessary to prove, before closing the evidence for the prosecution, the two previous convictions, or the one previous conviction.

10,577. Therefore we may take it that in Glasgow, where there are no cumulative penalties, under that clause you would hold yourself precluded from mentioning previous convictions for drunkenness or any analogous offence in connection with the charge of drunk and incapable; but if you were acting in a burgh, under the Burgh Police Act, which provides a special penalty for repeated offences of drunkenness under a separate clause, you would consider yourself obliged to state convictions?—I confess my mind is not refreshed on the terms of the clause.

Mr. George Neilson.

19 Dec. 1894.

10,578. The terms of the clause are that, for three convictions of drunkenness in a given time, a man may be sentenced to 14 days, with the option of a fine, in addition to the other penalties. If you claimed that penalty you would have, under your own interpretation, to put down the previous convictions?—It is very awkward to give an opinion without having the clause before me. The cases in Glasgow that we have, in which previous convictions are proved, are mainly shebeening cases and breach of the Licensing Act. We have it also in smoke complaints.

10,579. Well, we shall go to the case of Edinburgh, where the Chief Constable told us the practice was to lead evidence as to previous conviction in proof of this very case?—I would naturally be diffident about giving an opinion upon the Edinburgh practice.

10,580. I do not wish your opinion as against his opinion. We all understand that legal interpretations differ very vastly, but I presume that from your reading of the Act one might put it in law phraseology that it was not competent to lead evidence as to previous convictions, except in cases where previous convictions are considered as part of the case?—Quite so. That is the exact statement.

10,581. And it leaves you to determine if that is part of the case, and really affords very little guidance? It gives you no peremptory order, but I should like if you could put in that decision of the Court of Session to which you referred?—I shall refer you to it. It is the Dundee case.

10,582. You are aware that the practice differs most widely throughout Scotland?—It does, I believe.

10,583. That the interpretation of that clause, as applicable to police offences, varies in almost every town?—I believe so.

10,584. Now take the case of Glasgow, where we are told about its not being the practice here to lead proof of previous convictions before the verdict has been pronounced?—That is the general practice.

10,585. Last night we visited the Northern Police Office, and the superintendent, or the lieutenant on duty, showed us police records which he said would enable him to state how often anyone had been previously convicted, and I think from what he said I gained the impression that these previous convictions were utilised in the prosecution. Is the system, as based upon your interpretation, uniform in all the police courts of Glasgow?—It is so.

10,586. I suppose you direct?—I am in frequent intercourse also with the superintendents.

10,587. You are not merely head, but you have control?—That is so.

10,588. You say that the system you have described to us is uniformly exercised over Glasgow?—Yes. I should perhaps qualify that by saying that the magistrates put us all into an awkward box by asking the question, which I consider they have no right to ask sometimes, 'Has this man been previously convicted?'

10,589. Well, we take you to say that the most frequent case in which you make an exception to that general rule is the case of prostitutes, where you libel previous convictions?—Well, I do not libel them.

10,590. But you prove them without libel?—Scarcely that even. I have done it, but not as a rule. Not actual proof of a conviction, but the fact of there having been a conviction.

10,591. I have a verbatim report of a prostitute case here, and I shall just read it to you—'Barbara. H. was charged with importuning passengers in the street. (Barbara.) Not guilty. (Policeman.) Last night at 20 after 12 the prisoner came along the south side of Argyle Street: between Jamaica Street and Polytechnic she accosted four separate men. I have known her for the last two or three years as a prostitute. The last time she was admonished. (Second Constable.) I know the prisoner to be a prostitute. She accosted four men last night between Jamaica Street and Polytechnic. Was convicted here before. (Magistrate.) Any witnesses for 'the defence?—None. (Barbara.) I was the worse of drink at the time. (Magistrate.) When was she here last? (Officer.) In February, when she was admonished. (Magistrate.) 15s. or 14 days.' Now you call that proving a previous conviction?—The point on which that turns is the technical one of what proving a conviction is. The proving of a conviction, strictly speaking, consists in putting an officer into the box with an extract of the conviction, or with the court-book before him, who swears that such and such a person has been convicted. But that particular case, like the case against a prostitute, is under section 18 of the 1892 Act, directed against every prostitute, or street walker, who loiters about and importunes. It is necessary to prove that she is a prostitute, and that is usually done by the evidence of two policemen; and I consider that no better evidence can be led to the fact that a person is a prostitute than that she has been convicted.

10,592. You treat her exceptionally?—No. It is more a question of character, and the question I usually ask a witness is as to what means he has of knowing that she is a prostitute, and the answer which is given, and is expected, if I know that it is the case of a person who has been convicted, is 'because I saw her convicted.'

10,593. That is not proving convictions, but character?—Precisely.

10,594. There is another thing about loitering. I understand they are not taken up for loitering—simply for importuning?—There used to be an old idea, in the more strict interpretation of statutes, that the word 'or' was tantamount in many cases to 'and,' and the charge now in all cases is 'loitering about and importuning passengers.'

10,595. There is another matter in the treatment of that class of prisoners that seems, at first at all events, exceptional—namely, the proving of the importuning is done by policemen, who have not, in many cases, heard the words used, and there is never any evidence brought by the man who is importuned, who has the right to complain?—There is great latitude—rather, I should say, great divergence—of opinion amongst the different magistrates with regard to the interpretation of that clause. Mr. Gemmel himself was strict, in fact, I should say very strict in his interpretation.

10,596. How?—In that he insisted upon the proving of something more than the mere fact that the person known to be a prostitute loitered about the streets, and was seen to speak to persons. If, for instance, the evidence led showed that the prostitute laid hand upon a man, or went out of her way in order to speak to one or two passengers, or took passengers up an entry; or if the actual words were heard, as sometimes happened, although I should say that of all the prostitutes I have seen convicted, in not half-a-dozen cases have the actual words been proved. But sometimes that has been done. Mr Gemmel insisted upon something more than the mere fact of their being seen to speak to a strange man. Some of the citizen magistrates in Glasgow do the same. Some others are content with rather less evidence, and obviously, from the legal bearing of it, it seems to be a question which lies entirely in the mind of the magistrates whether the proving of loitering about and importuning for the purpose of prostitution is enough or not. Another question which bears upon that, was that Mr. Gemmel would rarely convict for loitering about during the daytime, and I have seen in the same way that most of the citizen magistrates now apply a very much sterner canon of construction to the evidence of a case where it is loitering during the day, than loitering during the night.

10,597. What penalties did Mr Gemmel usually inflict, and what do the citizen magistrates?—Well, the new Police Act enlarged the penalty from 14 to 30 days.

10,598. What was it in Mr Gemmel's time?—The limit was 14 days, until the last year of his life.

10,599. But the last year will do when he had the same powers as the magistrates?—I do not think he imposed so frequently the heavier penalties as are imposed by the citizen magistrates.

10,600. What were his usual penalties, 10s. or 15s.?—I do not think he often went beyond £1.

10,601. With how many days?—I do not think that he ordinarily went beyond 14 days, but at this distance I cannot say exactly.

10,602. But did he often go up to 14 days?—Often not, I should say. Mr. Gemmel was anxious to give these girls a chance.

10,603. Where did he sit?—In the Central.

10,604. He was anxious to give them a chance, and he treated them leniently? Did he send off many with admonitions?—Yes.

10,605. How was the city of Glasgow as to prostitution, I mean the parade of prostitution in the streets, which, I suppose, is what the police have to concern themselves with,—was the offensive and demoralising parading of prostitution in the streets worse in Mr. Gemmel's time than with the severer penalties which are now being enforced?—I believe that the streets of Glasgow have been relatively fairly clear, and, from my own observation, I could not give you an answer to that question. I have no reason to believe that there has been any material difference.

10,606. Then, as the result of your experience, do you think that these long sentences are useful or necessary?—I have not been able to satisfy myself that sentences of any kind are doing very much good.

10,607. Have you been in Edinburgh much?—Yes.

10,608. What do you think of the streets of Edinburgh as compared with Glasgow?—Well, I should say there are far more prostitutes to be seen in Princes Street than in Glasgow.

10,609. (By Dr. Sutherland.) That is of the showy kind?—Yes, but that is a very general impression.

10,610. (By the Chairman.) Do you think the risk of a decent man being accosted, or of a lady being insulted, walking along one of the Edinburgh streets is greater than would be the risk in Glasgow?—Broadly speaking, I do not think the risk is very great in either town.

10,611. But I ask you in which it is greater?—I could not answer.

10,612. There are some magistrates, however, who never give more than 5s. or 24 hours, and dismiss a great number of the cases?—I know.

10,613. But probably you don't think, at all events, that the long sentences have any practical effect beyond the physical removal of the women from the scene of their action?—I cannot say that. I have observed no marked difference.

10,614. You talk about shebeening cases. Have you many in Glasgow?—We have a great many in the Central district of Glasgow.

10,615. I suppose it falls upon you to issue warrants for the search of these shebeens as Procurator-Fiscal?—That is a function which is very rarely required.

10,616. Well, the Police Superintendent of Greenock told us that he signed 150 warrants a week, that they lapsed in a week, but that they enabled his men to visit 150 shebeens?—Our system is quite different here. The police, generally speaking, have no difficulty in being admitted into shebeens. The shebeener, as a rule, when the police go to the door—the shebeener undoubtedly could refuse to admit him, but, as a rule, he does not do so. The constables go in, they get a statement from the man, and, of course, they see what is there. The only difference between their being there with a warrant is, that they cannot open shut and lockfast places.

10,617. But is there any exceptional power, under the Glasgow Police Act, for constables to enter shebeens?—I am not quite sure that there is any exceptional power.

10,618. They can go in, but they cannot open lockfast places?—That, however, is by permission; and that is how our system is conducted in 90 cases out of 100.

10,619. You say that they allow your men to go in?—Yes.

10,620. That surely indicates a great amount of softness, if they know that there is anything illegal going on?—But it isn't illegal for a constable to enter any house. A constable may enter my house, if I choose to let him in.

10,621. But if you happen to be engaged in an illicit occupation like a shebeener you, as a lawyer, would not let the constable in?—No.

10,622. What I wanted to know is how it was that the shebeeners were so ignorant of the law as not to know their rights in the matter. Have you many convictions of shebeeners on the evidence obtained by the voluntary admission of customers?—In the great mass of cases, the evidence in shebeening cases consists firstly in the evidence of one or more of the persons concerned. Usually speaking, we get two of the persons who are drinking. They are persuaded to come and give evidence. Sometimes, of course, they are tried for being found in shebeens, being drunk and drinking, and afterwards, when the charge is brought against the keeper of the house, these persons come forward and tell that they went up to the house at such and such a time, and bought liquor from such and such a person; and they are very frequently in the house at the time the police go up.

10,623. Are these unfortunate men first sentenced to a fine or imprisonment, and then made turn witnesses?—Very frequently.

10,624. Do they expect any release?—That is the other side. But the fact that a man is to give evidence for me in a shebeening case is no reason why I should ask the magistrate to let him off. I do not think it is sound morals to do so.

10,625. Do you know how many shebeens are considered to exist?—No. I am not well versed in the statistical side of the question.

10,626. Here is the clause of the Burghs Police Act dealing with habitual drunkards. Look at it and say, if you were in a burgh, whether you would not consider it necessary to prove previous convictions, under your own interpretation of it?—I do not hesitate to say that in dealing with a previous conviction, under section 382 of the Burghs Police Act, if I were interpreting it in Glasgow, I should certainly not prove previous conviction until after conviction on the specific charge.

10,626A. But you would prove it then?—Yes.

10,627. Then you have three modes of dealing—(1) not proving the previous conviction till after conviction on the specific charge; (2) not proving convictions at all; and (3) proving convictions before the conviction on the specific charge?—Yes.

10,628. And there is a considerable variety of practice in all these details among the different towns?—I believe so; but these things only come before me when they are reported in the High Court proceedings.

10,629. In the Sheriff Court do you know if the same interpretation is placed upon that clause of Lord Kingsburgh's Act?—I understand that in the Sheriff court the same interpretation is given. For instance, if they have cases of previous conviction, they are only proved after the conviction on the specific charge.

10,630. On breaches of the peace and assaults in the county, in Lanarkshire I mean?—It depends. Some of them are brought before the justices, and the serious cases go before the sheriffs.

10,631. The petty ones go before the justices?—Yes.

10,632. Sitting in Glasgow?—They sit in different parts. The Lanarkshire cases are brought into Glasgow as the general centre.

10,633. For instance, in Perth, the Perthshire petty offences were brought before the sheriff-substitutes, whereas the Perth city cases were disposed of before the police magistrates of the burgh?—I do not think that is the method here, but I am not familiar with the practice.

10,634. The stipendiary magistrate in Glasgow must have known the habitual criminals better than the citizen magistrates?—It is the one great advantage in having a stipendiary magistrate.

10,635. But if you found yourself debarred from proving previous convictions, if the stipendiary knows the people, is not that driving a coach and four through the law?—Under the same principle the assessors, more or less, know the offenders.

10,636. But the assessors secretly impart their knowledge to the men on the bench?—I suppose they do, although it is not for me to say.

10,637. In connection with dealing with the habitual criminal is there any way which suggests itself to you as a method by which their number might be lessened, and a proportion of them, at all events, reformed?—I am afraid, although I have thought a good deal about the subject, I cannot say that I have been able to commit myself to any form of treatment.

10,638. We shall take another specific case—that is, the case of juvenile offences. Have you much to do with that?—We have a good many cases.

10,639. How are they generally dealt with?—First offences almost invariably are dismissed with an admonition.

10,640. And for the second?—Mr Gemmel used in certain cases occasionally to order the whip, but there has been no case of whipping since. The citizen magistrates have got an objection, apparently on principle, to whipping at all, and there certainly has been no case of whipping in the Central Police Court since.

10,641. Would you give your own opinion? Are you in favour of Mr Gemmel's or the citizen magistrates' practice?—I am not very clear on the subject. There are many cases in which one felt that it was no use sending a boy to prison, and that a whipping was really the best thing for him. But, on the other hand, the subject of whipping is surrounded with so many peculiarities, that one hesitates to say distinctly what one's preference would be.

10,642. In connection with the whip, you would not made any recommendation as to any extension of the Act by which whipping might be given as an alternative?—I do not think so.

10,643. How would you treat girls?—Girls, of course, have never been whipped.

10,644. The girls are not whipped, and it is still more undesirable to send them to prison if you can help it, than when it is boys?—Of course boys are frequently brought up for offences against public order—that is to say, in the way of throwing stones at constables, and little things of that kind, where the element of mischief enters into it. Girls do not come before us in that connection.

10,645. We saw two young girls in the Glasgow Prison, one of whom was in for the third time. They were then in for a charge of malicious mischief, which consisted of what might have been libelled as wilful fire-raising. They set fire to a show, and caused some damage. One of the girls had been twice in prison that year before. She had been in, I think she said, for disorderly conduct, running about and larking wild on the street. She was about fifteen or sixteen years of age. What about that?—Well, I am happy to say that is very exceptional for girls.

10,646. Here we had a case of two girls, one of whom, as I said, had been in twice before, as it was described to us, for being boisterous, and no doubt a nuisance in the streets, but not for any immoral conduct.—My experience is that conduct of that kind on the part of girls is decidedly exceptional.

10,647. Now we came across a boy. I forget what he was sent to prison for. He had been in, I think, two or three times before, once for kicking a football, which had landed against some woman, and dirtied her. Are there many of these football cases sent to prison?—Very seldom sent to prison, because the fine imposed is usually a very nominal one.

10,648. What do you call nominal?—Well, I have seen a fine of 1s., or of 2s. 6d. It is seldom that more than 2s. 6d. is imposed upon lads for playing football. Indeed, as a rule, the magistrates are not willing to convict, unless there is a very decided case of persistency and obstruction, and nuisance to the public.

10,649. Do not you think if a boy or girl of that class gets into prison it is very apt to do away with all the terrors that had existed in their minds as to the mystery of punishment in prison, and make them reckless in going back?—I am afraid that nothing that I have seen leads me to attach any great hope of the effect of imprisonment.

10,650. Do not you think that such a petty thing as kicking a football, or riotous conduct, could be dealt with by a boy or girl being relegated to the parents, and the parents being told that if they gave them a parental chastisement no further punishment would be inflicted?—That is done, I suspect, in the greater number of cases, and, personally, I fully share the opinion which you have indicated. Still there are cases of bad boys.

10,651. Now I want to have your own opinion on the subject of the policy of pledges. There, again, the practice varies very greatly throughout Scotland. We will take the case of a drunk and incapable, or a petty assault, or any case of that kind. He is let out on a pledge of, say 7s. 6d. He gives what name he likes, and if he is unknown to the police that name is accepted, and he makes off, and is never heard of, and there is no more trouble taken about him, unless he turns up. Payment of the pledge is in fact held by the police as having purged the offence. In Edinburgh we were told that if a man was let off on pledge it was regarded as bail for his appearance, and if he did not appear the bail was forfeited, and he was cited to appear afterwards, and that the forfeiture of the pledge was regarded as a punishment for non-appearance, and not as purging the offence?—I think that your statement entirely mis-states the actual character of the pledge in Glasgow. If a man gives 7s. 6d. in Glasgow, it is the pledge that he will appear the next morning for trial, and he is called next morning, and if he is not there the pledge is there, and then forfeited, so that if there is any difference in the practice in Edinburgh it is only a difference in procedure. The fact is the same—the pledge is not to purge the offence.

10,652. But the pledge is forfeited in consequence of his non-appearance, and not as a fine for his offence. The offence remains, and what goes on in Edinburgh is, they proceed to cite to bring the man up, and then they fine him for his offence, not counting the forfeiture as any expiation, but here you take no further trouble in the matter?—In the majority of cases we do not. Sometimes, although the pledge is forfeited, a warrant is granted for the apprehension of the man.

10,653. Can you tell us how many cases in Glasgow last year were brought up thus?—Scarcely any. I could not distinctly say.

10,654. Would there be ten?—I do not think there would be.

10,655. Then we may practically leave that out of the question, so that I think my statement of the difference between the two is practically accurate?—Except in its terms. The pledge is not taken by the police except as a pledge for the man's appearance, and it is forfeited by the magistrate for non-appearance.

10,656. And then the matter is allowed to drop, whereas it is only the first stage of the proceedings of the public prosecutor in Edinburgh?—Yes.

10,657. Now, this system is a very old system in Glasgow and all over Scotland, and I see you are in no way responsible for it, but you have shown yourself to be a man of subtle legal mind. What is your idea as to the strict legality of these diverse practices, or the policy of the diverse practices in all such instances as I have mentioned?—Well, the simplicity of working is very strongly on the side of Glasgow.

10,658. I suppose that is the chief practical recommendation?—That is quite evident. As regards the ethical view of the case, there is perhaps a great deal to be said against it. On the other hand, these pledges are modified according to the offence. For a bad assault a man will lodge a pledge of even £5. The thing is graded, so that an attempt is made to have the pledge something approximately representing the fine which the magistrate would have imposed if he had tried the case.

Mr. George Neilson.

19 Dec. 1894.

Mr. George Neilson.

10,659. In fact, they make it a little higher generally?—Yes.

10,660. But that makes the police lieutenant who receives the charge the judge as to the proper penalty on the assumption of guilt, whereas, in the other case, it leaves the whole business to the magistrate after hearing evidence?—Yes.

10,661. We have been told that it has this advantage, that it enables a number of people to escape the degradation of appearing before the police magistrate, but it has the theoretical disadvantage of dealing differently with the rich, who pay 7s. 6d., and the poor, who don't?—It does decidedly make a difference.

10,662. Do you let out, for instance, a Saturday drunk? Do you exact the same pledge as in the case of another fellow?—I think the Saturday night pledge is similar. In some cases they pledge down as low as 2s. 6d. and 5s.

10,663. In what office do they do that?—I have seen exceptional cases in the Central of 2s. 6d., but they are exceptional; 5s. and 7s. 6d. are the normal pledges.

10,664. I suppose it would greatly increase the trouble of the police to get up a case?—No doubt.

10,665. Would you give us the number of people let out on pledges in Glasgow?—11,612.

10,666. Pledges and bail bonds forfeited; there are very few bail bonds?—Very few.

10,667. I suppose 100 would cover them, and the rest be pledges?—Yes.

10,668. There is a pretty considerable revenue made out of pledges?—A large revenue.

10,669. What would you consider the equity of this? This revenue out of the pledges may be regarded as an inducement to pick up pledgable looking people? It has been represented to us as being a temptation to the town, as being a means of revenue?—It is infinitesimal, I think.

10,670. Suppose we were to recommend the establishment of adult reformatories, which have been proposed to us, for the treatment of these habitual criminals, would it not be a very equitable thing to recommend that support should be drawn from the pledge fund to which they have contributed probably very largely in their career?—Well, there are a great many conditions attaching to the answer to that question.

10,671. But you don't think the magistrates would like to part with the pledge fund?—These are financial considerations with which I have nothing to do; but there is the element that the pledges are given as a contribution at present for the maintenance, directly or indirectly, of the police force.

10,672. You think any encroachment upon the money received from pledges would be viewed with extreme jealousy by those who have to apply the funds at the present moment?—I have no authority to speak on their behalf, but I expect that would be narrowly looked into.

10,673. But, from the outside point of view, do you think the public would not regard the appropriation of specific funds of that sort with more equanimity than the levying of a rate for the special purpose of carrying out of any reformatory institution?—Personally speaking, it is to me a question that is now presenting itself for the first time. I do feel, however, that the proceeds of the police courts in Glasgow would fitly enough be applied in part to any institution which was for the treatment of the offenders in Glasgow.

10,674. There is another point about these pledges. They vary greatly in different places. I think it was in Dundee since the adoption of the clause regarding drunks in this Burghs Police Act which gave them additional powers. They have raised the pledge to 10s., so that the pledge, being drunk and incapable, is 10s. now. Here it is 7s. 6d. I think it is 10s. in Aberdeen. The average pledge in Aberdeen was higher than here. It was 10s., and in some places it was as low as 5s. That is more or less an equitable thing, but I suppose not more than the sentences resulting from the different views taken by different magistrates?—No. I suppose you are aware that the pledges are one of the surest signs of the condition of trade in a place like Glasgow. In good seasons there are far more pledges than in bad seasons, because there is more money. On the other hand, the thing works out so that there are in good seasons fewer people relatively going to prison, because more fines are paid.

10,675. On the other hand, the apprehensions are enormous?—Yes, the apprehensions are more, because there is more money to spend on drink.

10,676. The instructions to the police, we understand, are given by the Chief Constable, with little or no suggestion on the part of the magistrates in the different localities?—I understand the magistrates have nothing directly to do with the instructions to the police. The police instruction book is issued by the Chief Constable, and it is part of the discipline of the police for each superintendent to have constant and habitual meetings with the officers under him, at which the instructions are reiterated and amplified verbally.

10,677. This we find from different instructions in certain cases. Take the case of Govan. The Chief Constable told us that he had given very different instructions in regard to certain cases from what prevailed in the time of his predecessor, and that had a marked effect in reducing the number of apprehensions. The practice varies all over Scotland. Do you think that anything could be done by entrusting to the Inspector of Constabulary say, some general supervision of the instructions, so that you might pick up what was considered good, or wrought well in one district, and recommend its application in other districts?—I should think probably a good deal of good might be done in that way. In Glasgow there is a printed book of instructions very carefully prepared, containing practically a synopsis of the Police Act, and giving general instructions for the methods of the police in special cases, very carefully prepared, and a very serviceable book; but, although that might do for Glasgow, the conditions are different. We are dealing with special statutes and regulations, which are quite different from what they would be over Scotland generally.

10,678. Every Chief Constable appears to have a book. I do not know whether every member of the force has it. Ought not all instructions to embody the law on different points?—Well, I should certainly say that a general revision by some competent superior would be of great advantage.

10,679. For instance, as to the method of dealing with such petty offences as arise out of drunkenness?—Yes, it would tend, I should think, to reduce that evil of which you speak, namely, the great disparity in treatment.

10,680. Do you see any way of meeting the disparity of treatment which exists previous to trial. For instance, in one case you have every prisoner who pleads not guilty remanded for a day, thus breaking into the second day for his trial?—We have not that in Glasgow. Every man who pleads guilty is not remanded in Glasgow.

10,680A. No, but it does exist in some places, some are remanded for two days. There is no disparity in many towns. A prisoner remanded is sent to a comparatively comfortable prison. In Glasgow you remand them for 48 hours to the police cell?—Yes.

10,681. Well, that is a very great difference in punishment to a man who ultimately gets a very small sentence or a fine?—That is so, although perhaps no greater than the difference of prisons.

10,682. The difference of prisons? What do you mean?—That is to say, a man in the Glasgow police

Mr. George Neilson.

19 Dec. 1894.

Mr. George
Neilson.

19 Dec. 1894.

cells may be a great deal better; it may be even by the difference of the cell in which he is kept.

10,683. But the prisons are all under one uniform authority, and you have a minimum standard of comfort in the prisons which you lack in the cells. There is a uniformity of treatment of untried prisoners in prisons which is lacking in police cells. Do you think there could be nothing done to assimilate the treatment of untried prisoners?—In Glasgow, of course, we have rather exceptional conditions. It materially adds to the difficulty and the risks of the administration of justice if prisoners have to be conveyed to and from the prison. There have been a number of cases of men escaping during the passage to the prison, and every passage of that kind adds to the risk of escape. On the score of convenience it is certainly preferable that the man should be in the cells.

10,684. On the other hand, the untried prisoner in the cell has got to lie on a plank bed, and he has got no cover?—That is a thing that would be capable of easy amendment by the altered conditions of the police office.

10,685. Do you think it would be well to have one authority who would try and make the conditions of the untried prisoner, who presumably is not guilty, similarly bearable, as is done in the case of the prisoners by the Prison Commissioners?—I am not aware of any special reason for interfering, but certainly the question seems to be one for inquiry.

10,686. You want to keep the man safe and well?—Yes.

10,687. I do not know whether you ever have a second or a third prisoner put in the cell with a remanded prisoner?—I do not think it is usual with remanded prisoners, but we have had sometimes on a crowded night more than one prisoner in a cell overnight.

10,688. And you have had fatal accidents?—Not in my time, but there have been accidents which have resulted from that.

10,689. But, independent of accidents, it is a very horrible and undesirable thing for a man to be locked up from the Saturday night till the Monday morning with a ruffian or disorderly companion?—That is so.

10,690. You have nothing to say as to any suggestion as to the reformation of this matter?—No.

10,691. Do you believe in progressively accumulative penalties?—I have not seen any sufficient return from them to lead me to that view. One point that strikes one having so many cases as come necessarily under my eye, is the extraordinary absence of the slightest feeling of shame in a man about being drunk. You get 1000 cases of men who are charged with being drunk, and I do not think there is above 2 per cent. that ever dream of pleading not guilty.

10,692. But, don't the most of the shamefaced lot get off on pledge?—Well, I suspect there is something in that. Possibly they do, but I deal only with those who are before us. A great many of the pledged ones come back in the hope of getting the 7s. 6d. reduced to 5s. It is a clear sign of that absence of shame of which I speak.

10,693. But there are still a considerable percentage of the newer offenders who will offer anything on their persons in pledge?—Yes; but men charged with assault, with riot, or using abusive language, will at once say that they were drunk; but they draw the line at having been riotous, or having used abusive language, or having committed an assault. To say they were drunk seems to them to be no shame whatever.

10,694. About the abusive language. Is the language on which a person would be arrested desperately bad? I suppose it is chiefly women who are taken up for that?—Both men and women. The practice in the Central Court—I am not minutely acquainted with the other courts—is this: before I ask the court to commit, I make a point of its being a case in which a person has been practically abusive without provocation, where the language is gross in its character, where the language has been shouted out so that it could be heard a considerable distance off, and where it was, as I have said, gross.

10,695. These are not cases where a person arrested has used obscene and abusive language to the policeman?—In all these cases my whole influence has been against obtaining a conviction.

10,696. But are you not autocratic in that matter?—But the facts do not come fully out until the examination of the witness.

10,697. Does the charge not specify that?—The words of the Act are 'Used abusive language.'

10,698. And cannot you at the last moment withdraw the charge?—Yes. At the same time, when laying the case before the magistrate, whilst I frequently withdraw charges, there are many cases in which possibly the magistrate might be of a different opinion from myself, and it savours of a want of respect to the Bench to take up a high hand in dealing with these things.

10,699. Is not the Advocate-Depute who prosecutes before the Court of Justiciary entitled to withdraw or modify his charge at any stage of the proceedings?—Quite so; and I do that at all stages; but there are many cases which are so near the boundary line that I think it better to leave it to the discretion of the magistrate.

10,700. You will have two women fighting, and they will use abusive language. You might libel them either for abusive language or assault?—For being 'riotous and disorderly' is the usual form. There are practically never convictions for merely using opprobrious epithets in such cases.

10,701. Are the cases that are arrested and libelled as abusive not drunk people who shouted abusive language in the streets?—Yes.

10,702. Or will the complaint be entertained by a policeman, or some person that So-and-so shouted such-and-such an expression?—Sometimes it is a case where a private complainer comes—where there has been some standing feud, and one woman follows another and overwhelms her with epithets of abuse. That is one kind that sometimes happens.

10,703. But you think that is dealt with mildly?—I have great faith in the administration of the Police Act generally by the citizen magistrates.

10,704. You think it comes up to the stipendiary?—Well, I would not say that. You get from continuity of one man the steadiness of one mind applied to the same type of cases occurring again and again, and you get a man above all who knows the prisoners by head-mark, so that you get a regular system of punishment which, at least, is a better attempt towards a system than you can get from the accidental magistrate who is here to-day and away to-morrow.

10,705. As to procedure in case of our attempting to deal with habitual offenders by sending them to a reformatory. This procedure has been suggested: after a certain number of convictions within a time, or a certain number within a longer time, that the police—and I suppose you are the official who would have to deal with such cases—might remand the case to the sheriff as guilty, we will say, of riotousness or drunkenness and disorderliness, and being a habitual offender. The habitual nature of the offence would require to be proved by the sheriff, and if the sheriff held him to be a habitual offender, he might inflict the statutory penalty for the offence, which would require to be altered to any extent he chooses, and, after imprisonment for the offence, order the prisoner to be removed to a sort of adult reformatory, and detained for a certain time. Would that mechanism to your mind be practicable?—Yes, and indeed it would be much preferable to a magistrate being expected to deal off-hand with the matter.

10,706. You could not entrust the magistrate with such powers?—I should say the sheriff was the obvious man.

10,707. I mean the machinery would work well enough?—Yes; the machinery would work in this way:—Suppose a man is brought up for being drunk, and suppose he is convicted, the magistrate, instead of

Mr. George
Neilson.

19 Dec. 1894.

Mr. George
Neilson.

passing sentence on him, would remit him. I would suggest that there should be provision made for the averment to be on the charge that the man had been, say, six times committed during a certain period, perhaps three months, and in that case the magistrate, after trying him and finding him guilty of being drunk on this particular occasion, might remit him to be dealt with on what would be another charge. And I understand you to mean that there would still be a necessity on the sheriff's part to inquire into the case.

10,708. So that the man who was accidentally drunk would not be sent off. We have been told of the good working man, the model father of a family, the zealous church attender, who gets drunk every Saturday night, who might by accident fall into the hands of the police!—That would safeguard that.

10,709. So that there would be no fear of any elder or other individual having an injury done to him? You talk of the magistrate trying the man: could the magistrate find him guilty of the particular charge and order him to be dealt with on the sheriff's discretion as a habitual offender without sentencing him for the offence?—Oh yes. We have very much the same procedure already. A man may be tried for assault, which may, before the case is finished, be turned into a charge of murder. The trial is then at once stopped, even although the man was on the verge of being sentenced; in fact if he has been sentenced, he can be sent off to be tried for what is virtually the same act—that is a charge which was an assault, but is now a murder. But in this case you are trying a man for being drunk to-day, but you remit him to the sheriff to be dealt with for being a habitual drunkard. In other words, it seems to me to fit in with the general analogy of a man being dealt with as insane.

10,710. I perhaps did not explain. It would not do to let off the habitual offender, brought up on a charge of assault—it would not do to let him off the punishment for the assault and send him directly to a reformatory where we wish to disassociate the criminal element as far as possible from the element of punishment, and substitute reform as in the case of a reformatory?—No.

10,711. And in order to do that, it would be necessary to preserve the power of punishing for the individual act; and the punishment would require to be modified to this extent that it should not be by fine, because if a man was allowed to pay 15s. and then go to a reformatory institution, whereas if you give him thirty days and then order him to be sent to an adult reformatory and detained for a certain time—you follow me?—In that case the remit would practically be a remit from the magistrate for sentence, with power to the sheriff to inquire into the acts, and if he thought fit, instead of sending him to prison, to send him to an adult reformatory.

10,712. It would be analogous to your ordinary procedure?—Yes; it would fit quite well into it.

10,713. (By Dr. Farquharson.) What is the precise definition of a shebeen?—A shebeen is a house in which there is more or less habitual sale of liquor without licence.

10,714. Do you find that cases of drunkenness that come from shebeen drinking are more riotous and more difficult than those from the public-house?—They are later at night, and they are on the Sundays; but the degree is too fine to draw.

10,715. Is it your belief that the quality of the liquid sold in the shebeens is worse than in the public-house?—Undoubtedly.

10,716. And from that you would conclude that the person would be more riotous?—That there would be more rapid drunkenness rather than more riotousness.

10,717. A smaller quantity would go further?—Yes.

10,718. About loitering and importuning on the streets, I suppose the magistrates do not convict on the first offence, do they?—The magistrates convict on the first offence, simply registering the conviction and admonishing.

10,719. (By the Chairman.) Then, who gives evidence as to previous convictions?—The prosecutor usually puts the question directly or indirectly. There is in his hands always a note of previous convictions, and he asks the witness if there is any previous conviction against her.

10,720. But does not that lead to this: that, if you don't ask about a previous conviction, the magistrate concludes that there is none?—It does not work out in that way.

10,721. (By Dr. Farquharson.) And how does the police get their evidence in the case of a first conviction?—In Glasgow the constables are put in plain clothes, and they are out in the street watching; and both in plain clothes and in uniform, when on duty, they have seen the girls going about and they know sometimes where they live. They also see them out at very late hours, and find them sometimes in suspicious circumstances.

10,722. But, suppose a newcomer to Glasgow, how do you get a conviction?—Sometimes cases are brought to the Police Office, and the lieutenant inquires into it and dismisses it at the counter, because of the very fact that they are not known.

10,723. The police were seldom or never able to hear the words used to the men?—I have had probably three cases, certainly not many more in which the officers stated that they had heard the words used.

10,724. So that it is a case of inference from previous character?—Yes, coupled with the circumstances and the acts.

10,725. Do the men who are importuned ever appear?—They are frequently asked to come, but they invariably refuse. I should say I never knew of a case of a man coming as a witness against a woman, but I have seen a man coming for the woman.

10,726. (By Dr. Sutherland.) If you cite, cannot you compel them to come?—Yes, if you know the man, but as a general rule you don't know him, and if you ask him he probably gives you a false address.

10,727. (By the Chairman.) The police warn the woman before running her in?—As a rule, a woman is spoken to by an officer before being run in.

10,728. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Are you aware that of hundreds of samples of shebeen whisky analysed at Somerset House, and presented to the Playfair Commission that sat on this subject, in no case was there found any deleterious ingredient in such whisky?—I am not aware. My opinion is founded upon the statement of the people who have got the whisky in shebeens, who have very often said in evidence that the whisky was bad. This is my whole experience.

10,729. Have you seen the experiences of the Amateur Vagrant; he describes the whisky as exceedingly bad, just as you say?—Yes.

10,730. In regard to the inquiry regarding drunkards, why should it not take place before the stipendiary as well as before the sheriff?—I do not know there is any absolute reason why it should not be before the stipendiary or the sheriff, but the one thing that is necessary, and which Sir Charles Cameron's questions, I take it, were directed towards, was a process which would insure the utmost care in the matter; and I rather take it the sheriff who has the analogous cases of insanity to deal with would be better than to have citizen magistrates, sitting only at intervals.

10,731. But the man who becomes a stipendiary is, I should think, as qualified for his position as a sheriff is for his. He is a trained lawyer?—Yes, quite so.

10,732. So that, on the whole, the inquiry might be conducted before a stipendiary?—I do not think a clear line need be drawn.

10,733. (By the Chairman.) But sheriffs are to be found all through Scotland, whereas stipendiaries are very rare?—Yes; the sheriffs would be better on that account.

10,734. How many stipendiaries are there in Scotland?—There is just one.

10,735. But where is there a stipendiary magistrate at present?—There is none in Glasgow at present,

Mr. George
Neilson.

19 Dec. 1894.

Mr. George Neilson.

and that is the only place which has had one in Scotland.

10,736. (By Col. M'Hardy.) I think you said that a large number of the cases of apprehensions ended in forfeiture of pledges?—Yes.

10,737. Something like 12,000 cases in the year?—Yes.

10,738. Does your duty lie in any way in the administration of this system of pledges?—To this extent, that in a doubtful question the lieutenant will consult me as to the pledge to be taken.

10,739. Does he send for you at night?—No; I have never been sent for at night in a question of that kind.

10,740. But, as a matter of fact, does your jurisdiction extend to the supervision of these pledges?—I believe that my direction with regard to any pledge would have to be followed.

10,741. (By the Chairman.) Can you give us the clause that deals with pledges?—I shall send a copy of the clauses to you.

10,742. (By Col. M'Hardy.) When an offence has been committed, and it is bailable, and therefore can be dealt with under this system of pledges, whether in every case the person arrested gets an opportunity of procuring bail, does that lie within your province?—I believe that in all cases in which bail would be accepted the person gets that opportunity, but I am not present when that is done.

10,743. But I think you said you could issue instructions in regard to pledges?—Yes.

10,744. What opportunity would you give a man to obtain bail when he did not happen to have it in his possession?—The friends are sent to. A man gives a friend's address who will stand bail for him, and if the man is found or comes for him and gives the bail, as a rule there is no difficulty.

10,745. You said he would be sent for?—I understand so.

10,746. When you bring a case before the court in the morning, do you satisfy yourself there are reasonable grounds for the charge?—I have to trust to the care of those who have acted under me. There are an average, I suppose, of about sixty cases, and it is impossible to inquire into every case.

10,747. So that, it may be, there may be an improper detention of a person occasionally from time to time, and an improper charge made against him?—There may.

10,748. There is no way, I suppose, in easily preventing such a thing occurring?—It is impossible. In the first instance, almost everything depends on the officer who apprehends the man. After that a more or less careful inquiry is made at the bar by the lieutenant, but often under conditions not very favourable.

10,749. Could you have no control, as being the ultimate prosecutor, as to how the information should be taken,—that is, in a convenient way, and under convenient conditions?—I am not sure that I have any control over that, under the existing Act.

10,750. Not under the existing Act; but you occupy a very close position to the constable who arrests. You stand immediately behind him, and practically work with him, I suppose? A first charge is made against the man in the charge-room, and I suppose therefore the conditions should be, as far as possible, the best under which a charge could be taken down?—As far as possible.

10,751. And, from what you have already said, you are not quite certain that these conditions are quite fulfilled in your Central establishment?—I am quite certain from past experience that in the great mass of cases the information is taken most competently and carefully. But, on the other hand, it is equally certain that there are a number of cases which would have been better not booked at all.

10,751A. But then there is so much tumult in the charge-room that what is being said by the different persons speaking cannot be distinctly heard?—That sometimes happens, but it is not often.

10,751B. You are satisfied that it is not a common thing?—Yes.

10,752. But you may have heard of it occurring at times?—Sometimes the place is almost stormed.

10,753. And it would be desirable that that should not be the case?—It would be desirable that the information should be taken very quietly.

10,754. (By Miss Stevenson.) I should like to understand more clearly the difference you make between those cases of offences brought before the police court, where you allowed previous character to influence you in the penalty you asked for. I understand you to say that, in cases where previous convictions should be adduced to influence the decision of the magistrate, you would prefer that that evidence should be sworn evidence, except in certain cases; and the case you adduced was that of a woman brought into the office for the police offence of loitering and importuning?—I have not made what I said sufficiently clear. It is all sworn evidence.

10,755. What I understood you to say was that you would prefer not to adduce evidence of previous convictions, unless you could put some of the witnesses in the box to produce evidence of these previous convictions?—As a matter of fact I never do so.

10,756. Except where previous character would influence you?—What I said was that in one particular case, that of the prostitute, that where the character required to be proved before you could establish the charge that is being laid before the court, that that was a case in which, in my opinion, and in our practice, it was lawful to refer to previous convictions before the verdict was given.

10,757. You make an exception. In the case where there was a previous conviction you would say that her having been previously convicted would now make her be characterised as belonging to that class?—Yes.

10,758. Is it not the case that in the Glasgow Police Court a lot of women are brought in at one time and tried individually, but while they are all in the court?—Sometimes three or four.

10,759. Is it not possible the policemen may become familiar with these women simply from seeing them in the Police Court, and not on the streets?—It is certain the policemen must be familiarised with the faces of women who are prostitutes from seeing them there.

10,760. Would it not be juster that these people should be brought in separately?—The mere fact of their not being in the court would not lessen the danger to which you refer, inasmuch as the policemen would still see the prisoners in course of being tried.

10,761. Then a poor woman, if once convicted, is characterised as a prostitute, and that will always tell against her in every future appearance in the Police Court?—It may tell against her in any future charge in the Police Court for importuning.

10,762. And that is an exceptional case in regard to police offences; in fact there is no other case in which an offender is taken up on suspicion of committing the offence without actual evidence that she has done it; that suspicion being confirmed by the knowledge of her supposed previous character?—The prostitute is not taken up on suspicion. The prostitute is brought before the bar, charged and believed to have committed the offence.

10,763. Yes; but there is no actual evidence except that of the policemen that she was seen in suspicious circumstances?—There is the evidence of the policemen that she is a prostitute, and that she did certain things, which are—loitering and importuning.

10,764. And that is the only police case where previous character comes into account?—There is the case of the thief where previous convictions hold. The thief, under the 1892 Act, the known thief found loitering with intent to steal.

10,765. Did I understand you to say that in cases like that you prefer not to take previous convictions, unless you can have them sworn to?—Where the averment is that a person is of a particular character, it is lawful to prove that such persons are of that particular

Mr. George Neilson.

19 Dec. 1894.

Mr. Dodgson Neilson. character by reference to the convictions which they have already undergone for that particular offence.

10,766. By simply looking at the conviction book; and without sworn evidence?—No, no, not that; but by the evidence of the officials who speak to the character of the persons, and who incidentally allude in their evidence to the fact that in addition to their knowledge of the person's character they know and have seen her convicted, just as in the same way in the case under the Further Powers Act, where the allegation is that a person is a thief, and that that person was found in such and such a street with intent to steal. In that case it is the custom to put in the officers to prove that they know this particular person to be a thief. The question is next asked, 'How do you know the person to be a thief?' and the answer is that they have been again and again convicted. Just in the same way we again take evidence in a case where the allegation of a person's occupation or character enters into the charge. When you charge a person as being the holder of a licence for the sale of liquor you require to prove that he is a publican.

10,767. Then in what cases would you not accept previous convictions without being sworn evidence?—Mr. George Neilson. I accept no evidence except sworn evidence.

10,768. I cannot see the distinction?—The evidence is sworn in all cases. The distinction which I draw is this:—In the case of theft the charge bears that John Smith stole a hat; that he had been previously convicted on such and such a day. After the magistrate has held it proved that John Smith stole the hat and before he sentences him I say, 'There is a previous conviction to prove here,' and then there is put into the witness-box an officer to prove that on a particular day this man was convicted of a particular offence; and either an extract of the conviction or a court book is put in to prove the fact of the conviction.

10,769. And what is the difference between that case and the case of the woman brought in for the offence mentioned?—In one case you have got to prove the conviction, in the other case you have a witness speaking merely to the question of character; who adduces his knowledge of conviction as a part, and a most important and convincing part, of his evidence to that effect. [The witness then withdrew.]

10 Dec. 1894

Mr. J. G. Temple.

Mr. JAMES G. TEMPLE, Jun., Newspaper Reporter, Glasgow, called in and examined.

Mr. J. G. Temple.

10,770. (By the Chairman.) As a newspaper reporter you have had considerable experience of the working of the police courts?—Yes.

10,771. And, on my suggestion, you paid attention to certain points with a view to giving the Committee accurate information on them?—I did.

10,772. You have got some preliminary notes of your general experience, and you think that the sentences inflicted by different magistrates vary very considerably?—Very much.

10,773. That, in the case of drunks, the temperance magistrates are the severest?—Yes.

10,774. You say that about Christmas time the sentence very often given is fourteen days?—Yes, with the option of a fine, that is very common; but that sentence is given for the express purpose of keeping in those persons over the New Year holidays.

10,775. Did you ever hear a sentence given of fourteen days without the option of a fine?—No.

10,776. It is incompetent?—In all drunk cases, I understand, you must give the prisoner the option of a fine. But what I want to bring out is this, that the magistrate, if the prisoner is a habitual drunk, gives the person fourteen days, so that he or she may be kept over the holiday period of Christmas and New Year. He fixes the fine usually at 10s. 6d., I think, and he knows from the class of person before him that he or she will not be able to pay the amount of money, and that the prisoner will have to go to jail for the fourteen days.

10,777. You say in your statement that this sentence is generally passed upon women?—Yes.

10,778. You have not seen it in the case of men?—I do not remember.

10,779. Do you think that drink is increasing among women?—Among young women I think it is.

10,780. And you say you have frequently seen young girls of sixteen years charged with being drunk?—Yes.

10,781. Have you noticed that the girls of the class who are habitual offenders are very small for their age, and look very young?—Yes, very young and very thin, and some very ill-fed.

10,782. But might you not consider these girls were much younger than they really were?—They look very young, but men get prematurely old. A man at forty will look sixty.

10,783. You say the magistrates do not convict first offenders?—They do not.

10,784. You say these girls, when asked where they got liquor, always said, 'Free another lassie'?—Yes.

10,785. Do you think that is true?—I cannot say. I only take down what I hear.

10,786. And you say that magistrates often attempt to deal with them?—Yes, by sending them to some mission laundry.

10,787. As a rule, you say you seldom see a girl charged with being drunk who lives with her parents?—That is so.

10,787A. And that the girls who are brought in for drunkenness are generally on the street sometime before they began drinking?—Yes.

10,788. Do you mean even these young girls are actually on the street?—I cannot say whether these young girls are actually on the street, but they fall into drink about sixteen.

10,789. You think that the vendors of evening papers and matches very often become prostitutes?—What I would say is, that in localities such as Charing Cross, Glasgow, the poor children there who vend evening papers are children, I would think, of even respectable working people; but the children who vend matches, and boys especially who vend shirt links outside railway stations, as a rule, you will find are children of very poor persons.

10,790. Then, I suppose, you approve of the move of the magistrates to license these young people?—I think it is a good idea to license such children.

10,791. And provide those who have no regular home to go to with a home?—Quite so.

10,792. You say that at the police court many of the men are so thoroughly habituated to the place that they do not appear to trouble themselves?—Do not appear to put themselves the least about.

10,793. They don't even take the trouble to answer guilty or not guilty?—Well, that applies not so much to the men as to the women who are habitually brought before the court. I notice they stand half round to say 'Guilty,' in a manner which indicates that they are anxious to get away at once. They know there is no use of pleading not guilty.

10,794. When they ask for a chance they generally allege some physical weakness—erysipelas, you say?—Yes, I have noticed this; and amongst the men, and a goodly number of women also, there is a complaint about their eyes, and they produce a soiled piece of paper, which they say is a line to admit them into either the Royal or the Eye Infirmary, and that they are under the doctor's care for the eyes and erysipelas.

10,795. And the old soldiers generally have sun-strokes?—In nearly every case a reserve soldier who is brought up for being drunk, states that he had taken very little liquor, and that it was owing to his having sunstroke in India that resulted in his getting drunk very quickly.

10,796. You say the class of women who turn up in

Mr. J. G. Temple. the police courts have a sickening and offensive smell? —Yes, especially those with children.

19 Dec. 1894.

10,797. And I suppose their night in the Police Court has not improved their condition?—I do not know. So far as I understand, the cells are exceedingly clean, and washed out every morning.

10,798. Yes, but the inmates are not?—No.

10,799. You have been struck with the gradually deteriorating appearance of the women who are brought up for prostitution?—Yes, you easily notice that. The woman who is brought up at court for the first time for prostitution is usually well-dressed, and with every subsequent appearance she becomes more degraded in her appearance.

10,800. But, do you find many of the well-dressed and apparently well-off prostitutes brought up?—It is only rarely.

10,801. I suppose if they drink much or incline to be disorderly, they probably would not be well-dressed or well-off?—No.

10,802. We have been told by women in prison for solicitation, and in other evidence of that class, that they were not guilty of the offence on the occasion on which they were run in, but that they were known to the police, and run in on every occasion, and that it was hopeless to hope to get off, and that they generally pleaded guilty?—My experience was different from what you say. I understand from what you say that they had pleaded guilty to the magistrates. My experience is that in very few cases do they plead guilty. I took the trouble to go along to the police office, and was allowed to turn up the Court-book, and I have statistics which show those who pleaded and those who pleaded not guilty.

10,803. You took down a number of names with the 'plead'?—I looked over the Court-book of the Glasgow Central Police Court for the month of October last, from the first of the month to the 18th, and I found that of the unfortunate women who had been brought up before the court, 30 had pleaded not guilty, and 14 only had pleaded guilty. But I have found in other courts that, where women were charged with prostitution, if they saw the magistrate had been lenient to the first they pleaded guilty, so that they might get a chance of getting off. I cannot say who was the magistrate sitting at that particular time. He might have been a lenient or a severe one.

10,804. You do not record the penalty?—It is usually 15s. or 14 days, and in very exceptional cases two guineas or 30 days.

10,805. You think the cases of 30 days are very exceptional?—So far as I have seen. I can only speak of my own experience. I do not always sit at the court. I only wait until I have got what I want from a newspaper point of view.

10,806. You have furnished me with the verbatim notes of a case of prostitution which I want to ask you about, because we have it in the notes of the procurator-fiscal?—Yes.

10,807. But you say that the police who gave evidence in this case appeared to give their evidence in such a way as to suggest that they had consulted together?—It is almost a facsimile.

10,808. And that is constantly the case?—Almost without exception.

10,809. You took a note of the evidence of the policemen in the case of the woman Barbara H.?—Yes.

10,810. And the general result of your observation of the police evidence in such a case was that it was almost identical?—Yes.

10,811. At my request you visited the police office, so as to take notes which would enable us to place on record the method of handling the petty offenders, and especially at the Central Police Office?—Yes.

10,812. You went there on Saturday 8th?—Yes, of this present month.

10,813. And between a quarter-past 10 and 11 o'clock eight persons were brought in?—Yes. Two of these were accused of being simply drunk and incapable, one being a man with a pin-leg, and the other a young woman rather stylishly dressed. The man was helpless, while the woman was crying, laughing, and 'slaving.' She could speak, for, when asked her name, she replied—'I'm Flora Macdonald!' Of course the lieutenant would not accept that, and she was sent up the hoist and kept in a cell till she felt disposed to tell her correct name.

10,814. Did they bother themselves about the right name?—No. It was like a case that occurred some time ago in another office, where a man gave the name of 'Charles Stewart Parnell.' They knew that wasn't his right name, just as they knew 'Flora Macdonald' wasn't her right name.

10,815. It was a sacred name?—Yes.

10,816. There were no 'dead or cold drunks' brought in while you were there?—No. On a wet Saturday night I have found from past experience you get more 'dead and cold drunks' than when the weather is good.

10,817. Will you explain to the Committee how these 'dead or cold drunks' are dealt with?—I chanced to be in the Central Police Office on a wet Saturday night when one or two of these particular drunks were brought in. They are usually brought in a barrow to the police court, taken off the barrow and just dragged in to the front of the bar, where the lieutenant or the officer in charge goes round and pulls their ear to see if it is possible to waken them. If he finds he cannot get any life into them at all, they are sent up to the casualty room, where they are examined by the doctor and watched until they become sober enough to give their name and address.

10,818. They have a special room separated by gauze, so that he may watch them that nothing occurs to them?—Yes, I believe so, separated by iron bars.

10,819. (By Dr Sutherland.) You have not seen the barred chamber?—No.

10,820. (By the Chairman.) You saw several cases of assault. You say that, while watching, two young men came to the bar and offered 30s., you think, to get a friend out, but the lieutenant would not take it?—No. He whistled up to the turnkey and asked if that man was able enough to be allowed out on pledge, and the answer he got was 'No; he's 'still mad with drink.'

10,821. And the lieutenant very properly refused to take the pledge?—Yes.

10,822. But at this point they thought you were staying too long, and told you that, without express permission of the Superintendent, you could not take any notes?—Yes.

10,823. That is not important, as we visited the police station ourselves?—Yes.

10,824. From the times you have been in the police office, do you think the people who are brought in are all people who require to be brought in?—On the average, say 9 out of 10, or 19 out of 20 cases.

10,825. Do you think they are cases which should be cleared off the streets, or do you think they appear to be cases that, so far as the order of the streets was concerned, might have been left to stagger away home?—I can only speak of what I have seen in court.

10,826. About the police office?—I would not like to give an opinion about that.

10,827. Also on my suggestion you spent a forenoon, on December 18th, at the Central Police Court, and took full notes of the procedure?—Yes. I remained there from 11.5 to 12.5.

10,828. You took a pen and ink photograph of what occurred?—Yes, and I found that from 11.5 to 11.40 there were, in that short space of time, 58 cases disposed of.

10,829. But I suppose a great majority of these pleaded guilty or were pledged?—There were 13 pledged out. That is, they did not appear. Their pledges were forfeited. Then there were six men who were taken up in a batch and let away.

10,830. You have got the names here, but it is not necessary that we should pillory these men by putting their names down, but to show the care with which

Mr. J. G. Temple.

19 Dec. 1894.

- Mr. J. G. Temple,*
19 Dec. 1894.
- you have done the thing. It will let us know that you went thoroughly into the matter?—Six were taken up in a batch and let away, the magistrate considering that they had been punished enough through being confined from Saturday till Monday morning. These men were charged with being drunk.
- 10,831. Who was the judge?—Bailie Martin.
- 10,832. But Bailie Martin takes rather a lenient view of drunks?—His popular sentence, if I remember correctly, is 2s. 6d. or three days.
- 10,833. Will you go on?—There were next six men, drunk cases, who were similarly dealt with. Then there were seven men who had each left 7s. 6d. as a pledge, and had the money forfeited, as they did not appear when their names were called. Other five men who had been pledged out had their bail money forfeited.
- 10,834. Do they bring the men and women up at the same time?—No; the men first, and women afterwards. As to the women, six were placed in a batch, and were let off. Then came the stylishly-dressed woman, who on Saturday night had given the name of 'Flora Macdonald.' She was charged with being drunk and incapable. Her proper name was Helen N—. Here is what took place:—'Helen—I took too much drink, and I'm guilty. I was here a month ago. I went through to Edinburgh, but returned on the Monday night. Magistrate—Have you been here before? Helen—Yes, once before. Magistrate—Five shillings or four days.'
- 10,835. Now, you will kindly note that the persons who were brought up in batches had just as bad records as Helen N—, the stylishly-dressed woman, and yet they got off and she didn't?—I asked the fiscal why this was so, and he replied, 'We take the worst cases separately.' Now, I saw that woman brought in myself to the police office, and I would say that she was pretty drunk, but she was not 'cold,' or incapable of taking care of herself. She was not so bad as that.
- 10,836. Did she know that she was giving a wrong name in the police office?—Yes, she knew that. And yet, while they got off, she got 5s. or four days, although she seemed to have been sufficiently punished.
- 10,837. (By Col. M'Hardy.) What was the end; did she pay the fine?—I can't say.
- 10,838. (By the Chairman.) But, according to this, she was charged a month ago, and she said that she had been once there before, and if there had been any contradiction of that you would have noted it?—I would. I took a verbatim note.
- 10,839. She admitted being once there, and no more?—The only unfair feature about her case was that these women who were let off in a batch had not the question put to them, 'Were you here before?'
- 10,840. And this suggests to you the question of whether there was any record kept in such cases?—Yes.
- 10,841. We have had evidence given by the procurator-fiscal that in such cases he would consider it contrary to the spirit of the recent Act—in fact, the letter of the recent Act—to mention previous convictions at all, either in the proof or after the person had been found guilty before he was sentenced.—With regard to that, I was in the court last Monday, and I was very much struck to hear a new magistrate, who made his first appearance there, ask whether a prisoner 'had been here before,' and Mr Neilson, for the first time ever I had heard him, said that he had been informed that he was not to tell any antecedents, if he hadn't proof for it regarding the prisoner, and therefore the magistrate did not get the information he wanted last Monday.
- 10,842. But the magistrate had always previously been told it?—Yes, in past years, in a general way. Such as, 'Oh, yes; we know Maggie; she has often been here.'
- 10,843. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Are the persons who tell these things upon oath?—No. It is the fiscal.
- 10,844. (By Dr Sutherland.) Does the assessor Mr. J. G. Temple, speak?—The assessor rarely opens his mouth, unless he is cross-examining a witness for the defence.
- 10,845. Has he communication with the bench?—He sits beside the magistrate.
- 10,846. (By the Chairman.) Another batch of women came then?—Yes; they were taken up in a row, and they all got off, the magistrate saying, 'You have been here since Saturday; go, and do not come back again.'
- 10,847. No moral advice given?—No moral advice given.
- 10,848. Come to the next cases?—Agnes R—, drunk and incapable. She admitted she had been 'up' before, and was fined 5s. or four days. Mary H— said she was before the court twelve months ago, and asked for a chance. She had been drunk and incapable, and was sentenced to 5s. or four days. Then came Mary J—, fined in 10s. 6d. or eight days for being drunk. She had been up before. Next Mary G— admitted she had been drunk, and said it was seven weeks since she had last been in a court. Her sentence was 10s. 6d. or fourteen days.
- 10,849. How did all these previous convictions come out? Was it on the admission themselves?—Yes.
- 10,850. Were they asked anything about the matter?—They were simply asked the question, 'Were you here before?' and the answer was 'Yes.' I always find, and have been astonished at it, that prisoners tell the truth.
- 10,851. But it seems a very absurd and subtle definition to say that previous convictions must not be given in evidence, and then to allow a prisoner to be asked about them, without the chance of contradiction if he or she tells a lie?—Yes.
- 10,852. (By Dr Sutherland.) Do they not tell the truth because they are so well known?—I really think they tell the truth as any ordinary person would tell the truth.
- 10,853. (By the Chairman.) Then you came to the disorderly cases; were they taken in a batch?—No. They never take disorderlies in a batch.
- 10,854. Were they mixed up with the drunks?—They finish the drunks before going on to the disorderlies.
- 10,855. Just give us a few specimens.—When one watches the disorderly cases he is surprised at the sentences. Here is one man, John K—, who pleads guilty to being riotous and disorderly, and the sentence is 7s. 6d. or five days.
- 10,856. That is the same as a drunk and incapable?—This man had been riotous and disorderly. He had been more than drunk, and yet he is fined 7s. 6d. or five days, whereas I have seen some magistrates, like Bailie Pettigrew, give a man 7s. 6d. or five days for being simply drunk.
- 10,857. Then the next case?—George R—; he got the same. Then, in regard to the assault cases, a very common experience is that where a man has been assaulting a wife she does not turn up, in order to defeat the ends of justice. But if a policeman thinks the assault is a very bad one, the fiscal asks for a continuation, and it is granted. I have two cases, Dennis G— and James F—, who were discharged on account of there being no evidence.
- 10,858. Was the accusation against these two for beating their wives—were they their wives?—I could not say that. Then Charles C— and Robert C—, who had been fighting, and had been up six months before, were fined 10s. 6d. or eight days.
- 10,859. How did you get that information?—That came out from the prisoners. They admitted it on being asked, but, if a case goes to trial, the fiscal, after the evidence has been led, says to the magistrate, 'Have you made up your mind?' and the magistrate says 'Yes, the man is guilty.' Then an officer steps into the box, and takes the oath, and, turning up a book, swears how many times this man has been up before, and the magistrate in that way can deal with a prisoner severely, taking into consideration his previous convictions.

Mr. J. G.
Temple.
19 Dec. 1894.

10,860. Yes, but that we were told was confined to certain classes of cases—assaults, I think, are under a certain statute?—Yes. Then came James D—, charged with assault, and fined 7s. 6d. or five days; Peter M—, for being riotous, got 7s. 6d. or five days; then Mary Brown, for being riotous, and who had been up a long time ago, got 10s. 6d. or eight days.

10,861. Mary would have to go to prison?—These poor people cannot pay the fine. The next case was Jane S. K—, who was pledged out.

10,862. She forfeited her pledge?—Yes. That makes thirteen within an hour who forfeited their pledge. Mary D—, for using bad language, got 10s. 6d. or eight days.

10,863. Now, is the language for which so many people are brought up in Glasgow, does it appear to warrant such a severe sentence as in this case, which virtually amounts to eight days' imprisonment, for I suppose Mary would not pay?—I think often the bad language is caused by the policeman threatening to take them in, and they pass swearing remarks to the policeman, and then that rouses him, and then he says 'Come on; a bad language case.'

10,864. I suppose it must rouse Mary also?—Yes. In these cases you very seldom get a witness to come and say that the person had been using bad language. It is just as in prostitution cases. I never saw a civilian come and give evidence.

10,865. I was under the impression that it was quite the contrary with cases of using bad language. I understood that such a serious penalty would not be inflicted for using bad language against a policeman, and that it would be proved by independent witnesses?—Very rarely that.

10,866. Was the language used in this case remarkably bad?—It never came out. I think the woman must have pleaded guilty.

10,867. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Would the language be stated on the charge sheet?—No, just 'using bad language.'

10,868. (By the Chairman.) Would she get eight days for pleading guilty to a charge of bad language, the nature of which never came out?—If she admitted it she would.

10,869. It would take a good deal of bad language to warrant a person getting eight days?—I certainly think a person would require to use a good deal of bad language for a sentence of that kind.

10,870. Well, go on?—Mary M— was charged with being riotous. She had been up twelve months ago, and the penalty was 7s. 6d. or five days. Then Mary M'G—. This case went to trial, and took some little time, perhaps ten minutes, to dispose of. This was a case that I noticed on the Saturday night. She struck a woman with a tumbler on the head, and cut it very badly. The woman who was injured got the wound dressed early in the night, but came back about eleven o'clock streaming with blood, and the officer in charge said to me, 'There is no doubt that woman has had another fill-up of drink, or the wound would not have burst out again.' The woman who assaulted her was sentenced to sixty days' imprisonment, without the option of a fine. The wound was on the head. The next case, I think, was Charles T—, who was fined 10s. 6d. or eight days for using bad language. He had been up before.

10,871. You did not notice whether he pleaded guilty or not?—He must have pleaded guilty. Margaret C— pleaded not guilty to riotous behaviour, but on evidence was convicted, and fined 10s. 6d. or fourteen days. I have noticed that some magistrates, if their time has been taken up, and some trouble has been taken to bring in witnesses, they are sometimes severer than if a person has pleaded guilty right off. Rose C— was sentenced to 10s. 6d. or fourteen days, the magistrate remarking to her, 'This will keep you over the New Year.'

10,872. There is no secret about keeping them over the New Year?—No. Sarah T— is the next case. She had only one leg, and had been cursing and swearing. She pleaded not guilty, but got 10s. 6d. or eight days. Mr. J. G. Temple.

10,873. Was it sufficiently strong?—I think if I remember rightly this was the woman who spoke in a perfect whisper, and the magistrate expressed his astonishment that a woman like her could swear, but the evidence came out that she really had been swearing.

10,874. There are swears and swears, and an eight days' swear would require to be a very stiff one; was it such blasphemous and abusive language as would demoralise those who heard it?—I give you the particulars. After she had spoken in a whisper in reply to the charge, the following dialogue took place:—'Magistrate—What does she say? Whisp—whisp—whisp. Magistrate—Not hearing a word. Police—man—She gets off often by speaking this way. A Second Policeman—She was cursing and swearing in the Trongate at ten minutes to six on Sunday morning. A Third Policeman—I told her to go down King Street, and for that advice she directed me to h—. (Laughter.) Sarah—I was waiting till the religious tant should open, where I would get something to eat. Magistrate—Waiting till the tent should open! Why, you are usually waiting till the Central Police Court should open! (Laughter.) I let you away the last time. Sarah—I was afore the doctor, who said I was awfu' bad. Magistrate—The doctor's book shows that there is nothing wrong with you. 10s. 6d. or eight days.'

10,875. What I want to know is, whether the magistrate takes the trouble to get the exact words? I mean to say, here is an offence being committed which he has considered merited eight days' imprisonment, for I presume it would come to that. While there is a good deal of the use of profane language, and especially among the less cultured class, there is very often strong and abusive language, interlarded with oaths and other profanities—all that is very bad—but what I should like to know is the precise heinousness of the offence that is visited with eight days' imprisonment?—I have often found that the prisoners had no idea what they had said. If they asked the policemen, the prisoner got off usually, for the policeman's evidence did not coincide; and usually you will find that when a person has been charged with cursing and swearing, and it goes to trial, the policemen, as regards what the prisoner has said, differ very much.

10,876. I suppose it is only on the evidence of two policeman that they are convicted?—Yes.

10,877. And the person who is sworn at, if an outsider, does he come?—No; it doesn't seem to injure him.

10,878. Does it coincide with your evidence that in a case where a policeman was the object of the abusive or cursing language, that the charge was either withdrawn, or an endeavour made to get a light sentence; and that it was only in a case where some neighbour woman was the object of the offensive vituperation that heavy sentences was pressed. That doesn't concur with your experience?—When a woman has been charged with using very abusive language, it is generally a woman who appears against her, because she has been insinuating that this person in the witness-box has been of ill-fame; and she has come more to get out her spleen upon her by appearing in Court than anything else.

10,879. But the cases which you frequently come across—those were all cases where the policeman was the prosecutor, and where the evidence was entirely that of policemen?—In the case I have instanced the evidence was of policemen.

10,880. Give us your other cases?—All these cases were disposed of by 11.40, including Elizabeth H., who was fined 7s. 6d. or five days for being riotous. Then three young men were charged with stealing a ham, and their case lasted from 11.40 to 12.5. These men were convicted, and that made up the hour.

10,881. So that you had 58 cases within the space of 85 minutes, and three more, which made up the hour?—Yes.

Mr. J. G.
Temple.

19 Dec. 1894.

10,882. That is 61 cases in an hour?—Yes, including the theft case which lasted nearly half-an-hour.

10,883. (By Col. M'Hardy.) That is not deducting forfeitures?—No, it is including them.

10,884. And there were some dozen?—Yes, 13; but as much time as the person took up who pleaded guilty was taken up by the calling for prisoners, the signing of names, and the entering of the matter in the book by the magistrate.

10,885. (By Prof. Dove Wilson.) In the case of persons who were brought up for being drunk and incapable, am I right in stating that these were always police offences?—Always.

10,886. Is the fact of whether the person has been up before brought out with a view to influencing the sentence?—Well, the magistrate will ask the prisoner, or the fiscal very often will say, 'Maggie (or "Jessie" or "Jock") is an old customer,' and he sometimes increases the sentence very much, and keeps her over the New Year by giving her a substantial fine or fourteen days.

10,887. In the case of persons brought up for loitering and importuning, is the case that you gave us a typical one?—Yes; one of the ordinary cases.

10,887A. Is there any further evidence of loitering or importuning ever given than that she accosted men?—The expression used is that she accosted a man at such and such a corner, or in such and such a place.

10,888. And that is all the evidence that is given?—No; the fiscal asks the question first, 'How long have you known this woman as a prostitute,' and the constable says what he knows.

10,889. What I mean is, is the accosting all the evidence that is given of loitering and importuning?—Yes.

10,890. Are the police ever asked how they know the woman to be a prostitute?—They just ask 'How long have you known her to be a prostitute.' One policeman will say, 'I have known her for two years,' and another perhaps will say 'for three years;' and another case may come up and he will ask, 'How long have you known this woman,' and the answer will be 'two months,' and the next constable will say 'I have known her for eighteen months.'

10,891. Is time ever given to any of the convicted persons to pay their fines?—I cannot say that, not being connected with the police force.

10,892. You would hear the sentence?—Yes; and I have often heard them, if they had no friends in court, saying that they would like some one to call at so-and-so's, where money could be had to get them out.

10,893. Is any condition ever put into the sentence that the persons shall have a certain time to pay?—Never.

10,893A. (By Dr Sutherland.) Who proves the previous convictions in the Court?—When it is a case of assault it is always the officer in court who proves the conviction, after the magistrate has been satisfied of the prisoner's guilt; or if it is a case of theft, it will be a detective officer.

10,894. How does he identify the prisoner?—I do not know.

10,895. In the Circuit Court the detective officer is put in to prove previous convictions?—After an assault case is finished, and the magistrate is convinced that the party at the bar is guilty, the fiscal says, 'Wait a moment,' and an officer, who is permanently in the court, enters the box and takes the oath, and turning up a book which has the leaf folded down, turns up a summons, and says 'this prisoner here was convicted on such and such a day.'

10,896. He was present and saw her convicted?—That never comes out.

10,897. As a matter of fact he was present?—He ought to have been, but that never comes out.

10,898. (By Prof. Dove Wilson.) In the Circuit Court he is always asked?—Yes.

10,899. (By the Chairman.) These convictions might have taken place in other courts, not the Central, so that the conviction would be recorded against John Smith or whoever he might be?—I am not so sure of that; I think every court's records stand by themselves.

10,900. (By Col. M'Hardy.) But they all admit it in these cases you have given us?—Quite so. [The witness then withdrew.]

Mr. J. G.
Temple.

19 Dec. 1894.

Dr. A. J.
Currie.

A. J. CURRIE, M.D. (Cin. O.), F.G.S.E., called in and examined.*

Dr. A. J.
Currie.

10,901. (By the Chairman.) You are the Superintendent of the Glasgow Institute for the treatment of Inebriety?—Yes, I hold that appointment.

10,902. The Institute is in George Street?—Yes.

10,903. And you are M.D. of Cincinnati (Ohio)?—Yes.

10,904. And what do the letters F.G.S.E. stand for?—Fellow of the Geological Society of Edinburgh.

10,905. Would you please give us the history of this Institute for the treatment of Inebriety; it was founded in connection with some cure?—It was opened first of all as the "Metabolic Institute" by some well-known local gentleman. The special treatment I believe, as laid down by formula, was originally the property of Americans.

10,906. But what is it called?—That treatment you refer to was called the 'metabolic' treatment.

10,907. We have been told about that; that is the thing that Mr King has been connected with?—Yes. He has taken an active part in connection with it.

10,908. He told us about it. How did you become connected with it?—First of all through an advertisement in the Glasgow Herald, asking me to meet a Mr Coykendall, an American, in St. Enoch's Hotel. I met him there and he showed me letters, &c., from Mr J. Y. King, and several well-known gentlemen in Glasgow, setting forth that they had taken up the matter favourably. Concerning their acquaintance with the value of the treatment, I was personally assured by Mr Johnstone, J.P., and Mr J. Y. King as to what these gentlemen knew about the matter, and had an opportunity of seeing some cases dealt with in Glasgow, prior to taking the matter up in America. Mr. Coykendall had to go back to America. I did so after weeks' careful consideration.

10,909. When was this?—In the month of September 1892.

10,910. That treatment we understand consists of?—Hypodermic injection of a fluid with the administration of tonics.

10,911. The composition of the fluid is kept secret, but we were told strychnia enters into it. Besides the injection there is some other fluid taken by the mouth?—A tonic is usually given.

10,912. At the same time?—Not always.

10,913. And that is done how often?—Four times a day for twenty-one days usually.

10,914. During the treatment the patient cannot attend to work?—Oh yes; if the occupation is light he can attend to business as usual.

10,915. If not?—It is better to take a rest.

10,916. You have the names of a committee here: is Mr King on it?—No. It is only about three months ago these gentlemen, whom Mr King is associated with, consented to the formation of a working committee.

10,917. Who is the inventor of the 'metabolic' treatment?—The first name that I know that has been associated with it is Coykendall. There are several

* Dr Currie, considers the "Metabolic Treatment" merely a very useful agent in the curative treatment of certain forms of Inebriety, and lays no claim to any special merit or originality. Neither has he brought forward any wonderful cases that he has cured. He has but endeavoured to deal with the treatment of Inebriety in a spirit of scientific enquiry and research.

Dr. A. J. Currie.

19 Dec. 1894.

brothers in that family—two doctors, and a lawyer, and a fourth, I believe.

10,918. How long has it been in use in America?—From a little pamphlet which I received, the treatment, I understand, had been carried on in America for four years before I heard of it.

10,919. And what result is alleged in that pamphlet?—The very best.

10,920. Now you have had two years' experience here of it?—Fully.

10,921. And up to October of this year you have treated, I understand, 47 cases?—Excuse me; 47 poor class cases were dealt with as Institute cases.

10,922. How many cases have been dealt with by you since the opening of the Institute?—I cannot give you the exact number, perhaps about 100. The Institute in George Street has nothing to do with private cases. The George Street cases have been principally very poor people.

10,923. What is your allegation as to the results in the private cases?—Better than in the poor cases.

10,924. And in the cases here that you have dealt with in George Street?—There has been a period of abstinence following the treatment in every case; sometimes from the period of treatment till now, sometimes the period of abstinence has been very short.

10,925. Do you allow the patient to drink, or place any restriction on drinking?—When they commence, they are invariably led to understand they are quite at liberty to take what they feel they cannot do without; and when they feel they have no desire for liquor they must leave it alone.

10,926. Does the absence of desire in this treatment amount to aversion?—In some cases, the treatment seems to be followed by what I may call a positive loathing; but to my mind, that is merely owing to some of them realising to what position drink and drinking has brought them to.

10,927. They object to it more on moral than physical grounds?—I believe so. Many speak very strongly about the extraordinary loathing, but, so far as I have been able to see, that is the reason.

10,928. We were told, in regard to the 'Tyson' cure that one patient could not bear the smell of whisky, and another that it tasted to him most disgusting?—I have met some cases that have gone through the metabolic treatment that have expressed such a feeling.

10,929. Because in that case it would be easy enough to test it upon people who are not habitually drunkards, to see if you could get them brought round to dislike drink also?—Yes.

10,930. What is the cost of your remedy? We were told that the original cost of the 'Tyson' cure was £10?—The amount fixed before I had anything to do with the metabolic treatment was twenty guineas, and it has remained at that since; but cases dealt with in George Street have been treated in a monetary way on their merits. Fully a third paid nothing, and some paid very small amounts.

10,931. Have you had any specimen cases as was the case in Dundee?—No public exhibitions of any kind. Cases have been taken up as test cases for the satisfaction of gentlemen, privately; but I have always had a decided aversion to taking any part in public exhibitions of the kind.

10,932. In this list which I have in my hand, you have a very miscellaneous collection of professions in your record. You have specimens of a great number of trades—four clerks, three commercial travellers, two painters, and two physicians: were they Glasgow physicians?—One in Glasgow, and one close by.

10,933. Registered physicians?—One a member of the College of Physicians of Edinburgh, and the other a member of the Faculty, and M.D. of Glasgow.

10,934. In their cases, has the cure proved efficacious?—Yes; but in neither case have they remained total abstainers, although both were total abstainers for a time.

10,935. These gentlemen were treated by this George Street Institute as poor cases?—They were not able to pay a regular fee.

10,936. They took the pledge?—Yes, after the close of the treatment. They promised to abstain from all intoxicating liquors.

10,937. But if they did that they have broken their pledge?—Yes. When they and I were satisfied they had no desire for drink, they signed the pledge: it has been the rule to invite people to sign the pledge.

10,938. Mr. King, I think, said there was some special arrangement for the treatment of philanthropic cases?—That may be.

10,939. You do not know?—That would be under the monetary arrangement that was entered into by Mr Jas. Johnston, J.P., and Mr A. M. Brown of Gryffe Castle with Mr Coykendall. They, for the promise of £300, £100 was paid in advance, got the privilege of putting this treatment within the reach of the poor. Mr King acted as legal agent in the matter.

10,940. Mr King told us that he was hoping to get authority to make public the nature of the remedy. I presume you have no authority to do so?—Mr King, probably, would explain my peculiar position in that matter.

10,941. Do you know it?—Oh, yes.

10,942. Do you make the remedy here?—I can hardly say that I make the remedies. I put the several ingredients together.

10,943. You compound it on this side?—Quite so; but I get some of the ingredients from the other side, because I am not able to get them in Glasgow conveniently.

10,944. How long have any of your cures lasted?—There is a two and a half years' history of the treatment, so far as I know, in Glasgow, and cases have been dealt with since then.

10,945. Do you mean renewed?—They have been useful members of society since the date of treatment. Prior to that, they were altogether a drag on every one connected with them.

10,946. (By Dr Sutherland.) All of them?—Oh, no; but many of those who have gone to the Institute have been in desperate circumstances before they found their way there.

10,947. Have you had in the Institute any police court drunkards?—Several, I believe, but I have no accurate information.

10,948. And you have never had any test cases. You told us that certain test cases were brought before you; you have never had any of these test cases from the police court, who have been repeatedly convicted?—Several of them have been repeatedly convicted, how often I do not know.

10,949. You do not know the details?—No.

10,949A. (By Col. M'Hardy.) How long does the treatment last?—Not more than three weeks has been required in any case so far.

10,950. And there is no further treatment?—We let them understand that there is no likelihood of a second treatment.

10,951. And do you leave the person treated in the same environment as you found that person?—With poor people it is difficult to get them away from their friends, but we strongly recommend a change of surroundings sometimes.

10,952. But if the environment is bad, and they go back to it, do they not go back to their old ways?—Some have gone back to liquor.

10,953. What proportion have gone back in that case?—I should say, roughly, a third. I have had no opportunity of making myself acquainted, although I endeavour to make it a practice to communicate with those who have been in George Street, but in some cases I have lost trace of them altogether.

10,954. Have the majority of the cases treated, had in the condition of treatment a change of environment?—No. Taking the pledge, that is insisted upon in some cases, towards the close of treatment is advisable. We believe in building up as many barriers as we can.

Dr. A. J. Currie.

Dr. A. J. Currie.
19 Dec. 1894.

10,955. And you have been successful in two-thirds of the cases where the individuals were living in a depraved state of society?—There has been a period of total abstinence, in every case, for a greater or less period.

10,956. Yes; but has there been what we should honestly call a cure?—I never use the word 'cure' coupled with this treatment.

10,957. You said you had experience of a case of two and a half years; is that a case where the environment is bad?—Very bad, staying in one of the worst part of Glasgow. They were submitted by Mr Johnston, one of the local justices of the peace. Mr King knows of them. There was one lapse in connection with them. They have a boy, and, in February 1893, when the electric light was introduced first, that little boy was run over by a car, and the father saw the boy being picked up and conveyed to the hospital.

10,958. Yes, I think we have heard that story.

10,959. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Are you formed into a limited liability company or anything of that sort?—No, that was not considered necessary.

10,960. Do other people derive profit as well as you?—No; but I do not derive the profits in a pecuniary way. The loss pecuniarily I hold is greater than profit.

10,961. But, if you treat the better class people, what do they pay?—Twenty guineas.

10,962. And the medicines?—I do not vend medicines; it is a course of treatment.

10,963. Have you not fifty-three cases at twenty guineas a head?—They have not all paid that. The amount has been very much modified in certain cases.

10,964. Was Dr Alexander Nairne associated with you?—Yes.

10,965. Why did he leave you?—Our partnership was interfered with by the action of the General Medical Council.

10,966. Did he make a statement before the General Medical Council disparaging the treatment?—All I know is what I read in the newspapers at the time, and there were certain statements there about the treatment by him.

10,967. He had been nine months associated with you, and there was no cause for him to make disparaging remarks about your methods when he was before the General Medical Council?—No, everything to the contrary.

10,968. Even although he was forced by the Council to sever his connection with you?—No.

10,969-70. Yet all the same, he did so. Now I understand that the metabolic treatment suggests a change in the tissues of the body?—Metabolism simply implies a change.

10,971. Your medicine is said to have the effect of changing the tissues?—The treatment has been productive of change, as far as I could see. I do not adhere to the formulæ that were put into my hands at the outset, but there are some cases that I did adhere to them.

10,972. I do not know much about the treatment you adopt, but I assume you know that alcohol, continued over a long period, produces disastrous effects upon the brain and other tissues?—Yes.

10,973. Do you mean to inform the Committee that you have discovered a remedy which will remove the structural changes in the tissues and restore them to the normal state?—To some extent, but I make no pretensions to originality. It won't bring back the brain to the condition it was in before commencing drinking; but so far as I have been able to find, with adherence to total abstinence, there has been no recurrence of what is commonly called 'the drink craving.'

10,974. Then the inference is that your specific remedy brings the tissues to their normal state again?—This treatment does to some extent.

10,975. As a medical man, do you believe there is any drug in heaven or in earth that will alter the cirrhotic liver, or the kidneys of a drunkard?—A good deal may be done to help the condition of that man.

10,976. Where the normal cells of these organs have been replaced by new and adventitious fibrous tissue, do you believe any drug will bring it back to its normal condition?—Not to the condition it was originally.

10,977. Will your medicine replace the fibrous tissues which has taken the place of the normal cells with something else?—The treatment helps nature to do the best it can.

10,978. Supposing I tried your medicine, is it necessary for me to tell those drunkards in Glasgow among the poorer classes that they are undergoing your treatment?—I don't see how they can undergo it without being aware of it.

10,979. Must they know that it is a special remedy?—That has not been done; they know they are going through the treatment.

10,980. Supposing you give me the hypodermic medicine, and the tonic, and I used them, would you expect that in my hands the same result would follow as in yours?—Two or three cases were dealt with before I had any connection with the treatment, by local medical practitioners, and good results were not attained, through negligence it was thought.

10,981. In regard to the Keeley and Tyson cures, and other nostrums of that kind, we are told it is necessary that the individuals under treatment should know that they are being treated in a special way; is that necessary with your alleged cure, or would it be enough if any medical practitioner faithfully carried out the treatment? Would it fulfil the same purpose?—The patient who is under treatment must know, I would think, what is being done if he is asked to attend and be treated four times daily.

10,982. Take a prisoner who is in my hands for thirty days for habitual inebriety—I give him tonics—they do him no permanent good, as they only serve to strengthen him to indulge his craving when he gets his liberty. If I were to give him your medicine, is it necessary to give him this special form of treatment?—No, four times daily is not a hard and fast line in every case.

10,983. Then if you were to supply me with the material you use, you would naturally expect that I would get good results?—Yes, I would expect so; but whether I am in a position to put the remedies in your hands or not, I cannot say, as I would require to obtain legal advice.

10,984. Mr King said so?—I had to sign a declaration you know before details of formula, &c., were placed in my hands.

10,985. Is it necessary for the patient to know that he is undergoing that specific and special treatment?—I believe the treatment is physical and not faith-healing. In that case, with a correct diagnosis, simply the application of the proper remedies is sufficient, no matter by whom, so far as I can judge. I never had an opportunity of taking up a case and carrying out the treatment without acquainting them of the fact.

10,986. They have come and told you that they have been in the hands of private practitioners, and you say, 'I am going to subject you to a process which will cure you.' Do you believe that?—I say it will help them; I never say 'cure' them.

10,987. You are taking safe ground, I can see.—I never use the word 'cure.'

10,988. You are aware that in rational therapeutics it is not necessary for a patient to know what he is getting to produce the desired effect?—Of course.

10,989. Do you know if in America there are any institutions where your method is being used?—There were eight or nine metabolic institutions in America, according to the circular put into my hands.

10,990. Would you furnish me with the names of the institutions where this system has been practised for some time?—Mr King would be better able to give you all information about that matter. I think there is one at Cedar Rapids, in the State of Iowa, where one of the Coykendalls was; another at Burlington; and another at Tennessee.

Dr. A. J. Currie.
19 Dec. 1894.

- Dr. A. Currie.*
12 Dec. 1894.
- 10,991. Supposing I told you of a doctor in Glasgow who had four dipsomaniacs who consulted you, would you mind telling me whether your treatment has been successful in their cases if I sent you the names?—Yes, I will have no hesitation in giving my opinion.
- 10,992. Why do you limit your treatment to four times a day?—Four times has been found the best arrangement, but there are some business men who cannot come so often.
- 10,993. Why do you fix on four times?—That rule was laid down before I had anything to do with it, and I have not improved upon it.
- 10,994. But is there not some rational reason for adopting four times?—The medicine is given according to the severity of the disease.
- 10,995. Do you give it according to the physical and mental deterioration present?—Yes, that is so.
- 10,996. If that is the case, would you not expect that in a moderate drinker—an abstemious man in short—a small dose now and again would have the effect of curing him of any desire to drink at all?—The doses are altered according to the requirements, or what are thought to be the requirements. The doses are very small indeed. Owing to the mode of administration, the solutions are very strong, and the doses are very small.
- 10,997. But you give them in small or large doses, in proportion to the degree of inebriety?—And sometimes one remedy is used, and sometimes another. The different ingredients are changed according to the cases.
- 10,998. (By Dr Farquharson.) Are your views on the tissue changes, as effected by your remedy, purely theoretical?—Theoretical, I should say, from what I have read and heard.
- 10,999. They are not founded on any chemical or microscopical or physiological examination?—My opinion has been principally based on practical results.
- 11,000. I only wish to know whether there is any scientific basis, or whether they are just founded on theory?—It acts directly on the nerve centres.
- 11,001. That may be a valuable statement as expressing your opinion, but is it founded upon scientific principles?—I believe investigations went on for four years, and they are referred to in that same little pamphlet before alluded to. It might be advisable to get hold of it. The brothers Coykendall, in conjunction with a chemist, had been carrying on a series of investigations for four years before anything was done in a public way.
- 11,002. Is the remedy composed of any drugs which are known singly to affect those changes on the human tissues?—Yes.
- 11,003. And are there any scientific facts that we could read connected with them?—I am afraid I cannot give you a satisfactory answer to that question. I do not think I would be at liberty to mention the particular ingredients.
- 11,004. That would imply disclosure of the ingredients. We have been told that one of the ingredients is strychnia?—In some cases strychnia is very good.
- 11,005. But that destroys any scientific basis?—I have no doubt that Messrs Coykendall, in America, could be persuaded to divulge what knowledge they have for a monetary consideration.
- 11,006. Does it contain alcohol?—No, it does not.
- 11,007. In the tonic?—There is a small proportion of alcohol in some of the tonics, but in the remedies proper there is no alcohol.
- 11,008. You as a medical man have watched the effect of this treatment on patients. Does it produce an immediate effect or otherwise?—In some cases the effect appears to be immediate. In other cases they go on drinking, if they are inclined to drink at the outset for days, tapering off gradually.
- 11,009. Does it produce nausea or sickness?—When there has been very heavy drinking immediately before treatment, there is sometimes very much nausea or sickness; but when there has been moderate drinking, sometimes there is a slight degree, and sometimes none. With total abstinence from drink or periodical drinking there is no sickness.
- 11,010. Do you ever suspend the remedy after a time before completion of treatment?—In some cases.
- 11,011. Do you think the very fact of inserting an instrument into a patient and injecting something would have a certain effect on his moral nature?—It may have.
- 11,012. Then you don't exclude altogether the moral effect of the treatment?—Moral treatment is not an integral part of the 'metabolic treatment.'
- 11,013. Call it mental treatment, if you like that phrase better. I should think it is an important element in it, if there is anything in it at all?—Of course, moral suasion is decidedly necessary in some cases, plus physical treatment. Metabolic treatment alone is not sufficient in some cases.
- 11,014. (By Dr Sutherland.) Is there any poisonous substance among the ingredients?—Perfectly safe in competent hands.
- 11,015. (By Dr Farquharson.) Dr. Nairne was obliged to give up his connection with you by the General Medical Council. Your people in America are not so particular on these points then. You are a qualified medical man?—Every State in America has its own regulations. My degree is American.
- 11,016. Have they no discipline for their graduates on that point?—The members of the profession are not disciplined, as they are in Great Britain by its Medical Council.
- 11,017. Did you get your degree by examination?—Yes, after a course of training. I had a course of medical training here of four years before that.
- 11,018. Are you an American by birth?—No, I was born in Glasgow.
- 11,019. Was it not rather unpatriotic of you to go to America to get your degree?—I left Scotland to better my circumstances.
- 11,020. And you then took the opportunity of taking your degree?—Yes.
- 11,021. Quite so. I think you said you were quite satisfied in regard to the habits of those people on this list of yours that they were really bad cases?—Ample evidence had been afforded.
- 11,021a. How long after the beginning of the treatment did these various persons sign the certificate?—After the close of the treatment.
- 11,022. After the treatment had thoroughly cured them, how long was that?—In no case has that certificate or document been signed until after the close of the treatment, sometimes not for months after.
- 11,023. You mean at the end of the course of treatment which lasts?—For three weeks or twenty-one days.
- 11,024. But do not you think it is rash to say they are cured after three weeks?—A fresh start appears to be given.
- 11,025. Do you not think it is rash to say after two months that they are cured of inebriety?—If placed on a safe platform, it rests with them to remain there.
- 11,026. You are not prepared to go beyond the point it has reached?—No.
- 11,027. (By Dr Sutherland.) Where there have been the remarkable changes you speak of in a general way produced in the tissues, would you not have expected something like a lasting benefit?—With total abstinence after treatment we have not been able to find that there has been the slightest recurrence of the drink craving.
- 11,028. Do you mean to say that structural changes produced by drinking have been rectified by a couple of months of abstinence?—I make no statement concerning two months. But I only said that some of the people signed a declaration two months after treatment, but there are a number of people who have for twelve months or eighteen months been abstainers, and before time of treatment they had been continually or periodically drinkers. [The witness then withdrew.]

Mr. Andrew Wallace.

Mr. Andrew Wallace.

19 Dec. 1894.

19 Dec. 1894.

Mr. ANDREW WALLACE, Inspector of Poor for Govan Parish, called in and examined.

11,029. (By the Chairman.) You have been an Inspector of Poor in Scotland for the last twenty-eight years, and you have been Inspector to Govan Combination Parochial Board for the last twenty-two and a half years?—Yes.

11,030. You think pauperism is not increasing?—The pauperism of the Govan parish, as well as of Scotland generally, has not increased during the last twenty years in proportion to the increase of the population, but has considerably decreased.

11,031. Then, as regards lunatics?—There has been a very large increase in the number of the lunatic poor.

11,031A. Would you please state the total number of paupers in Scotland in 1893, and their ratio to the population?—92,004, or in the ratio of 23 per 1000.

11,032. And that shows a decrease of 8 per 1000 as contrasted with?—1874.

11,033. Will you give the ratio of the Govan parish?—6003 in 1893, including dependents.

11,034. The proportion?—In the proportion of 21 per 1000.

11,035. That is considerably under the national percentage?—2 per 1000.

11,036. You attribute the decrease to the strict administration of the Poor Law, and to the growth of charities, which relieve you of much work which would otherwise fall on the parish?—Yes.

11,037. You mention Quarrier's Homes, and other institutions, as good for children, and the multiplication of infirmaries and hospitals relieving you of the care of a good number of such poor?—Yes.

11,038. Do you say a very large percentage of the lunacy is attributable to drunkenness?—About 40 per cent. That is a very moderate estimate I think of the pauper lunacy occasioned by drink.

11,039. That is directly, is it; now what do you consider the amount of the indirect pauper lunacy?—I should say nearly 10 per cent. is caused indirectly, but in order not to be outside of the mark, I have put the cases, direct and indirect, at 40 per cent.

11,040. And you are justified in your opinion by the ratio of female to male population.—Partly so.

11,041. You think the females drink more heavily?—No; but I think they are driven to it by the bad usage of drunken husbands.

11,042. And you put them down as indirectly?—Yes.

11,043. And they are more numerous than the males?—In the ratio of 60 to 52.

11,044. Briefly, are your ideas on that point that upwards of 40 per cent. of pauper lunacy is caused directly or indirectly from drinking, while no other cause is responsible for more than 15 per cent.? What is the next cause?—Hereditry.

11,045. Including direct and indirect cases, you think drinking causes?—I have put it at 40 per cent., but I might put it at 50 per cent., and I think I would be under the mark there too.

11,046. You have some statistics here as to the number of dependents who have been deserted by husbands and fathers, and their cost to the parish?—We have in the Govan poorhouse at present 33 deserted wives, with 44 dependent children—77 in all; and if you calculate the cost of their board and maintenance at 4s. per week, which is a moderate estimate, it gives us an annual outlay of £800.

11,047. That does not exhaust the cost?—On the outdoor roll we have 49 deserted wives, with 109 dependents, and, calculating their aliment at the rate of 2s. per week, it comes to £820 for the year.

11,048. And then there is the expense for the deserted children?—We have at present on our rolls 110 deserted children, who are either boarded in the country or with relatives, or remain in the poorhouse, and, stating the average cost of their maintenance at 4s. per week, it gives per annum £1200.

11,049. Does it cost you as much to keep a child as an adult?—When we board the children out we give 2s. 6d. to 3s. a week for them, and provide them with clothing and school-books.

11,050. Under these three items, which you consider are caused by misconduct, mainly intemperance, you have 334 persons chargeable to the parish at an annual charge of what?—£2820.

11,051. Besides this, you have got 100 children separated from their parents, in many instances because the latter are in prison?—Yes, and some in the infirmaries, and others in the asylum.

11,052. And you think that a third of these parents have been placed in this condition through drink?—Yes. That gives us 33 more paupers, at an annual cost of £350, making a grand total of 378 paupers, at an annual cost of £3170.

11,053. You have gone minutely into it, and calculated what was the cost incurred by your parish in respect of children and women thrown on your hands through their husbands or parents being imprisoned—will you please let us have that?—I have submitted a statement, of which I will now give you an abstract. The number of people who were chargeable to the parish during the previous five months up to this date, on account of their husbands and parents being in prison, I find was as follows:—There were 30 adults and 115 children—total 145, who have been chargeable to the parish for longer or shorter periods, and the cost up to this time is £102, 6s.; and as several of the cases are still chargeable, owing to some having got six months' imprisonment, I am sure that before they are off the roll it will be upwards of £200. These are mere casual cases of short terms of imprisonment. There are some cases where they get seven years, and so forth, and these will be on the roll till their parents come out of prison.

11,054. Your yearly estimate for supporting the dependents of these petty offenders amounts to?—£500 or £600.

11,055. And that does not include some expenses incurred on account of persons undergoing long sentences?—No.

11,056. Now, you applied your figures to Scotland?—To the whole parish, and then to Scotland, and my estimate is that we have 2436 people on the rolls, outdoor and indoor, in Govan parish on that basis, which is a moderate basis, who are brought to us, directly or indirectly, chiefly through intemperance. It is the great cause of pauperism; and, applying the same thing to Scotland, we have 36,800 paupers through the same cause, at a cost, roughly, of £350,000.

11,057. You think that the only way to deal with this great evil is to stop it at the fountain-head, and put down the drink traffic?—Yes.

11,058. Of course that is beyond our remit. As to corrective measures you recommend an amendment of the Habitual Drunkards Act. What is the extent of your amendment?—I think the Act should be made compulsory—that when a person has been proved to be a habitual drunkard he should not have it in his option to refuse to be placed under restraint. He should be compulsorily put under restraint. An amended Act should be passed giving powers to the sheriff, on the application of the Fiscal or the Inspector of Poor—where the dependents have become chargeable to the parish—or the nearest relative, and, after due enquiry, to order the offender to be confined in a retreat at his or her own expense, if in funds, or in prison, or in a workhouse, or other institution, where the offender would require to work for his or her maintenance.

11,059. You use the word workhouse. Is that synonymous with poorhouse?—No, our place is not a workhouse. I think the institution should be more under the police than under the parochial authorities.

11,060. You propose a fresh institution. At whose expense?—At the expense of the country.

11,061. You have shown that the present system entails much expense on the Parochial Boards.

- Mr. Andrew Wallace.*
19 Dec. 1894.
- Would you suggest that the parochial funds should pay for it?—I think it should be the police funds, because a lot of them are just now kept in prison.
- 11,062. We find that everyone wants some one else to find the funds?—I am dealing with the delinquents.
- 11,063. But have you not a lot of people who oscillate between the prison and the poorhouse?—Yes; and then when parents desert their children and allow them to become chargeable to the parish, they should not be allowed to claim them back again unless they pay the cost of their maintenance while so chargeable, and unless they can satisfy the Sheriff that they are suitable persons to take charge of these children.
- 11,063A. But is not that the law now?—It is the law as between two parents, but I do not know that it is the law to Parochial Boards.
- 11,064. (By Miss Stevenson.) Under the Custody of Children Act, the Parochial Board, I believe, can keep the child if the parent can be proved to be an improper guardian?—Not in Scotland.
- 11,065. By the Act of 1891 or 1892, was there not that power given?—I know there was an Act, but I do not know that it gives that power.
- 11,066. Do you think you should have that power?—Yes, but I think the Board should also have power to dispense with these conditions if they are satisfied that the parents have merely been temporarily misconducting themselves, and would be quite suitable for guardians afterwards.
- 11,067. (By the Chairman.) You do not advocate long sentences for petty offenders?—No.
- 11,068. But in cases when they require to be protected from drink, you think that they should be confined and employed?—Yes, and made to be as remunerative as possible by placing the men on small farm colonies, which might be formed in various parts of the country, and made to work at reclaiming the land.
- 11,069. What would you do with women?—Women might be employed in useful work.
- 11,070. Washing, we know, and millinery, sewing, knitting, and so on. Have you any other suggestion for getting work for women?—We make them make all the female clothing in the poorhouse, and they wash the clothes.
- 11,071–2. But everywhere women are set to washing. But if you had colonies you would have to get something else for women to do?—I think women could be trained to do a great many more things than men.
- 11,073–5. Suppose you were installed as manager of a female colony—put aside the washing and the sewing, and the knitting, and the cooking, and the making of their own clothes—what else would you suggest to make it self-supporting?—In the Smyllum Institution at Lanark, I have seen women, trained by ladies do fancy carving work, and make inkstands and ornaments of various kinds.
- 11,076–8. You are, I see, very strongly in favour of substituting the lash for imprisonment?—Yes; I think where a person has been very frequently imprisoned, nothing but the lash will do for him.
- 11,079–80. And you think that the public-house regulations should be more strictly carried out?—Yes; much more strictly enforced than at present.
- 11,081–2. And you are in favour of earlier closing?—Yes.
- 11,083. (By Col. M'Hardy.) What would you do with people who were not able-bodied?—People who are not able-bodied would become chargeable to the parish.
- 11,084–5. I see you have about 60 or 70 committed to the poorhouse or prison, and they would be treated in the same way?—Yes; we would keep them. [The witness then withdrew.]

[ADJOURNED.]

TWENTY-SECOND DAY.

Glasgow, Thursday, 20th December 1894.

PRESENT :—

SIR CHARLES CAMERON, BART., M.P. (Chairman.)
COL. A. B. M'HARDY, R.E.
Dr FARQUHARSON, M.P.

Professor DOVE WILSON.
Dr J. F. SUTHERLAND.
Miss F. C. STEVENSON.

ALEXANDER NAIRNE, L.R.C.P. & S., Glasgow, called in and examined.

- Dr. Alexander Nairne.*
20 Dec. 1894.
- 11,086. (By the Chairman.) I understand that you were associated with Dr Currie who gave evidence here in connection with what is termed the 'metabolic' treatment of drunkenness?—Yes.
- 11,087. And that you severed your connection with Dr. Currie under circumstances which I should be obliged if you would state to the Committee?—I was ordered by the General Medical Council to appear before them on a charge of infamous conduct, in a professional respect, by associating with Dr Currie in this treatment for inebriety.
- 11,088. And when you came before the General Medical Council, I understand you made some statement regarding the treatment?—Yes. I said that what I had seen of the treatment was good, as far as it went.
- 11,089. What did you see of the treatment?—I saw that it was perhaps one of the best remedies for the thing that I have known for picking up a fellow after a spree. I was only associated for perhaps about five months altogether, but I saw two or three men on the borders of delirium tremens, and in a week after having been seen, or almost four or five days, they were well.
- 11,090. Would you please explain to the Committee in what the treatment consists? Of course we understand the nature of the application is a secret, but you might explain the way in which it is administered?—I do not know what the thing is that is used. To me it appeared, I suppose, a compound of strychnia, morphia, and cocaine. I should think it was that from the effects. Of course it is administered four times a day.
- 11,091. And some was taken by the mouth?—A simple tonic.
- 11,092. And this treatment is kept up for 21 days?—Yes.
- 11,093. According to Dr Currie, there is no charge made for drugs, but a charge for the course of treatment; is that so?—I presume that includes drugs.
- 11,094. You do not know anything about the present financial arrangements. Did you leave your association with Dr Currie and the treatment solely through the attitude of the General Medical Council?—My own college first, and, if it had not been for that, I would have gone on, because I thought the institution was doing good.

11,095. The institution does not appear to have treated very many. (Dr Sutherland.) 50 paying and 57 non-paying.

11,096. What is the principle of the treatment?—It is not well-known. Of course this is not a cure. It is only a remedy for the results of intemperance.

11,097. And it does not profess to create a disgust at stimulants?—No, I do not think it does. My experience was that in a few months a man was just as he was before.

11,098. But during treatment?—It does produce antipathy to drink after a day or two.

11,099. And has that ever been tested in the case of a man who is not an habitual drunkard but a moderate drinker?—Yes, and it has temporarily produced a disgust.

11,100. But, suppose a man were to take a little strychnia, with morphia and cocaine, would you as a medical man expect that that would create an antipathy on the part of the moderate drinker, a person who is not in the habit of having wine, beer, or whisky?—If I administered it four times a day, and used an emetic.

11,101. Is there an emetic in that?—It is not a single drug; it is a compound. My impression is when a man is very bad and inclined to drink they administer an emetic for that.

11,102. (By Dr Farquharson.) You were told the composition?—No.

11,103. Does Dr Currie know the composition?—Yes. He says he has improved on it.

11,104. Do you accept the theory produced by Dr Currie that this remedy makes some physical change in the composition of the tissues?—It must do so; it is an alternative.

11,105. Do alteratives change the tissues of the body? Is that the reading you have of the word 'metabolic,' as applied to the cure?—Change.

11,106. What do you say is the meaning of the term 'metabolic'?—Change and nothing else.

11,107. But is this change—is this theory of the action of this remedy purely speculative or founded upon any scientific basis of fact?—I do not know. I only know what I have seen.

11,108. But, as a medical man of training have you formed no theory yourself as to the way in which this so-called cure acts on the human constitution?—Simply as an alternative.

11,109. Of course that is a recognised medical phrase, but a rather vague one, as we know?—Yes.

11,110. Would you consider the whole effect of the drug was physical, or is a mental impression made on the patient?—Entirely physical. My opinion is simply that there is a certain psychological influence in the personal administration of all medicines.

11,111. Nothing in what is called sensation or expectation?—There is something in the treatment you see of a patient four times a day; and it has a powerful effect.

11,112. Would you expect the same result from treatment by ordinary drugs?—Yes, if you saw and treated the patient four times a day.

11,113. Would you be confident of permanent cure or temporary cure?—Only temporary. It will give a man a new start; it will make him better in a few days, and he will be right in his mind and dependent upon his own mental stability.

11,114. But you do not think by these means you can give a man permanent advantage?—No.

11,115. (By Dr Sutherland.) This secret medicine you say is an alternative medicine?—Yes.

11,116. That is to say, it corrects the morbid condition of the organs resulting from inebriety, and eliminates the alcoholic poison from the system?—Yes, I think it does.

Dr. Alexander Nairne.
20 Dec. 1894.
11,117. Do you know of any alternative in the pharmacopœias of Britain or America which brings back to their normal state say, the cirrhotic liver of a drunkard in which the liver cells are supplanted by an adventitious fibrous tissue?—Blue-pill, for example, is said to do so.

11,118. Changes the fibrous tissue formed in the liver, and restores the hepatic cells which have been destroyed?—So it is said.

11,119. Can you give us a scientific reference to verify that, or could you tell the Committee of any other therapeutic agent which has the effect of removing pathological products formed in the viscera at the expense of the normal tissues?—Anti-toxin.

11,120. Anti-toxin, as you may be aware, is given to counteract the effect of the specific poison of diphtheria?—It is said to remove a diphtheritic patch.

11,121. But that patch is merely an outward manifestation on the throat—of the specific bacillus poison in the blood?—I suppose that is an alternative if it does so. It is a complete alternative of the blood.

11,122. It is merely a new and foreign constituent of the blood which this anti-toxin counteracts. Do you think there is any analogy whatever between the anti-toxin treatment of diphtheria, and any therapeutic remedy given, it is claimed, to remove the new tissue formed in the liver, kidneys, and brains of drunkards at the expense of the normal cells?—Not with our present knowledge.

11,123. Suppose I got this medicine, and experimented on half a dozen notorious drunkards, and gave them the medicine as I give medicine to any other patient, would you expect the same result as you get. Please understand the patient would not know that the nature of the medicine he was taking was this so-called drink cure?—No. It is my impression that the knowledge has something to do with it.

11,124. Have you yourself applied the remedies?—No.

11,125. You have never been allowed to apply them?—No.

11,126. You are aware that tartar emetic has been so far successful in creating a disgust for alcohol, and long before ever American doctors came across to this country?—Yes.

11,127. You informed the Chairman that you knew of many cases where a person had been drinking, and appeared very shaky and in bad condition, and that after four or five days' treatment he got well?—That is correct. That is within my own experience.

11,128. But, from the system of treatment usually followed in this country in such cures, the same results are got in the same time?—Oh no. A very bad case of alcoholism you will not have well in a fortnight or three weeks.

11,129. But cases of delirium tremens in Gartnavel or in the home, after five or six days' treatment, get better?—But these were men who were almost insane. I remember one man could not answer a straightforward question.

11,130. What does that indicate?—That he is untruthful. It shows the condition of his mind, that he would go round instead of straightforwardly.

11,131. So that there would be no use my giving it in the guise of an ordinary tonic, to get good out of?—Yes. It would test the value of it as a drug.

11,132. But you informed us that if it was to do much good it would be necessary to know this cure was being taken?—Because it enhances its value.

11,133. So that there is something in the suggestion that he is getting this special remedy?—In all medicines it is the case.

11,134. By no means. As a medical man, do you think any pronouncement as to the efficacy of a drug is of the least value where, first of all, the nature of the medicine is not known, where the physiological effects are not stated, where the pathological condition calling for treatment, and where the results of the treatment are not given on scientific lines?—It is of actual value: that I have seen; that I know.

11,135. But if it has got an actual value, why cannot its effect, like, say those of blue pill, be expressed on scientific lines? You have given certain pathological conditions which can be expressed, and you have given certain remedies, and if with the treatment you are able to show beneficial results, why cannot the accurate scientific facts be stated?—Because the inventor chooses to keep it a secret. He will not sell it.

Dr. Alexander Nairne.
 20 Dec. 1894.

11,136. But, allow if you like, the inventor to keep the medicine a secret, is there any reason whatever why he should not state the pathological conditions he finds, and the changes effected by the medicine in the tissues of the body as revealed by physical signs, &c.? —There is no reason why he should not.

11,137. But you know quite well that is not done? —No.

11,138. It is only expressed in the ordinary everyday language that So-and-so has been cured?—Yes.

11,139. Do you know of any other medicine prescribed by any medical man in this or any other country, where it is necessary to know the nature of the remedy a person is taking to produce a change in the tissues?—In some cases it is necessary they should know; in some it is not.

11,140. Can you tell me any single remedy in the British Pharmacopoeia in which it is necessary to know the nature of the medicine the patient is taking, in order that that medicine may produce certain changes in the physical condition of the body?—A purgative, for example.

11,141. To know the effect of the medicine?—If you tell a man he is taking magnesia it will have a purgative effect.

11,142. Not necessarily. If he gets a purgative does it will purge him, whether he knows or not what it is?—It may not.

11,143. Then, obviously it is not a purgative if it does not produce a purgative effect? It isn't a purgative to that individual?—[No reply.]

11,144. Allow me to give you the instance of a dilated heart. You know the effect of digitalis on such a heart; is it necessary for the patient to know that he is getting digitalis to remedy his condition?—It is wiser, but not necessary.

11,145. Supposing you had two people who had dilated hearts—one a medical man who knows he is getting digitalis, and the other an ill-informed man, and both take the same remedy, the one knowing what he is taking and the other not, is not the result the same in both cases?—No. It is not the same.

11,146. That is to say, digitalis as a therapeutic remedy requires the knowledge of the individual swallowing it to produce its effect?—It has some greater effect on the patient who knows he is taking it for that purpose.

11,147. The same would, I suppose, hold good of a poisonous dose of morphia. Can you refer us to a single scientific reference in this country that would bear out that view that you have given to the Committee now?—I could not at the moment.

11,148. (By the Chairman.) Have you any knowledge of any of the other remedies for the treatment of inebriety?—No, except the ordinary medical treatment—bromide, and so forth.

11,149. I mean any of the secret remedies, the Tyson cure, &c.?—No. This is the only one I had anything to do with.

11,150. I understood you had made some statement to the British Medical Council about the 'metabolic' cure?—That was the only statement I had made—that I had seen the good of it.

11,151. At what date did you make that statement? —June of this year, of 1894.

11,152. About what time, in what month?—It was the beginning of June. [The witness then withdrew.]

Mr. John Lawson.

MR. JOHN LAWSON, Superintendent of Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society, called in and examined.

Mr. John Lawson.

11,153. (By the Chairman.) You are Superintendent of the Glasgow Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society?—Yes.

11,154. You come personally into contact with each prisoner?—Yes.

11,155. How many prisoners did you deal with in the course of last year?—In the year 1893 there were advised to us from Barlinnie 11,317 male prisoners, and of these 6855 came to us.

11,156. Have you the figures for this year?—In 1894 we have had for the ten months, that is up to the end of October, advised to us 9473, of whom 5453 came to us and had breakfast, that is to say, we received the latter number into our rooms.

11,157. You talk of advised; do they advise you of all prisoners to be discharged?—Yes, every day.

11,158. But they do not all come to you?—No. We prepare to give them all their breakfast, but a number have their wives waiting for them and other friends, and they do not come to us. Only about two-thirds come to us.

11,159. Then would you please tell us what you do?—We receive the prisoners. Two men go to the prison gate, where they are discharged. The men are brought in from Barlinnie and are discharged within the quadrangle of Duke Street Prison.

11,160. But, before we go further, you have a woman from Duke Street who takes charge of the females. These figures deal only with the men?—Yes. I can only speak definitely about the men. Mrs. Elder takes charge of the women.

11,161. But you have the same machinery?—Yes.

11,162. Doesn't the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society do that?—Yes, but the females are under the charge of a lady.

11,163. Have you her statistics?—I have not.

11,164. Then explain to us what you do?—The prisoners go to Duke Street, and I send up two men, and each prisoner is offered a ticket with a different colour for each day, so that a man cannot come the next day for his breakfast. They come round with these tickets, and we can tell where a fellow has sold his ticket by the changes in the colour. The man who does this work is an old convict himself.

11,165. Setting a thief to catch a thief is your policy; is he a good man?—A first-rate man. He has been five years with us.

11,166. When do the prisoners come out?—Between 8.30 and 9.15.

11,167. Do you think it would be any improvement to let them out before the public-houses are open?—I may say when I began to insist that men who smelt of liquor should not get their breakfast, it had a wonderful effect, and I find now that not a man comes to us with the smell of drink upon him.

11,168. Then you think they would rather have their breakfast than the drink? That holds good at least with 6855 out of 11,317?—That is so.

11,169. Do you think it would be an improvement if they were landed at a time when the public-houses were not open to receive them, for instance at seven o'clock, an hour before the public-houses are open?—I do not think it would do any good. I think those who do not come to us are taken away by their friends, rather than go into the public-house.

11,170. Then you do not think that many of them are met by dissolute friends who take them to the nearest public-house?—Some of them, but not many. There are a number of decent men who get into prison, and who are met by their friends and at once taken away with them.

11,171. Taking your 6855 or 5453 of this year, what did you do with them?—First of all there were in 1894 this year 4642 drunks, that is to say, men who had from 3 to 30 days in prison.

11,172. But these do not all come to you?—Yes, I am giving you the numbers up to October 1894.

11,173. And of these 4642 were drunks?—Drunks—men who were under short sentences, who were either in prison for simple drunkenness or assaults. I have 927 or 75 per cent. of those who came to us in 1894, who were in for being drunk, and 9½ per cent. were for theft.

Mr. John
Larson.

11,174. Well, now about the drunks, what further proceedings do you take?—I see each man and speak to him, and learn his history as far as I can. Then, before I arrange to get him work, if he has a wife I send for her. I find, after a good deal of experience, that it is a good thing to see the wives, because I find it is not much good unless you get a man's wife to back you up: or, if he has a daughter, that is, if he is a widower, the same thing may hold good; or a father or mother if he is a young man. I do the best I can to turn them inside out, and see if it is safe to recommend them, and either I or my assistant places the man in work.

11,175. What sort of work?—All kinds, but it is mostly labouring work.

11,176. Doesn't a serious offence affect a man when he goes to work?—That was the case at first, but it doesn't do so now.

11,177. I want to differentiate between prisoners. Employers won't trouble much about a man who has simply got a few days for drunkenness or for a drunken assault, but do they not hesitate about a thief?—We proceed this way. I go myself first. I know many Glasgow employers of labour well, and I arrange with the employer to give work to our men. They refer us invariably to their foremen, and I think that is the best part of it. We have got these foremen to take us up most thoroughly. Generally, foremen have been workmen themselves, and have risen from the ranks, and in some cases are better than the employers. They are sorry for these men, and they have helped us marvellously. We have done good to these foremen by giving them an interest in the men.

11,178. Do you find many of the drunks coming back to you?—If a man has disappointed us twice after giving him work, unless there are very strong reasons to the contrary, we do not give him work again.

11,179. Take a man who has been in for being drunk three times, who probably will have lost his situation, and who has threatened to become a regular habitual—that is the class we are particularly interested in; you can do nothing for him? You must keep up your character?—We would spoil our influence if we sent these men. We would lose our own character.

11,180. Then, practically, for these habituals, your Society does not exist? It does not deal with them?—No, but there are a great many of that class you know who are five or six times in prison, and—

11,181. There are many people who are five or six times in prison in the course of three or four or five or six years?—In one year.

11,182. Yes, I know that, but would you refuse work to a man who had been in prison five or six times in as many years?—No.

11,183. It is a fellow who is several times in prison in one year that you refuse?—Yes, twice or three times a year.

11,184. What do you do with the 9½ per cent. of thieves?—We have a good deal more talk with them when they come out, because they generally have been 6 months, or 12 months, or 18 months or more, and their gratuities are given to me. They are entitled, if they behave themselves, to a shilling a month when in prison, and that is sent to me if the sum exceeds four shillings; and I pay as much as a couple of pounds or so to some of them.

11,185. You are entitled to retain a considerable portion of it at your discretion?—I invariably give them a small portion at a time, and that gives me a hold over them, because, if they do not work, they do not get their gratuity when they wish it.

11,186. But, apart from the gratuity, where or how do you get them placed in work?—In various ways,—foundries, locomotive shops, ship-building yards, and as masons' labourers.

11,187. As labourers?—They are mostly all labourers.

11,188. But do not you find a strong prejudice on the part of employers and of foremen against men who have been in for theft?—Well, we do not just tell the whole story. We do not enumerate the thefts. We judge of the man by our examination of him.

11,189. You are notoriously connected with this institution. The first thing a foreman will ask you is 'What was this man in prison for?'—He does not do that.

11,190. But, if it has only been for drink, you tell him, don't you, and, if you do not, he will take it for something worse?—They are not so particular as that. We are so well-known that when we offer a man they take him.

11,191. Do you find many of them coming back?—Not many. They do not come back. They may go wrong, but they do not come back to us. Up to 1894 for that year, we placed in work 410 men for the ten months.

11,192. Of all classes?—Yes; and we have provided with clothes to enable them to enter upon their work, 403.

11,193. You say, to enable them to enter upon their work, but it doesn't follow they got work?—We have actually placed in work 403 who are provided with clothes. They get perhaps a shirt, or a pair of boots, or some other article. Then, of those, 29 only turned out unsatisfactorily.

11,194. Out of 813?—Yes, and in addition to that, we had 60 convicts in 1893, of whom 55 were placed, and 5 were bad. That is all. We can be sure of that.

11,195. Because they have to report under ticket-of-leave?—Yes. We have far more satisfaction in dealing with convicts than the others.

11,196. You have a bigger gratuity, and they are under ticket-of-leave?—Not so much as that they are soured by the long imprisonment, and anxious at the first blush to lead a better life, and if a man has got £4 or £5 to get, he will call upon us four or five or more times.

11,197. Their tickets-of-leave will extend over a period of 15 months; during that 15 months you know about them, and you mean that only 5 out of 60 went bad out of that number?—Yes.

11,198. You have accounted for 463 out of 5500. That leaves roughly about 5000 who came to you to breakfast, whom you have not accounted for?—In 1893 there were 6800 altogether.

11,199. What are these last figures?—For 1893.

11,200. And the 410?—For 1894.

11,201. We will take the 410 and 403 that you have found work and clothes for respectively; that makes 813, and I suppose you would have about 60 convicts besides?—No. For the 10 months of 1894 we had 72 convicts, and of these we have, up till now, placed 58 in work and 12 of them have turned out bad.

11,202. That is a much bigger percentage than last year?—Yes.

11,203. You have disposed this year of 885—or, say 900,—out of 5453 who came to you for breakfast; that would leave, roughly speaking, 4500—that is deducting, say 900 from the 5400?—For 1894.

11,204. What do you do about them?—Nothing. They do not want anything. I do not suppose we have above four or five every morning who want work. A man is working on the underground railway, or some other job, where he gets his pay every day, and has just been on the booze since Saturday; and he gets his job when he goes back again.

11,205. He only wants to start with his breakfast?—Yes.

11,206. The Government gives you half the amount of your disbursements in respect to any prisoner up to the sum of £2, that is to say, the Government will not give you more than £2?—More than £1.

11,207. Would you state the maximum amount you can recover from the Government up to a given maximum? Would you please state the maximum contribution of the Government?—£1. If I expend £2 we get £1.

11,208. Then as to your other sources of revenue?—Subscriptions.

11,209. And, besides that you have the gratuities

Mr. John
Larson.

20 Dec. 1894.

Mr. John
Lawson.
20 Dec. 1894.

which are given to the prisoners?—Yes, but the gratuities, we only hand them away.

11,210. And you do not deduct off that any expenditure?—None whatever, because I get them back from the governor of the prison.

11,211. You do not debit them with any expenditure you may make. They do not contribute to your finances in the very least?—No.

11,212. About these breakfasts for the 5400, do you recover any part of that from the Government?—No, none. That is taken out of our own expenditure.

11,213. What amount requires to be made up by subscriptions?—About £600 a year.

11,214. We were told in Edinburgh that they endeavour to send away their prisoners as far as possible. They would send a man to London, or Inverness, or this place or that, if he was willing to go, and if there was any excuse for sending him; and that that was a charge, a proportion of which they could recover from the Government. Do you do much of that?—No. I prefer—unless a man has a letter from his friends saying there is work ready for him—not to send him away. There are lots of fellows say they can get work at Inverness or other places, but, unless we are pretty sure that the man does really want and will get work, we would not send him there.

11,215. Do you knock about among the prisoners afterwards, especially among the convicts?—Yes. I go and see them in their own houses.

11,216. But you will be rather well known to all the criminal classes, and doesn't your visit do a man's house injury, as it indicates that he has been through your hands?—I only know one case where a man has been four times in penal servitude, aggregating 35 years.

11,217. The convict complains that the police know him, and he says that his visits to the police office militate against his reception into the general bulk of the population, stigmatising him as a thief and as an improper character. Don't you find that your own visits—you being known as connected with the Prisoners' Aid Society—affect him and let out among his neighbours what he was?—No. I was going to instance that one case. It is down in St Margaret's Place. It is a man who was 35 years in penal servitude, and I go to see him. It was a sad case. I got his wife and him to become teetotalers, and I have called on them once every two months, and only in one instance during these last five years have I seen him drunk, and he is in the place where I put him in July 1889.

11,218. What sort of work can you get for the ex-convict?—This man is in a shipbuilding yard at labouring work. They are mostly all labourers.

11,219. But there are men convicts clerks or commission agents?—I cannot do anything for these.

11,220. You must turn them into labourers?—Oh no.

11,221. We have been told that they cannot do labouring work?—We can just speak as kindly as possible to them. I have got one or two of them into public works and into a friend's office, just to give them a chance.

11,222. Do they complain to you that the police supervision to which they are subjected renders it difficult for them to keep their places? Do convicts complain?—The supervision simply is the fact of calling on the first Monday of each month at the police office. I sent, at Col. McHardy's suggestion—he wanted us to take an interest in boys—I sent some 40 or 50 to Arran to do farming work, and I have been vexed there at the police going to visit them, as it has damaged them.

11,223. You speak of boys—juvenile prisoners?—Yes, and they turned out remarkably well.

11,224. They were friendless? You could deal with them as you liked?—Well, if they had a mother or father we saw them and got their consent to send them.

11,225. Well, with their consent, you could have sent them to Canada or to Mr Quarrier in the case of young ones?—Yes. However, these boys have turned out remarkably well.

11,236. When we were in visiting the prisons again and again we have been told, especially by prisoners, that when they came out they had always lots of people to give them drink; that even if they had no money they could get drink, and we found in police offices and in prisons people who had been discharged from the prison, say to-day, and were taken up for being drunk before the afternoon?—Yes, I believe that is the case.

11,227. Do you find many rough and dissolute looking characters waiting the arrival of the prison vans?—Oh yes.

11,228. Is there anything you can suggest dealing with them?—Well, they wait especially for those who are to get gratuities, because they want a share of it.

11,229. In those cases they do not come to you?—They do come, but I do not give them the whole of the gratuity.

11,230. All gratuities come to you?—Yes, above 4s., but there are a great many below.

11,231. Do they all come to you?—No, just those above that amount.

11,232. Then every man who has been in for over four months, and has gratuity comes to you; and what do you do?—I say to him that he should go and look for work, that he had better do for himself, that if he doesn't succeed I will give him a line, and, in the meantime, I will give him 1s. or 1s. 6d., and tell him to come back to-morrow. If he gets work I give him his gratuity.

11,233. Where will that fellow sleep?—Burns' Model Lodging-house is the great place for them.

11,234. And at the Model, as he will call it, he will find a lot of very questionable friends, and he will have temptation to resume his old habits?—No doubt of that.

11,235. Then he will go back to you for the rest of his money?—Yes.

11,236. What powers have you to withhold it?—I assume a good deal. I do not give the money if they come under the influence of drink.

11,237. But you are under certain rules as to giving out the gratuity?—No. It is left very much to myself by the Commissioners.

11,238. What is your usual rule? How long may you be before you pay out the 4s. gratuity?—Perhaps fully a week, in three payments.

11,239. Do many of the fellows come and demand their gratuity while in drink?—Yes, and not only so, but they come with their professed wife, because they know I insist on having their wives if they have a wife.

11,240. And they sometimes bring up a wife?—Yes, a woman who has no more to do with them than I.

11,241. And in Burns' Model Lodging-house they will be put up to your arrangements?—Yes.

11,242. But don't you think the congregation of such men, in places where they will meet men of their own kidney, is bad for them, and is likely to lead them into a relapse?—What are they to do.

11,243. The only question is whether you could not have some sort of place where you could get them secerated?—I have a dormitory, but it gives us an immense deal of trouble.

11,244. How?—Because they sometimes come in tipsy, and do not behave themselves, although we take the very best of them only in.

11,245. Do you work at all with these labour shelters of the Charity Organisation Society?—Yes. I am a member of the Council. It is not time yet to judge of its results.

11,246. They have just begun?—Yes, and it is only wood-chopping they have there; men do not like that, and they cannot make much at it.

11,247. We were told that they could earn up to 2s. or 2s. 6d. a day?—It is very doubtful, and, if so, it is after long practice. I have heard Mr Strang saying that to us. It is simply a test of the men to break sticks, and now their test is to break stones.

11,248. Well, lots of the convicts will be good hands at that?—I would not send a convict to break stones, unless he was a very bad fellow.

11,249. But a man who had been in the habit of breaking stones, say at Peterhead, every day, might earn a fair amount?—Yes. 2s. 6d. to 3s. 6d. breaking stones; but men are exceedingly averse to breaking stones. It is very hard work.

11,250. Do you find them fastidious in the employment they will accept?—Sometimes; not generally.

11,251. You say you have only a general knowledge about the women's work?—Women only come to me who have to get gratuities.

11,252. They have to come to you?—Yes, for the last six months. Up till that time they were paid by Mrs Elder, the lady who takes charge of receiving female prisoners from Duke Street. I know she was frightened, as they were coarse, wild women who would insist upon receiving the whole gratuity at once, and she had not nerve enough to refuse; and that was how I took over the work.

11,253. What do you do with them?—They are more frightened of me.

11,254. You do not get work for them?—I send them out to the Shelter at Whitevale, but that class is so bad they do not mean to work. They are much worse than the men.

11,255. But what we have found is that many women who had been discharged prisoners go into places where they had got to work for a couple of years with no reward, except their outfit and food, and had never left?—That is in the Shelter. I only get the women who were for months in prison, and to whom gratuities are due.

11,256. And the women months in prison are worse than prostitutes do you think?—They are mostly prostitutes.

11,257. But their offences must have been worse than prostitution?—A great many of them are of that kind. A married woman came to me the other day who had been importuning with the consent of her husband.

11,258. She was imprisoned with the consent of her husband?—No. She was importuning with the consent of her husband, and she got into prison.

11,259. I suppose you have a number of cases of that sort?—No. I cannot say that. I only meet with the women who have to get gratuities.

11,260. But the highest importuning sentence is 30 days?—This woman got a note to me from the chaplain, Mr Alexander, and he asked me to give her some help.

11,261. And what did you do?—I gave her an order for 1s. 6d. for provisions, and then I gave her a second order for the same, because her husband and she were in absolute need. I did not give her money.

11,262. You have done nothing, however, to try and get work for her?—I do not get work for the women.

11,263. Do you think the organisation for assisting the women is anything like so good as that for assisting the men in Glasgow? I mean the Charitable Organisation?—I cannot say that.

11,264. Is anything done for women convicts?—I get women convicts from Perth. They are all sent to me who have to get gratuities above 4s. They generally have pounds to get.

11,265. Notwithstanding the hopeful results of your working with male convicts, you do not try to do anything for the females, beyond dealing out their gratuities?—A man cannot get female work very easily.

11,266. Do you know what Mrs. Elder does?—She takes them to the various institutions or the Shelter.

11,267. You spoke of sending a man to the Charity Organisation only as a test, and the analogy of that in dealing with females is to send them to a Shelter?—Well, it is not a test sending them to a Shelter, because they are to be there for two years and get their living.

11,268. If they choose to leave before the couple of years they get nothing?—Oh yes, their outfit at the end of the time, but nothing before. They earn something also.

11,269. With which the expense of their outfit is charged?—I cannot speak about that.

11,270. Do you know anything about the working of Prisoners' Aid Societies in other places?—No, I do not.

11,271. We have found that in many places an objection exists to this Government action of receiving the gratuities of prisoners, and of the Government control; at all events in respect to a certain portion of the operations of the Society which it involves. Can you tell us what the objection can be? Have you found any drawback in any way with the Government system of assisting prisoners?—I have always got what I laid out without any difficulty or trouble.

11,272. And you do not understand why a system which works very well with you should not work well in Perth, Greenock, or Edinburgh?—I do not see there should be any difficulty.

11,273. (By Miss Stevenson.) You said there was greater difficulty apparently in finding work for the women than for the men. Is that due to the character of the women?—I do not profess to get work for women.

11,274. You do not know about the women?—No.

11,275. Do you find that those men for whom you find work come to you repeatedly when they come out of prison; or have you any limit to the number of times you have a discharged prisoner?—If he disappoints me twice, or perhaps three times, we won't, for our own sakes, send him into work again, because we lose our influence if we send inefficient men into work. The employers just say you sent us so-and-so, and we cannot take any more of them.

11,276. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Although you have been in more immediate charge of the male department of the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society, you are aware that a good deal has been done by the chaplain and various other persons in helping females?—I have no doubt of that.

11,277. Tell me an instance in which it has been so?—You know the chaplain of Duke Street as well as the chaplain of Barlinnie send me the recommendation. It is at their instance.

11,278. In the event of your receiving a recommendation from the chaplain or ladies in charge of the female side of the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society for funds to send a girl to her home in the country, I suppose you would give her funds?—Well, I would inquire particularly into it before doing so.

11,279. And if you found the conditions satisfactory you would be ready, I presume, to do so?—Yes.

11,280. You said you had difficulty in managing the Home that you have at present, where there is accommodation for some dozen prisoners; but are you not now working out a scheme for starting a Home of that very kind?—Yes.

11,281. Which you intend to build somewhere near the prison?—Opposite the Royal Infirmary, the last site on the north-east side of the Square.

11,282. You propose to have accommodation for how many persons?—25.

11,283. And who do you intend these persons shall be?—We select those we think the best,—bachelors, of course. We need not take married men, but bachelors or widowers or men who have no home of their own.

11,284. And you keep them when they find work?—We keep them until they are in work, and they remain with us for six months. We have some men now with us for four months, but we like to get rid of them to make room for others.

11,285. In regard to your powers over the gratuity which is handed to you for disbursement to the best advantage for the prisoner, you have been instructed that it is to be given entirely according to your own judgment, and that in your own opinion it is not for the interest of the prisoner that it should be sent at all; that it is simply to be returned to the prison?—Yes, but I have only had two cases of that kind during all my work, and these took place last month.

11,286. (By the Chairman.) Take these 12 convicts who went back out of 72 in last year; did they get all their gratuities before they went to the bad?—Yes.

Mr. John
Lawson.

Mr. John
Lawson.

20 Dec. 1894.

11,287. (By Col. M'Hardy.) The figures which you gave in regard to convicts were very hopeful, but the general statistics hardly support such a strong effect of reformation. It would appear from the statistics that a very considerable number of men on licence break down?—I do not get all the men who are out, because they get gratuities from the Governor at Peterhead himself.

11,288. Not if they are coming to Glasgow?—Yes, they sometimes wish to get it.

11,289. But I do not think they do get it?—Latterly it has been refused.

11,290. At any rate for months you have had every gratuity that came?—Yes.

11,291. But I think there is general consent in Glasgow that for the last two or three years there has been an immense improvement in the working of the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society, and that the results have been extremely successful so far as such a Society can expect its results to be successful?—I should say so, certainly. I do not know what was done with these men before at all.

11,292. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Do many persons apply to you who are not able to get work?—Not many. One came this morning whom I sent to the poorhouse.

11,293. Are you able to do anything for people in the way of getting them light work?—We must just give them the work we can find; there is no such thing as light work.

11,294. Have you many boys applying to you?—Not a great many. We sent, as I have said, 40 boys last year to Arran, but there were far more than that came out.

11,295. What is the youngest, can you remember, Mr. John Lawson, that you have ever had applying to you?—I have seen a boy come at 12 or 13 years of age; that is the youngest.

11,296. Have you many cases like that?—Very few; 16 is about the youngest.

11,297. Then, what can you do for a boy of 12 or 13? Can you do anything?—He is too young to go anywhere. I send for his parents, if he has a father, or I try to get him into Mr Quarrier's in other cases.

11,298. (By Dr Farquharson.) I think you have told us that a considerable number of prisoners are desirous of getting some honest occupation?—Some are really anxious.

11,299. And you do not find much difficulty on the part of employers in taking them?—No.

11,300. Nor on the part of workmen?—Working men are not particular. They do not inquire much. We have never found a single case where a foreman told that a man was a convict.

11,301. But, suppose the foreman told the workmen do you think they would object?—I cannot remember any case of that kind.

11,302. But do not the workmen always want, like schoolboys, to find all about them? Don't they ask them questions as to where they come from?—We cannot say. There have been no difficulties from that source.

11,303. Have there been any difficulties from the outside—honest men who cannot get work, thinking it rather hard that you should give work to these other men?—That is often said to us. I simply say I cannot help it. I am here to get work for discharged prisoners. [The witness then withdrew.]

Mr. Donald
Sutherland.

MR. DONALD SUTHERLAND, Chief Constable of Paisley, called in and examined.

Mr. Donald
Sutherland.

11,304. (By the Chairman.) You are Chief Constable of Paisley?—I am.

11,305. How long have you occupied that position?—22 years, but, between the Poor Law and the Police, I have been in Paisley 37 years.

11,306. You were an officer in connection with the Parochial Board?—Yes, in the Abbey Parish, Paisley.

11,307. I find the number of your arrests per thousand for breaches of the peace, drunk and incapables and drunk and disorderlies is 21, and in Glasgow it is 60?—Yes.

11,308. Is that because the population of Paisley is so very superior?—There is no doubt of that. We boast of that. A better behaved community I do not think there is in Scotland.

11,309. What is the population?—It is about 70,000.

11,310. Do you think it is as good as Leith?—Much better, because Leith is a shipping port.

11,311. And you think it is markedly better?—There is 70,000 of a population, and we have not a man or woman living in Paisley who makes his or her livelihood by theft alone.

11,312. I suppose there are a good many people in Leith who follow that mode of life?—Yes.

11,313. And yet there are fewer arrests in Leith than in Paisley, in proportion to the population?—Is that so?

11,314. What do you think that is due to; a different system of administration?—I could not say the cause.

11,315. Do you attribute entirely the difference between the 21 per thousand in Paisley and 60 per thousand in Glasgow, to the difference of the population or of the systems adopted by the Chief Constables in each place?—The different character of the population. We know every person in Paisley; in Glasgow every person almost is a stranger to the other.

11,316. What do you do with drunks in Paisley?—Prior to the passing of this last Act of Parliament, our powers were limited. It was only five shillings or 24 hours then, and it was not worth while paying the fare of a man or woman to Glasgow, and a cab from the station to Duke Street, to get them washed and turned out next morning.

11,317. And so, what did you do?—Turned them out when they were sober, or, if we could get 5s. out of them, we took it.

11,318. You took all you could get? You did not try fining them?—It was no use.

11,319. You now have, I suppose, adopted the clause dealing with that matter from the Burghs Police (Scotland) Act?—Yes.

11,320. Which gives you power to impose a 40s. fine or 30 days' imprisonment?—Yes.

11,321. And which gives you, in the case of repeated offenders, power to send them 14 days to prison without any option?—We do that now in Paisley.

11,322. Have your magistrates ever availed themselves of the extra power of treating habitual offenders by giving them 14 days in addition, without the option of a fine?—They have given them 30 days since the passing of that Act.

11,323. The Act contains two clauses for drunkenness. The magistrate can impose a fine not exceeding 40s. or 30 days' imprisonment, but then, by a subsequent clause, in the case of a person who has been convicted, I think three times, for drunkenness within a given period, the magistrate can, in addition to this penalty I have mentioned, impose 14 days' imprisonment without any option?—We have never gone that far, but they have got 30 days.

11,324. What is the usual run of sentences on drunk and incapables in Paisley?—14s. or 10 days, I think, or thereabouts.

11,325. Do you mean to say that that is the usual thing? You say 14s. or 10 days for drunk and incapables?—Yes.

11,326. That is the biggest average penalty that we have yet come across. You are sure of your figure?—A good deal depends upon the character of the offender. If it is an habitual offender, as in the case of one woman whom I could mention, who received sentence of 30 days.

11,327. But the ordinary drunk and incapable, the decent, respectable, church-going drunk and incapable?

Mr. Donald Sutherland. —He will not come before the court at all. He forfeits his pledge.

11,328. What does he forfeit?—Perhaps 7s. 6d.

11,329. Well then, it would be much better to forfeit 7s. 6d. than pay a 14s. fine?—We do not take a man before the court if we can help it, because the man might be, and his family also, ruined, if it was found that he came before the police court. We study these things in Paisley.

11,330. You had last year 922 apprehensions in Paisley for drunkenness, drunk and incapable and disorderly conduct?—Yes.

11,331. What became of them can you tell us?—The majority of them would get out free. There is no doubt of that.

11,332. When did you adopt the Police Act, I mean the latest Act?—In 1892, when it was passed.

11,333. But Paisley was excluded from the Police Act of 1892?—Had you power to adopt clauses?—Paisley was not excluded; it was Greenock.

11,334. Then you came under its operation immediately it was passed? Therefore 1893 saw it in operation?—Yes.

11,335. And in 1893, when it was in operation, you arrested 922 drunks when you had these stringent powers to deal with them. A large number of them would get off on pledge, and what was your customary pledge?—5s. 6d. and 7s. 6d.

11,336. Then the customary sentence cannot be more than that, because you regulate your pledges by what is the probable sentence?—It depends upon what they have got in their possession.

11,337. But if a fellow has £1 in his possession?—I would make it 10s. It all depends upon circumstances.

11,338. Have you many men who have given pledges going up for trial in the expectation of getting something of it back?—Yes, and some would rather go to jail than leave a pledge.

11,339. Then that, of course, argues short sentences?—Yes.

11,340. I think you must have misunderstood what I wanted? Who are the different magistrates?—They are a changing body every year.

11,341. But this year?—The senior magistrate is Bailie Robertson.

11,342. What is his usual sentence for a drunk and incapable?—It is very seldom a drunk is brought before him.

11,343. What did you do with the 922 you arrested last year?—The drunk and incapables in 1893 were 712 males and 210 females. There were convictions and admonitions and pledges for that lot last year, numbering 293 males and 15 females—308 in all.

11,344. What became of the other 624?—Turned adrift when they got sober. They were not worth taking before the court.

11,345. And there were no pledges in their case, no pledges to leave?—No.

11,346. I suppose that would include all the drunk and incapables, unless old offenders?—All without exception.

11,347. So that the only fellows who came up in this batch were the disorderlies?—Yes.

11,348. You are not able to tell how many of these 308 were cases of pledges forfeited?—Not separately. They were admonished by the magistrate and the pledges forfeited.

11,349. Your magistrates do not appear, in the case of incapables, to have done anything to avail themselves of the powers of the Burgh Police Act?—Those habitual ones that we know, it is no use talking to them—we bring them before the magistrate.

11,350. Even if they are only incapable?—Yes. Suppose they have not a farthing in the world and never had, we bring them up, just to show them we can put a stop to this sort of thing.

11,351. You have not got the number of convictions out of these 308 cases?—No.

11,352. You can only give us the figure for the three things, convicted, admonished, and pledges?—Yes.

11,353. You have told us you have known a sentence of 30 days?—Yes.

11,354. Was that for disorderly conduct?—Simply drunk and incapable, because she had been 10 times in this year. Her name was Sarah B——.

11,355. When did she get the 30 days?—I could not tell the date.

11,356. Has she been up since she got the sentence?—Yes. I have the particulars of a case here. Agnes M—— (37) is a companion of B——'s. During the current year she has been 15 times apprehended. On six of these occasions she was liberated when sober; on five occasions she was admonished by the magistrates; and for the remaining four times she was sent to prison for 130 days. During the past 17 years she has been 180 times apprehended, and, in the aggregate, was sent 2938 days to prison, or a yearly average of 173 days, or an average of 16 days for each time apprehended. This woman has made several attempts to reform, and on several occasions became an inmate of various institutions where she conducted herself well but no sooner did she return to town than she fell into her former courses. I have gone myself and got her into a public work, but it was no use. By Saturday night she was off again.

11,357. In her career in the prison was she under the régime where you could only inflict 5s. or 24 hours, so that, according to her sentences, she must have been in for some serious offence?—Breaches of the peace chiefly.

11,358. No theft or prostitution?—Just breaches of the peace and drunkenness.

11,359. All the previous imprisonments she has got before 1892 must have been breaches of the peace?—Nothing else. We would not send her to prison for simple drunkenness.

11,360. We find that in 1885, when you were under the old Act, you had only 796 arrests, whereas in 1893 you had 922. That would not seem to indicate that the greater power given to your magistrates had had no deterrent effect on drunkenness; that your magistrates practically did nothing when they had any power beyond 5s. or 24 hours, that they did not exercise it; that they do nothing in the case of drunkenness, unless accompanied by violence. There were fewer arrests made I find than there were in 1893 when they had very severe punishments?—We are going up in population, about 1000 a year in population.

11,361. But the increase in arrests seems to be greater than the population?—The population 24, and arrests 21 I find, over a certain period.

11,362. But have the increased powers had a deterrent effect? There should have been a diminution?—Of the people apprehended?

11,363. Of the people who incur the risk of coming before the magistrate?—Well, we do not bring a lot of these useless people before the magistrates at all.

11,363A. Then give me your opinion of the matter—whether the very much more plenary powers that are in use, that are in your hands since 1892,—whether that has had any effect in checking drunkenness and disorderly conduct? There were 1841 in 1891, and they had fallen 1467 in 1893?—A good deal depends upon the state of trade.

11,364. There was a very dull time in 1893?—Yes. That was sufficient to account for them. When money is plentiful the police have to work the harder.

11,365. We find authorities here and there wanting more powers to do this and that. In Paisley you have got more powers, and do you think the possession of these greater powers has decreased the number of drunkards who come into the policeman's hand?—I do not think so.

11,366. And, as a matter of fact, you have never exercised the special section of the 1892 Act which gives this extra power of imprisonment without the option of a fine in the case of third offenders within a given time?—Not as a rule.

11,367. But you never have had a case in Paisley, apart from this woman, who had been in prison for 2983 days?—This is the worst female we have had to deal with. She has got the most severe sentences.

Mr. Donald Sutherland.

20 Dec. 1894.

Mr. Donald
Sutherland.

20 Dec. 1894.

11,368. And that was 30 days?—Yes, 30 days. She got the maximum.

11,369. Have you much to do with beggars?—A good deal. We are so near Glasgow.

11,370. Do you ever deal with beggars as vagrants, or only as beggars?—We have some difficulty with them in this way. When a servant girl opens the door to a man, and the police know he is begging, the policeman will go to the door and ask the servant to come as a witness; but her mistress will not allow her, and we can do nothing.

11,371. What are your instructions to the men about the drunks? As you dismiss so many of them when they get sober your instructions to the men will be to assist them home, whenever they can do so, and not to take them up if they can help it?—Yes.

11,372. You appear to treat the drunks very leniently. Do you tell the constables if they see a man in the street under the influence of liquor to assist him to the street where he lives?—They will take him to the police office, because very often the wife will say 'We will have no peace in this house to-night; he is better with you.' If he is a respectable man the police direct him home, but a man who will not be quiet they won't take him home but to the police office.

11,373. When you find two men squabbling and fighting in the street, do they try to make it a charge, or do they simply stop it?—If they can stop it they do so, and send one man one way and the other another way.

11,374. And do they follow them?—Yes, so as to see that they are separated. We try to make as few cases as we can, because there is very often very little in such matters.

11,375. In other words, you administer your police force with the idea that you won't take a man to the police office unless there is some substantial reason for it?—Yes, that is the last resource.

11,376. That system would be made a very great difference upon if another Chief Constable came in and adopted another view even in Paisley, that is, if your successor adopted a contrary view, and ordered every drunk man to be taken up and every man who was using abusive language or squabbling, your arrests would rise very rapidly?—Yes.

11,377. Although the state of the population would still be the same?—Yes, that might be.

11,378. But, so far as your system goes, Paisley is a perfectly orderly town, and you think will compare very favourably with Glasgow or Govan or any of these other places?—Better than either of them.

11,379. When you get a beggar into court what is the sentence?—It is pretty severe. It is imprisonment only. I have seen them get as high as 30 days.

11,380. First offenders?—Yes; when they are masterful they are often very insolent.

11,381. But take the case of a man who is selling boot-laces and begging pennies, asking the people for pity's sake to give him something?—I would do nothing with him, if he did not make himself a nuisance.

11,382. Now, as to prostitution. Your offence, I suppose, is loitering and importuning, with the knowledge on the part of the police that the person is a prostitute?—We have only six or seven in Paisley. There is not a brothel in Paisley.

11,383. I see you have no arrests for prostitution?—No, none.

11,384. According to this, you have not had an arrest for prostitution in Paisley since 1875?—We have only six or seven, and they are either loitering about at the Sandkey or stairheads, or the police office. They go up to the police office and get shelter. I think there are only three of them out of prison just now.

11,385. But they do not appear to be arrested for prostitution? What have they been arrested for?—Just drunkenness.

11,386. And it is in this case they get the extra stiff sentences?—If the night is cold we allow them to be in the police office, and we often give them coffee and bread.

11,387. In most manufacturing towns, such as say Dundee, there appears to be a large amount of prostitution?—They are a far superior class in Paisley than in Dundee, where there are too many from the other side of the water.

11,388. Does this indicate a better state of morality in Paisley?—I say there is not another town except Paisley in Scotland which has no brothels.

11,389. We were talking about the arrests of prostitutes?—We have only six or seven of them.

11,390. They never interfere with any person?—No, never.

11,391. And your men have no instructions to run them in?—No, they do not require it.

11,392. How is it that women from Glasgow who get 30 days complain that the police know them and are always running them down. Do these women not trouble you?—The only time they come to Paisley is at the time of the races. There is no place in Paisley where they could get a night's lodging.

11,393. Do you ever take any action against publicans for supplying liquor to drunk men?—Yes.

11,394. How many cases last year?—I think there has been only one these last five years. The publicans in Paisley are very careful, because they have been reduced by 33 or 34, and the population has gone up from 47,000 to 70,000.

11,395. The Chief Constable of Greenock took it as a general rule that every drunk arrested after half-past 11 might be assumed to have finished his intoxication in a shebeen. He told us that he signed weekly 150 warrants, authorising his men to search shebeens, the warrants only holding good for a week. Have you anything of that kind?—We had two shebeening cases within the last fortnight.

11,396. Do you sign warrants?—Not in that way.

11,397. In Greenock they have a Local Act?—Yes.

11,398. And in Glasgow?—Yes.

11,399. It was explained to us that there was no warrant, and that shebeeners let them in, but that they had no power to open lockfast places?—When we are satisfied of the repute of the place, and that it is a shebeen where we will get a quantity of liquor above a gallon, or will find some people drinking there, a sergeant or an officer goes before a magistrate, states the information that he has got about the place, and on oath says that he believes it to be correct. The magistrate signs the warrant, and, armed with it, he can go at any hour of the day or night for the next two months and search that house.

11,400. Are you Procurator Fiscal of the Police Court?—No.

11,401. Perhaps you can tell us, in the case of drunkenness and petty offences, are previous convictions for offences charged or set forth in proof, or are they held back until the prisoner has been found guilty?—Before.

11,402. (By Professor Dove Wilson). In the case of habitual drunkards being brought up under section 381 of the Burgh Police Act, how does the magistrates come to know that they are habituals?—For instance the fiscal states that, and has the previous complaint there, but, as a rule, a drunk pleads guilty.

11,403. And you are speaking just now of section 381?—Yes.

11,404. (By Dr Sutherland). But, if they don't plead guilty, the previous convictions are libelled and stated before they are convicted?—Yes.

11,405. How many people have been apprehended for the first time in Paisley during the year?—186.

11,406. You have only 186 apprehended oftener than once, which means in Paisley that 90 per cent. are sufficiently deterred by one apprehension?—That is so.

11,407. (By Col. M'Hardy). You have very much fewer constables per 100 or per 1000 of your population than they have in Glasgow?—Just about half the number. In Glasgow they have 1 to 500, and in Paisley we have 1 to 1000 odds.

11,407A. It is 1016?—Yes.

11,408. The Inspector of Constabulary is not quite satisfied with the number of constables you have,

Mr. Donald
Sutherland.

20 Dec. 1894.

- Mr. Donald Sutherland.* though?—We increased the force last year, or the year before, by 2.
- 11,409. And is he quite satisfied now?—I expect so, but he comes to inspect us on the 15th of next month.
- 11,410. But, writing in March last, he has included Paisley in the list of places that should have more constables?—Yes.
- 11,411. But you are satisfied that you keep peace and order in the community with the number you have?—Yes, we bear favourable comparison with any town in Scotland.
- 11,412. If by any means you got your constabulary doubled as in Glasgow, what effect would that have on arrests, do you think?—There might be more arrests, but not for any serious crime.
- 11,413. Exactly, but for small offences you would expect the number to increase with the number of constables. That is the general rule in all police returns?—Yes.
- 11,414. Do you find that this lenient treatment which you give to the cases of drunkenness leads to any complaints by the people of the town to the effect that you deal too leniently with them, and that people who offend against statistics are let off without being punished?—Never heard any complaint to that effect.
- 11,415. You don't think that this lenient treatment does in any way lead to an increase in the number of cases?—No.
- 11,416. (By Miss Stevenson.) Do you consider the general respectability and good behaviour of the Paisley people is due to the fact that it is very largely an artisan population, and, as a rule, have good employment with good remuneration?—Yes; and for a number of years it was a weaving population, and they were more intelligent than most workmen, and that has done good to the town.
- 11,417. And for the same reason you can account for the absence of that unfortunate class that goes so largely to swell the police returns from other places. Mill girls as a body are respectable, and are able to maintain themselves comfortably by their work?—Yes, and their parents are respectable as well. They make good wages, from 12s. to £1 per week in these mills, and in each of the mills in Paisley they employ about 5000.
- 11,418. It is a remarkable thing in a town the size of Paisley to see the entire absence of the class of that sort?—Yes.
- 11,419. (By the Chairman.) What does the amount of your pledges come to in Paisley?—In 1893 fines recovered amounted to £106, 6s., and pledges forfeited to £185, 5s.,—total £291, 11s.; fines not recovered, £69, 3s.; total amount of fines imposed and pledges forfeited, £360, 14s.
- 11,420. The fines not recovered are those people who go to prison?—Yes.
- 11,421. You don't make such a good thing out of pledges as in Glasgow?—No, Glasgow fines £2 when we fine 2s. 6d.
- 11,422. But pledges?—We don't take such heavy pledges.
- 11,423. In Glasgow the amount of pledges and fines, I think, is £12,500, and with you, what is the amount of pledges and fines?—The pledges are £185, 5s., and the fines recovered £106, 6s.
- 11,424. And Glasgow is ten times the size of Paisley, so that at the same proportion, Glasgow's fines and pledges should only amount to £2850 instead of £13,500?—They have different classes to deal with in Glasgow.
- 11,425. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Do your disorderly people go into Glasgow and then fall upon the Glasgow courts?—I think we get more Glasgow ones than they get Paisley ones.
- 11,426. The Chief Constable of Glasgow told us that the reason why there were so many arrests there, was that the surrounding towns poured a somewhat turbulent population into Glasgow, and that in that way they got 'foreign' prisoners?—They may get them from the mining districts in Lanarkshire, but not from Paisley.
- 11,427. You think you get more from Glasgow than they get from Paisley?—Yes, the Sunday traffic brings a great many out.
- 11,428. You were connected with the Parochial Board at one time?—Yes, for 12 years.
- 11,429. You know the habitual offenders. Do they often come upon the parish?—No, it is the last resort with them when they apply to the parish, because when they do so they have to go into the poorhouse, and they don't like that, as they lose their liberty. [The witness then withdrew.]

Chief-Constable Fraser. MR. JAMES FRASER, Chief Constable of Argyllshire, called in and examined.

- 11,430. (By the Chairman.) You are Chief Constable of Argyllshire?—Yes.
- 11,431. How long have you occupied that position?—Five years.
- 11,432. And your previous experience?—Connected for 30 years with the Police Force of Argyll.
- 11,433. How do you deal with your drunk and incapable cases in Argyllshire?—They are only tried in the burghs.
- 11,434. Not in the counties?—No. With the exception of a few cases which may be tried before the Justices under the Public House Acts.
- 11,435. Unless it is an assault or something serious?—Yes, or disorderly conduct.
- 11,436. In connection with Argyllshire, there are a great number of vagrants and gipsies, I understand?—Yes, but I believe not so many as in neighbouring counties.
- 11,437. Have you any bye-laws of the County Council dealing with them?—No, there were bye-laws prepared by the County Council about a year and a half ago, but when they were sent up to the Secretary for Scotland he would not approve of them.
- 11,438. Can you let me have the Vagrancy Bye-law?—Yes.
- 11,439–40. Did he disapprove of the whole thing, or only of the bye-law?—He suggested that there should be general laws passed for all Scotland.
- 11,441. Would you please read the clauses applying to vagrancy which were drawn up by your County Council?—The Circular was entitled 'Bye-laws for the 'Prevention of Vagrancy and for the Prevention and 'Suppression of Nuisances within the County of Argyll 'made at the Meeting at Dunoon on 3rd May, 1893, in 'terms of section 57 of the Local Government (Scotland) 'Act, 1889.' Clauses dealing with vagrancy are, 6, 7, 8, and are as follows:—'(6) Any street musician or 'singer or other person who continues to sound or play 'any musical instrument or sing in the neighbourhood 'of any inhabited house after having been required 'by an inmate of such house, or by any officer of police, 'to depart, shall be guilty of an offence punishable as 'hereinafter provided. (7) All persons found begging 'or exposing wounds or deformities, or exposing children 'of tender age to the inclemency of the weather, or 'placing themselves or otherwise acting so as to induce, 'or for the purpose of inducing, the giving of alms, 'shall be guilty of an offence as hereinafter provided. (8) Parents of young persons or other relations to whose 'control they are subject, by whom they have been sent 'or suffered to go out to beg, and also any other persons 'by whom such young persons have been so sent out 'to beg, shall be guilty of an offence as hereinafter 'provided.'
- 11,442. These were made offences punishable by, I think, any penalty up to £5. There is another bye-law dealing with beggars and others. You might read it?—It is No. 12, and is as follows:—'It shall be 'lawful for any constable to apprehend and bring 'before the sheriff, or any two justices of the peace, all 'such beggars and tinkers, men, women, or children 'strolling or wandering, or seeking relief, or found lying

Chief-Constable Fraser.

Chief-
Constable
Fraser.

20 Dec. 1894.

'in any outhouse, stair, close or area, or other place within the county, without lawful permission, and it shall be lawful for the sheriff or justices to direct and cause all such persons as may not at the time be convicted of begging as hereafter provided, to be handed over to the Inspector of Poor or other official of the parish within which such person shall have been found, in order that their claim as paupers may be investigated and disposed of according to law.

11,443. These bye-laws were adopted on the 3rd May 1893, and, on the 31st August 1893, you received a communication from the Secretary for Scotland regarding them?—Yes. A communication was received by the County Clerk.

11,444. That communication referred, did it not, to a decision which was given in the High Court of Justiciary on the 14th July 1892, which declared a bye-law made by the County Council of Midlothian, in the exercise of their powers under section 57 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, to be ultra vires?—Yes.

11,445. And that judgment quashed a conviction which had been secured under it in the Justice of Peace Court of Midlothian?—Yes.

11,446. And this circular went on to say that similar bye-laws existed in various other counties, and the decision besides rendering these inoperative, had also cast some doubt on the validity of certain of the bye-laws. Then, would you tell us what is suggested?—The Circular from the Secretary for Scotland said: 'If County Councils should deem it the better course to aim at a revision of existing bye-laws, it might be desirable to arrange some concerted action by way of conference, or otherwise, for the remodelling of their proposals in such a way as might provide the basis of a common code. The circular further suggested that by the exercise of the power contained in the words of the 57th section, 'County Councils would do well to bear in view that it is open to them to institute a prosecution in any instance where it is thought that the facts amount to a case of vagrancy or nuisance and if this course were freely pursued, the resulting decisions would lead to further definition of the terms "vagrancy and nuisance," and would naturally assist in the preparation of a more satisfactory code of bye-laws.'

11,447. Did you take any action in the matter?—The County Council took no action in the matter.

11,448. And you simply allowed your bye-laws to remain inoperative?—Yes.

11,449. Did you look into the terms of the decision referred to here?—Yes, it is by Lord Young.

11,450. Lord Young referred to the question of vagrancy simply as illustrating the thing, and his reference to it was not a judgment of the court but simply an expression of opinion on an outside question by a single judge. Some counties we have come across have adopted as their Vagrancy Bye-law a section of the Burgh Police Act of 1892?—Yes.

11,451. Did it occur to you to do so?—I brought it before the Standing Joint-Committee, but they suggested that it should be left alone in the meantime.

11,452. But you have got your powers against vagrancy in the Burgh Police Act, and you have got no powers outside beyond what are conferred by the Trespass Act and Common Law?—Yes.

11,453. Do you find any advantage from the possession of these extra powers in the Burghs?—Yes.

11,454. How many arrests had you last year for vagrancy?—About 18.

11,455. That is for begging?—Yes.

11,456. How many in the towns?—The whole of them in the burghs.

11,457. And you have had no arrests whatever in the county?—No.

11,458. Now, this power was put into your hands in 1892, and you tell us there were no arrests previous to the passing of the Burgh Police Act?—It has been all along in the burghs. It existed under the 1862 Act.

11,459. I suppose it is indicated by the fact that you wish to frame bye-laws that the vagrants are a nuisance in Argyllshire?—Yes, and of course we would be able to deal with them if we had the same powers as in the burghs.

11,460. You have seen in the Scottish Returns of June 1894, 212 adult vagrants and beggars, and 24 children. Do you think that is a large number considering the extent of your county?—It is a large number, there is no doubt.

11,461. How do these people live?—By begging.

11,462. Much theft?—A good deal of petty thefts, but people do not care about complaining, as they are afraid to do so.

11,463. Are there many gipsies or tinkers?—A large number. I hand you a Return showing their number.

11,464. What sort of people are they? You have got 20 apprehensions amongst them?—Yes.

11,465. That is one in six?—Yes.

11,466. Do you think that is a very great deal?—No, I do not think it is.

11,467. What are their crimes?—Simply drunkenness, breach of the peace, and disorderly conduct.

11,468. Are they an honest set of people?—There are not any serious offenders amongst them, but farmers complain that they help themselves by going into their gardens.

11,469. Do they poach?—No.

11,470. When they fight do they use knives or anything of that sort?—We have had two or three knife cases, but they do not come often.

11,471. Are they worse than the general population when they are fighting and in their cups? Are they murderous?—No, they are not, as a rule worse than the general population, nor murderous.

11,472. They are not generally a specially bad set of people?—No.

11,473. Do they live in tents?—Yes.

11,474. Their children are utterly neglected?—Utterly.

11,475. Cannot read?—No. No person takes anything to do with them.

11,476. Do you think they are such a nuisance as to justify any exceptional means of dealing with them?—I think so. I think it is a pity to allow them to go through the country without coming under the Education Act. You see they do not reside any time in one parish.

11,477. Then how would you propose to deal with them?—By sending them to some industrial school or other institution of that kind.

11,478. That would mean that the Government would have to pay for the maintenance of the children, but I speak of the whole lot, parents and children?—There are a good number of the parents who, if they got a little encouragement, would commence farm work. I know of several tinkers' sons and daughters who are employed as farm-servants, and are doing very well.

11,479. Are these tinkers worse in your opinion than the balance of the vagrants—half are vagrants and half are tramps?—They are much about the same.

11,480. I suppose most of the tramps in Argyllshire are really professional tramps, and not men in search of work?—They are just professional tramps.

11,481. There was recently plenty of railway work in your district?—Yes; they could get plenty of work if they wanted it.

11,482. I see you have 120 tinkers—240 vagrants altogether. Therefore you have 120 vagrants who are not tinkers. What do they do?—They simply go from one place to another.

11,483. That won't include the men who have tramped down from Glasgow to work at the West Highland Railway, and who are seeking work there?—No, I do not treat them as vagrants.

11,484. And you do not challenge them?—Yes, they are asked where they are going, and they make the excuse that they are going for work.

11,485. And you accept that statement?—Yes.

11,486. And you don't classify them as vagrants?—No. Unless found begging.

11,487. Do they steal more than the gipsies, or fight

Chief-
Constable
Fraser.

and drink more than them?—The gipsies fight more.

11,488. Do they steal more?—Sometimes. We are more afraid of the tramps than the gipsies, because they always go to farm-houses at night and after dark, and knock about the outhouses till morning.

11,489. And, going there without the consent of the tenant is a crime?—Yes. The tinkers generally ask permission to encamp or stay in an outhouse.

11,490. And, in point of drinking, they are pretty much the same?—Yes.

11,491. And, in point of fighting, are they as bad as the gipsies?—No.

11,491A. You have no organisation for dealing with vagrancy?—No.

11,492. No system of tickets?—No; I believe it would encourage them.

11,493. Have you any shelters?—No.

11,494. Any provision for the reception of sick tramps apart from the poorhouse?—No, but there are hospitals in some places.

11,495. Where?—There is one at Tarbert, and, of course, if they are ill the doctor orders them to go there, and they are kept perhaps for two or three days, or longer if necessary.

11,496. Is that provision made in many of the small towns throughout Argyllshire?—Tarbert is the only place I am aware of that has a hospital. In other places they are sent to the poorhouse.

11,497. Independent of that, you don't know of any provision made for them throughout the whole county of Argyllshire?—No.

11,498. And have you no suggestion that you should get powers?—Yes.

11,499. And, I suppose, the powers in the Burgh Police Act would be quite sufficient for your purpose?—Yes.

11,500. Do you want similar powers regarding drunkenness?—Yes, I would like that too.

11,501. Would you act on them?—We would act in places where we could get them tried.

11,502. Or where it would not be too long a journey?—Yes; but from Tarbert it would scarcely be worth while to take them all the way to Campbeltown.

11,503. But surely you could get some nearer judicial authority?—We would require some one to be appointed to prosecute.

11,504. There is no one at Dunoon to do it?—Yes, but that is of course in a different district of Argyllshire.

11,505. You could not have them dealt with by justices of the peace?—They could be tried at Lochgilphead. At present one half go to Inveraray, 24 miles off, and the other half go to Campbeltown, 38 miles off.

11,506. You never take up a man for being drunk?—No; further than putting him into the police cells, and bring them before a J.P. on following day, when they are generally discharged.

11,507. And if you find a drunk man at a distance from a police station you would simply put him into any shelter?—Yes.

11,508. I see in Argyllshire, in 1893, you had altogether 70 arrests for drunkenness and drunk and incapable, which were not convicted under the Public-Houses Act?—Yes.

11,509. They would be under the Burgh Police Act?—Yes.

11,510. What sentence do they generally give them in the burghs?—From 2s. 6d. to 5s.

11,511. Have they in your burghs a system of pledges?—Yes.

11,512. The 2s. 6d. or 5s. or 24 hours is the same as before?—There might be a little change; they are just commencing it in Campbeltown and Oban and other burghs.

11,513. You have 831 cases of breach of the peace, disorderly conduct and petty assault; most of these would be drunks?—Yes.

11,514. You have certified police cells in a good number of places?—Yes.

11,515. Have you many juvenile offenders, such as for stealing apples and things of that sort?—Well, not a large number. There are a few,—perhaps six or seven last year altogether. Chief-Constable Fraser.

11,516. What is done with them?—They are simply tried and admonished in trifling cases. 20 Dec. 1894.

11,517. Sent to reformatories?—No; they are not sent to the reformatories. The birch is used principally.

11,518. How many birchings had you?—Five. Oban is the only place that the birch is used.

11,519. Who orders it there?—The magistrates.

11,520. It is the only place in fact approved by the sheriff where these sentences can be carried out?—It is approved of also in Campbeltown and Dunoon, although it is never carried out.

11,521. Well, they are not in the Return?—That is because there is no case.

11,522. According to the Return, there were five to be whipped only—that is, without the alternative of imprisonment, and they were all by the burgh magistrates?—Yes.

11,523. Have you formed any opinion as to the effect of whipping?—I think it is better than imprisonment, because, as far as I am aware, none of them have come back again. On all those who have been whipped the whipping has had very good effects.

11,524. But they don't whip them in Campbeltown or Dunoon?—No; I think it is delicacy on the part of the magistrates.

11,525. There is one awkward thing about it, you can't whip girls?—Well, we have not many girls requiring it.

11,526. But, what I was going to ask you was this. In the case of a petty offence by some juvenile, necessitating some sort of a punishment—take a petty theft by a girl—you don't like to send a girl to prison; it is a bad commencement to her career, and you try to avoid it?—Yes, we try to avoid that.

11,527. Do you think it would have the same bad effect on a girl or boy to send them to a certified police cell as to prison?—I think it would have the same effect.

11,528. You think the public would attach the same stigma to it?—I rather think so.

11,529. Where have you certified cells?—At Oban, Campbeltown, Inveraray, Dunoon, Lochgilphead, and Port Ellen in Islay.

11,530. You can keep prisoners how long?—At Oban, Campbeltown, Inveraray and Dunoon, 14 days each, and, at Port Ellen, five days.

11,531. You can send them there after they have been tried?—Yes.

11,532. They can be sent there too to put in their punishment?—If prisoners are sentenced to something less than 14 days at Inveraray or Oban, you can confine them to the certified cells instead of sending them to Glasgow or Greenock.

11,533. And you think that attaches as bad a stigma as if you sent them to Glasgow or Greenock for the same period?—I think so: in fact our Islay prisoners prefer to be sent to Glasgow or Greenock.

11,534. What feeling have they?—They don't like to be imprisoned in their own neighbourhood.

11,535. What are the chief of your crimes in Argyllshire?—Breach of the peace and disorderly conduct.

11,536. Much poaching?—Yes; but we have not much to do with poaching.

11,537. Are there many men brought up for poaching?—Yes.

11,538. The police are not supposed to do anything in the way of arresting them?—Not unless it comes in their way, or if it is night-poaching, which is a crime but we have not had a case of night-poaching for a number of years.

11,539. Have you many of day-poaching?—That again is trespass. There are a few cases, I think, in the Return.

11,540. There are only ten cases of poaching in the Return?—That was the number.

11,541. Including both day and night poaching?—There were 10 reported throughout the whole county, all which were tried.

Chief-
Constable
Fraser.

20 Dec. 1894.

11,542. You cannot give any suggestion as to how you could get hold of the children of these gipsies to educate them?—The only suggestion I could give is, that power ought to be given to the police to bring them before a magistrate or some person vested with authority, to deal with them, and order them to be sent to school or elsewhere to be educated.

11,543. Have you any precedent for that, supposing the gipsy does not steal, does not get drunk, does not poach, and does not commit any new offence?—They all beg: that is one offence we could check them for.

11,544. You have got powers to bring them up and punish them for begging, and then you would deal with their children?—We have only the powers within the burghs as yet.

11,545. The only practical suggestion you can make is the extension of the provisions of the Burgh Police Act as to vagrancy, and as to drunkenness to the counties?—I should be very glad to see that.

11,546. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Do the vagrants move along certain fixed routes?—Yes.

11,547. What are the main routes in Argyllshire?—Well, they enter Argyllshire from Dumbarton at Inveraray, and they also enter at Dalmally, and at Fort William and Ballachulish. Those who come in at Inveraray carry on along Lochfyne-side to Lochgilphead, Ardrihaig, Tarbert and Campbeltown, and then they turn. On the return journey they come by Kilmartin and on to Oban, and thence to Dalmally or Ballachulish, and then they disappear from our sight.

11,548. That is the only route; that takes in all your county?—That is the main line I have described.

11,549. Are there any tramps in Mull or the Islands?—No.

11,550. Any vagrants?—No.

11,551. Are there no means of subsistence?—Well, they never go there.

11,552. Do these persons recur, or are they a fresh lot continually?—Well, there is a certain number, about 116; who are always in the county, but there are generally fresh lots coming in.

11,553. Including children, it is over 200 you have got?—Yes.

11,554. How long would they take to make this grand tour?—A fortnight or so.

11,555. That is pretty quick marching?—Yes, but they travel long distances. They think nothing of leaving Inveraray in the morning and being at Lochgilphead at night—that is 24 miles. Next day they would reach Tarbert.

11,556. Well, that is not a very hard march?—13 miles.

11,557. Next day?—They would make Clachan next day, a small village about 10 miles on the way to Campbeltown.

11,558. They don't take Tarbert to Campbeltown all in one day?—Oh, no; generally three days; it is thirty-eight miles. From Campbeltown they come back by Skipness.

11,559. Does a person who makes that tour once do it again in the same year?—Yes.

11,560. Do they finish the circuit outside your county, and do they march round it again within the year?—The same parties generally come round twice a year. When they are done in Argyllshire they generally take a turn through Dumbarton and Perth.

11,561. You have made a somewhat definite difference between what are called the gipsies and the professional vagrant. You say you have about 120 gipsies, including children, and the rest, bringing the average up to about 210, would be just professional vagrants without the gipsy character. I do not know how you would divide the gipsies from what you call your professional vagrant?—When they are banded together they are put down as gipsies or tinkers.

11,562. (By the Chairman.) They go in tents?—Yes.

11,563. (By Col. M'Hardy.) The vagrants go in couples or singly, and they do not stay in tents at all?—That is so.

11,564. Do you define a gipsy as a person who goes in company and encamps in some way or other?—Yes. Chief-

11,565. Does it indicate that the man does any labour or work?—Oh, they don't labour. Some of them may perhaps be searching for work or pretending to do so. Chief-Constable Fraser.

20 Dec. 1894.

11,566. But without real respectable work, such as repairing umbrellas, mending tin cans and sharpening razors, &c.?—A good many go about mending umbrellas and so on.

11,567. Are these honest labourers, or are these things used simply as a shield for begging?—Just a shield for begging in most cases.

11,568. No vagrants ever reach the islands?—An odd one may, but very seldom.

11,569. He soon comes back?—Yes.

11,570. As to the drunks in your rural districts; how does a constable deal with a drunk man he may meet some twenty miles away from civilisation?—He simply puts him under the care of some person or takes him home.

11,571. There is no pledge or fine or anything exacted from that man?—No, a constable cannot take a pledge.

11,572. You don't give him power?—No, except where there is a police cell.

11,573. Is that man registered as an apprehension?—No.

11,574. So that there may be a good many found lying about the country that are not recorded in your return?—A good many.

11,575. Are there ever many cases of drunkenness in the islands, striking out Islay? Take Tiree, for instance, are there many cases of drunkenness there?—Scarcely any; there is no public-house in Tiree.

11,576. (By Dr Sutherland.) There is one in Colonsay?—Yes.

11,577. (By Col. M'Hardy.) If there was a case of drunkenness, how would it be treated?—The person would just be sent home.

11,578. It would not be recorded as an apprehension? No, unless there was a citation or the person brought to a lock-up.

11,579. These 214 people who march about through your country do not exist by work?—No, not by work.

11,580. Then it must be by getting money from somebody else; do they get that money under a certain amount of recognised fear—a kind of feeling that it is the easiest way to get rid of the person?—Yes.

11,581. The small farmers and agriculture labourers in the county would as soon not give money or anything if they could get rid of these people?—They would give them anything to get clear of them.

11,582. Simply from a kind of half terrorism?—Yes, because they would be afraid of injury to themselves or their property. I might mention that there is another class in our county and in every other county which is not included in either of these returns; that is pedlars—licensed pedlars who are nothing more nor less than vagrants or tramps.

11,583. I thought you said they were associated?—Yes.

11,584. But the pedlar is not associated as a rule?—They simply obtain their certificates and use them as passports for begging.

11,585. But they march singly?—Sometimes. Some of the tinkers also get them. One will have a licence and goes and sells the tins, &c., for the whole band. I think the fee for a pedlar's certificate is far too low, or else Chief Constables should only grant them to bond fide persons.

11,586. The granting of them is in the power of the Chief Constables?—Yes.

11,587. And you must recognise another man's certificate?—Yes. If I refuse a certificate, the applicant will perhaps go to the Chief Constable of Bute or some of the other Chief Constables. I have seen one man with a certificate come with a sixpence-worth of note-paper, and that sixpence-worth would serve him for the twelve months going from house to house.

11,588. That is practically a tramp?—Just a tramp.

Chief-
Constable
Fraser.

20 Dec. 1894.

11,589. Supposing you had to add them to your Returns of vagrants, what would that make them up to?—I have them here for the last four years.

11,590. What is your average?—About 100.

11,591. That would make your migratory poor up from 214 to 314?—Thereabout.

11,592. (By Dr Sutherland.) Are these pedlars or packmen of any advantage to the farmers and others who are far from shops?—Yes. I believe there will be about thirty or so bonâ fide pedlars out of the total.

11,593. Hadn't you a shebeen in Colonsay lately?—I don't think so.

11,594. Two old ladies trafficking in liquor?—Not lately.

11,595. About a year or two years ago?—There was a case of shebeening in Tiree, but not in Colonsay.

11,596. I see you have four men and one female who have been convicted five times and upwards during the last year; are these gipsies?—Vagrants. There is one tinker scarcely ever out of prison.

11,597. There are five people in Argyllshire convicted five times and upwards in one year for breach of the peace and drunkenness; these are all tinkers?—Yes.

11,598. Is the tinker class increasing?—Yes.

11,598A. Much?—No.

11,599. Is it the fact that many of the children die in early years?—Yes; in their infancy.

11,600. Where are they buried?—Whatever parish they happen to be in at the time.

11,601. Who certifies the cause of death?—The doctor.

11,602. But suppose the doctor was not attending the gipsy children—as a rule they have no medical attendant—who certifies the cause of death?—If it is a case reported to us, a sudden death, the Procurator Fiscal certifies.

11,603. If the child has been ill for a week, and receives no medical attendance, who certifies in that case?—The child's parents.

11,604. No doctor?—I am not aware.

11,605. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) You are aware that the Prevention of Crimes Act of 1871 extended a section of the English Vagrancy Act to Scotland?—Yes.

11,606. Do you ever have any prosecutions of vagrants under that provision?—None outside burghs.

11,607. Are you aware of any reason why it is not used?—No; I am not.

11,608. Is it referred to in your Chief Constable's book?—Yes.

11,609. You are not aware of any difficulty, however, that causes it not to be used?—I am not.

11,610. Were these bye-laws that were intended to be adopted in Argyll not practically moulded after any existing laws?—Well, I think they were compared with some others previously drawn up in other parts of the country.

11,611. But they were not got from some Police Act, were they?—No. Of course we submitted them to the County Procurator Fiscal to revise.

11,612. (By Dr Farquharson.) If you had the increased powers conferred upon you now possessed by the burghs, do you think your police force would be adequate to carry out the law?—Yes.

11,613. Are the police not very scattered in these counties?—Yes.

11,614. Would their numbers be able to cope with the enormous stream of tramps invading your districts?—I think so.

11,615. You don't think you would require more police?—No.

11,616. I suppose the number of tramps and vagrants vary greatly in different counties in Scotland?—I believe so.

11,617. Why is that?—Well, I believe there is a large increase in Ayrshire.

11,618. Why?—Because I believe they are provided with tickets for food and lodgings.

11,619. Are the people more soft-hearted in some counties than in others?—I don't know.

11,620. Is there anything beyond the tickets? Do they get more support in one county than in another?—There is a tendency for them to remain longer in the quarter where tickets are provided.

11,621-2. Is your county high among those counties that have preference in proportion to other counties?—I think we are less than the other counties.

11,623. Is there any race distinction between the gipsy and the vagrant, or is it that they live in different ways?—That they live in different ways.

11,624. Are the gipsies not a different people having different language, laws and customs?—There is not much difference now; there may have been at one time.

11,625. There are none of these tribes of gipsies have a moral law for themselves?—No. The gipsies are all more or less tinkers in Argyllshire.

11,626. Now, as regards the terrorism that is supposed to exist; is that because the rural population have at any time been actually terrorised by these people, or is it that they are only afraid they might be?—They often receive a good deal of annoyance from them. If they are refused or come to the house the worse of liquor they are very insolent, and the people would rather give them something and get them away.

11,627. But, if the people would agree to combine and not give these vagrants anything, they would be starved out of existence?—Yes.

11,628. Is there any truth in the report that these people sometimes set fire to a building or a stack out of revenge?—When a fire takes place tramps are often blamed, although not guilty. What does take place is when they are allowed to stay in outhouses they leave fire behind them, not putting it out properly, and perhaps the building takes fire the following night or some time after they leave. These fires generally take place some hours after they leave.

11,629. I have asked this question, because we have had it stated that these fires do arise out of revenge?—I think they are accidental—at any rate, more so than wilful in Argyllshire at least.

11,630. Is there any proof of a fire having been lighted out of revenge?—Not in our county.

11,631. The feeling in your county is simply a vague feeling that a tramp might do something?—I believe they are capable enough of doing it.

11,632. But is that merely a theory?—They have threatened to do it in some districts. They might say 'you better watch in case your place be on fire 'before morning.' Of course they might have no intention of doing it.

11,633. All they do in defiance of the law is petty theft?—Yes.

11,634. Do they go the length of stealing poultry?—No; potatoes and fruit and perhaps turnips.

11,635. And wood?—Yes, and wood to light their fires.

11,636. Have any plantations been burned down by the accidental fires of tramps?—Yes.

11,637. On any scale?—On a small scale; it was noticed in time.

11,638. There is a great deal of poaching you say in Argyllshire; is that carried out by the vagrants and gipsies?—No.

11,639. Are the poachers a distinct class?—Yes. In fact I don't know any vagrants that go about poaching. They might take a chance of a rabbit.

11,640. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Are they sufficiently intelligent to understand the business?—I do not think they are.

11,641. (By Dr Sutherland.) They do not carry ferrets?—No.

11,642. (By Dr Farquharson.) Is it not the case that poaching is carried out by the farm servants and the small farmers?—Yes, and the people in the villages.

11,643. They do it from sporting instinct, and not for money?—There is an amount of that.

11,644. Are there poachers who make it a calling for money?—Yes.

11,645. But they are distinct from the tinkers?—Yes.

Chief-

20 Dec. 1894.

11,646. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) They usually live in the towns or villages?—Yes.

11,647. (By Dr Farquharson.) What is the origin of the word, 'tinker'? Is it because they do tinkering of pots and pans?—I suppose so.

11,648. You have told us that you have hospitals for them in the county?—Only one.

11,649. Is that hospital for tinkers alone?—It is for any person who happens to need it.

11,650. Is it your opinion that the conditions of vagrancy and trampism, if we may use such a word, constitute such a grievance that something should be done to check it?—Yes.

11,651. What would be a check?—An Act, if we had it, the same as in burgh districts.

11,652. Would that reform them or get them out of the way?—Get them out of the way.

11,653. (By Miss Stevenson.) In reference to these tramps who go about under cover having a pedlar's certificate, we were told by one Chief Constable that when a pedlar came from one county into another it was necessary for him to have his certificate renewed or restamped for that county; do you think that plan would be an advantage?—I think not. About thirteen years ago (in 1881) there was an amendment on the Act of 1871. When the Act was first passed it was necessary that the certificate should be endorsed in each county, but now if they get a certificate in one county it does for the whole of the United Kingdom.

11,654. Do you think the old plan was any deterrent to them, or gave the Chief Constables any more check upon them?—It no doubt gave the Chief Constables a check upon them, but I do not think it is any good.

11,655. (By Dr Farquharson.) Are the landed proprietors in Argyshire inclined or disinclined to allow vagrants to encamp on their grounds?—There are some landlords who would not allow them: others do.

But the farmers have more to do with that than the proprietors.

11,656. You have the power to move them on unless they are sitting there with the leave of the farmer or proprietor?—Yes.

11,657. One or two witnesses expressed that they would like to make it an offence on the part of a farmer to allow these tramps to encamp: would you go the length of that?—I think it would be very hard.

11,657A. (By Miss Stevenson.) To go back to this endorsing of the certificate; if a man came into your county, and you thought he was not a suitable man to have a certificate, and refused to endorse it, would that not do some good?—Yes; but he had the power of an appeal, and I would rather get clear of him. I might have my own suspicions of the man, but perhaps nothing sufficiently definite upon which to refuse to sign the certificate.

11,658. (By the Chairman.) What power does the possession of the license give to a pedlar selling tin pots or baskets?—He must have a certificate if he goes from house to house selling anything except fruit.

11,659. Take a man with his headquarters in Glasgow, must he get the pedlar's certificate from the Chief Constable there, or can he not get it direct from the Excise?—It is quite another certificate that is got from the Excise. That is for hawkers, and there are a good many of them in our county. They get a £2 license, and usually they have a cart. They do not require a pedlar's license.

11,660. But take a man with headquarters in Glasgow wanting a certificate to peddle about the country, in Dumbarton, Lanarkshire and Renfrewshire, say, where will he get his certificate?—From the Chief Constable in Glasgow, and then he can go through all Scotland. [The witness then withdrew.]

MR. CHARLES A. M'HARDY, Chief-Constable of Dumbartonshire, called in and examined.

Chief-
Constable
M'Hardy.

11,661. (By the Chairman.) You are Chief Constable of Dumbartonshire?—Yes.

11,662. How long have you occupied that position?—Since 1884; but I have been connected with the county since 1863.

11,663. In what capacity?—I rose through all the grades, and put all my time in the police force in Dumbartonshire.

11,664. What is the number of your arrests in a year, generally for drunkenness?—Last year, drunk and incapable, 49 males and 22 females—that is, 1893.

11,665. For breach of the peace and petty assaults?—1006 males and 266 females.

11,666. That is a very large number, surely?—Yes, it is.

11,667. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Is the number exceptional?—Yes.

11,668. On account of the railway?—Well, I would not say altogether. The West Highland Railway was on at the time and gave us a good many. Clydebank is a very populous place, and a great many offences come from that district now.

11,669. (By the Chairman.) What do you do with your drunks in the counties?—They are taken to the police stations, and locked up there till they are sober. If it is on a Saturday night, they are liberated on bail if they can bail themselves out, if not they are taken to Dumbarton before the J.P. court. If they give bail themselves they are allowed out, and the bail is forfeited if they do not turn up, and if it is forfeited we do not take any more proceedings unless in the more serious cases.

11,670. Is that the rule all through the country districts?—Yes.

11,671. If a constable some distance off from the police station meets a man drunk and incapable he will take him to the station?—Yes.

11,672. How does he get him there?—He must provide a barrow or get some other means of taking him to the station.

11,673. You run them all in?—I would not say that. If you find a farm-servant or a man whom you know to be a respectable man in the locality he is only helped home; but I am speaking of the ordinary working class when the officer does not know where they reside.

11,674. He takes them to the police station for the man's own sake?—Yes, and for his own safety as well, because complaints might be made if he did not.

11,675. Then you let the prisoner out as early as you possibly can?—Yes, and an officer may sometimes trust him on a pledge of 5s. on the promise that the pledge is to be forward before the day of the court. If it is forward, and the man does not appear, it is forfeited, but if it is not then a warrant is granted, or perhaps no further proceedings.

11,676. You were talking about the day of the court, are all these prisoners brought up at once—a man arrested on Monday night would be tried when?—Tuesday or Friday.

11,677. A man arrested on Tuesday afternoon would have to stay on till Friday?—He would be brought before the court on Wednesday. The fiscal would call a magistrate and have him tried. There is no delay in regard to that.

11,678. If it is a case simply of drunk and incapable, and the man cannot find the pledge and he is brought to trial, the most he can get is 5s. or 24 hours?—Yes.

11,679. What do you do with him?—He is sent to the prison in Glasgow.

11,680. How much does it cost to send him?—It would have cost more than his bail would have been.

11,681. Is that done at your expense or at the expense of the Prison Commissioners?—The Prison Commissioners.

11,682. Have you any idea of the extreme cost of conveying a drunk from the farthest off place at which you try them to Glasgow?—We have an arrangement with the Prison Commissioners, and I think it is 6s. or 7s.—that takes them from every part of the county.

Chief-

Chief-
Constable
M'Hardy.

20 Dec. 1894.

11,683. You get now a consolidated amount, and the fewer prisoners you have to send the more you get into your pockets?—No.

11,684. (By Col. M'Hardy.) No, it is the same charge for every man from all parts of the county?—From some parts we may lose on a man, from others we have a profit, that is the thing I understand.

11,685. (By the Chairman.) It is a much more troublesome matter for you to send a prisoner from the more distant parts to Glasgow than it would be for the Paisley magistrates to send a prisoner to Glasgow?—Yes.

11,686. And yet we were told of the Paisley magistrates that they never thought it worth their while to convict a man of being simply drunk and incapable, because it was not worth while for 24 hours or 5s. to send them up to Glasgow. Your people do not regard it in that light?—Our people in some cases no doubt may dismiss a prisoner at the bar. If the prisoner explains how he came to be under the influence of drink he may be dismissed.

11,687. But how many cases of drunk and incapable did you send to prison from Dumbartonshire last year?—There were 64 males and 22 females convicted. I could not tell you how many of them went to prison. That was not in the form sent to me or I would have answered it. I can easily find that out, and will fill it in. I do not expect there are many.

11,688. Have you many tinkers in Dumbartonshire, or have you any complaints or suggestions to make about them?—Not resident.

11,689. Many go through the county?—A good many, from 35 to 40 regularly visit the county.

11,690. Are these tinkers fairly well behaved or do they steal?—I cannot complain of the tinkers for stealing.

11,691. Poaching?—No.

11,692. Getting drunk?—They do.

11,693. And they fight with each other?—Yes, they are very troublesome when they get under the influence of drink; and they are such a pitiful class because the mother has generally four or five children, and both father and mother are generally got the worse of drink.

11,694. What do you do with the children?—Shelter the children the best way possible. Where the constable can do it he takes both parents and children to the police office and shelters them and gets them sent away in the morning.

11,695. In their fights are they more vicious than other people; do they use their fists or knives?—They are more vicious, and they will use anything within their reach.

11,696. Have you had any cases of homicidal assaults among them?—No, but I have had some very serious assaults among them, but they will not complain of each other. They would not complain even although one was the cause of another's death. They are particularly friendly to each other when they are sober.

11,697. Then take the other class of vagrants—that is beggars and vagrants?—There were 1053 males, 379 females, and 40 children under fourteen years challenged by the police.

11,698. In the county there are 204 men and women vagrants according to the census of 1893?—Yes.

11,699. Are the vagrants more troublesome than the gipsies, or as troublesome?—They are more troublesome in this way that you have them always. You are never free of them. The gipsies, you meet them only once in the week or once in the fortnight.

11,700. Take a score of the one and a score of the other, which gives you most trouble when they go through?—I should say that the vagrant is worse than the gipsy in this, that, if you once clear the gipsy out, a gipsy when he gets sober does not trouble you for a time again, but the vagrant will, and he will be back on you the next day again.

11,701. Have you tried to deal with the question of vagrancy by bye-laws?—Well, the County Council framed bye-laws, but they did not go the length of asking the Secretary for Scotland to approve of them, because Edinburgh went in for the same thing.

11,702. I suppose you refer to the Court of Session case?—Yes.

11,703. Have you got a copy of the bye-laws?—No, but the Sheriff, the Convener of the County, and myself considered the matter.

11,704. Were they similar to those of the County of Argyle?—No, similar to those in Perth.

11,705. Which are working?—Yes.

11,706. And the Perthshire ones, so far as vagrants are concerned, are almost identical with the Police Act?—Yes, that is what I wanted to get in.

11,707. And have you found there is any difficulty in embodying that clause in a bye-law—you would like to have the powers of that bye-law for your county?—Very much.

11,708. Then you know the provision for drunkards in the Burgh Police Act?—Yes.

11,709. That power existing in your burghs, would you like to have it for your county?—Very much.

11,710. Do you think it would do good?—I think so, from the fact that you have always a lot of individuals in the counties who would come within that clause, to whom 5s. is nothing, and there is no term of imprisonment for them if they can pay the 5s., which has no effect upon them. The fear of going to prison would be a great effect in itself.

11,711. Do you think so?—I do.

11,712. Could you make any suggestion with regard to the tinkers—I suppose there is no necessity for dealing with them at all, so far as your county is concerned?—As I have stated, there are no resident tinkers in the county.

11,713. As to the vagrants, the vagrancy bye-laws would enable you to hustle them out?—Yes, but the awkward thing is that it is just one Chief Constable sending them to another Chief Constable.

11,714. Let us try to deal with the children who are illiterate and non-educated, they are escaping the provisions of the Education Act, do you see how they could be dealt with?—I think they should be taken in charge by the local authorities.

11,715. But that is with the parents' consent?—My idea is that there should be a clause compelling the Parochial Authorities of the parish in which the children were born to look after these children, whether in one parish or other parishes.

11,716. Do you mean to take them from their parents and look after them?—Yes, if parents fail.

11,717. Don't you think that would be a pretty strong order; suppose you had got one born in Aberdeenshire, another in Dumbarton, a third in Argyleshire, and a fourth in Renfrewshire, would you have them taken and separated from each other?—No; I would let the parents have the option of saying which parish they wanted the children sent to.

11,718. But the parish might not relish that; suppose they selected Dumbartonshire?—Yes, it is a very difficult thing; and I would say that the children of these vagrants are a very clever class naturally.

11,719. It is a question most desirable to solve, and that is why I ask your views?—The Parish Councils might take notice of them in some way.

11,720. But, can you suggest a feasible way; you cannot confine to a parish a man who has not committed any crime?—Well, but we have a great many in the counties who have no residence, and their children ought to attend school.

11,721. Yes, but the School Board cannot get at them. Supposing you were to allow the School Board Officer to insist upon compulsory attendance after three days' residence, they would be off to fresh districts into another School Board before the three days were up?—I quite admit it is a difficult question.

11,722. You cannot see any way of getting out of the difficulty?—No; I do not think so.

11,723. And would you propose to separate the parents from their children?—No; I did not mean it in that view. I meant that the parish in which the child was born should have an interest in it.

Chief-
Constable
M'Hardy.

30 Dec. 1894.

11,724. Yes, it has an interest in it, in that it has to provide for its settlement?—Yes, but if it were possible I think they should be got at.

11,725. As to the ordinary tinkers, you have no other suggestion than the extension of the powers?—That would do.

11,726. Are you bothered with pedlars?—Yes. I think the old system of pedlar's certificate was better than the present, namely, getting it endorsed in each county to which they went.

11,727. I suppose each Chief Constable wants to get the bad ones out of his own district?—Yes; but if a party comes into a town with a certificate, the Chief Constable should have the right to revise the certificates if the holder has been convicted.

11,728. How many pedlars have you?—We had £20 last year from the pedlars' certificates. That at 5s. each would make about 80.

11,729. The Chief Constable of Argyleshire told us there were about 20 pedlars occupied in his county at peddling work whose services were of use, and about 80 who made their certificates the pretext for begging?—That is so.

11,730. All these certificates were not granted by him. Some of them were, perhaps, granted by you; others by the Chief Constable of Glasgow, and elsewhere. If your plan was carried out, he would not endorse these 80 men's certificates?—You were bound to endorse them under the old Act, unless you had something against them, but it acted as a check. When a man came before you, you might not know anything sufficiently definite against him as to warrant you to refuse to endorse the certificate, but you could warn him. That system wrought very well, and I was surprised that the alteration was made.

11,731. You have no system of shelters, or for passing on tramps by means of tickets, or anything of that sort?—No; we mostly deal with the Parochial Boards.

11,732. You have no shelters in the parishes for tramps?—No.

11,733. Have you any hospitals for tramps under an order of the Scottish Local Government or the Board of Supervision?—Not for tramps specially—just the ordinary hospital.

11,734. No special supervision?—No; of course there are a good many tramps detained in the police cells, but you cannot avoid it. The police find them in stairs and in other places lying out.

11,735. And you give a number of them shelter?—Yes, 346. That might turn against myself. The Government Inspector might object to it.

11,736. In Glasgow there were 5,300 persons sheltered last year in the police cells, and, so far as I know, the practice is universal?—I know that it is objected to by the Government Inspector.

11,737. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) What is unlawful about it?—No one is entitled to be under lock and key.

11,738. Under what Act?—You have no right to lock them up.

11,739. But you don't lock them up?—You must; you cannot leave them in the cell with the door open.

11,740. (By Dr. Sutherland.) He has no right to be under lock and key unless he is charged?—That is so.

11,741. (By the Chairman.) The custom is frequent?—Yes; but they don't enter them in the charge-book. They are entered as for protection.

11,742. I do not ask whether you put them into the police cells for protection. What I ask you is to what extent this system of protection in the police office, or within the precincts of the police office, prevails throughout the country districts compared with the towns?—It gives a great deal of trouble.

11,743. Can you give us that?—I have had as many as fifteen at one time in one police office cell.

11,744. Where?—At Helensburgh.

11,745. That is a large number; as much as for Glasgow?—It was in the time of the colliers' strike, and they were going to the West Highland Railway to look for work.

11,746. Have you many women applying for shelter in this way?—A good many.

11,747. Do you think there is any necessity for making provision for the shelter of the honest working man?—I think, under the new system, it will perhaps be easier done, but under the Parochial Board it is very difficult. Some of the Inspectors of the Parochial Boards are very nice, and will do all they can to help the police. We have only to send these people to a lodging-house, and then apply to the Inspector of Poor, who refunds the money; but some Inspectors won't do that.

11,748. The Inspectors may have done that, but I doubt whether it was strictly legal, if the man were able-bodied?—Well, in some cases it might be. They usually in the main are able-bodied, and not entitled to be relieved.

11,749. Well, I fully appreciate the humanity of the action; but our object is to find out what provisions of the law require attention to be drawn to them?—Well, I think it would be a very necessary thing if arrangements could be made under the Parish Councils, that with all such cases, instead of having shelters, the Parish Councils should provide the necessary expense for lodging them in the lodging-houses. That would be all, I think, that is necessary.

11,750. That is to say, to be administered by the police?—Well, I would not object to that, because the police walking out and about find these individuals, and I do not think it is desirable that the Inspector of Poor should be disturbed at every time of night. The police know where the lodging-houses are, and they might report at the week's end the number of those who have got shelter, and apply to the authority to get the outlay refunded.

11,751. You would not be able to ascertain whether he had not already the fourpence for his lodgings?—But he would be voluntarily searched in the police office. You could not put him into the cells without searching him, because you do not know what might happen. There might be a side-room in some police offices where you could put them into, but they have not that in every police office. When they are put into a side-room they would not be searched.

11,752. I suppose you mean they might commit suicide in the police cell, for instance?—Yes.

11,753. Do you think it would be of any use having special accommodation for indigent travellers established and attached to the police office in counties?—I do not think it would work well. I should not like to see it. I think it is a sort of dragging down the noble spirit of the working classes to have them coming to the police office for shelter.

11,754. But they come?—Well, we get them lying on stairs and in such like places, and we take them in because anything might happen to them.

11,755. Do you give them food?—A little supper and a little breakfast.

11,756. That comes out of the police rates?—Gentlemen subscribe for that; sometimes I get the magistrates to do it.

11,757. Are they so particular in some places that the magistrates subscribe privately?—Well, in Helensburgh I have asked them to do this.

11,758. I ask you that, because I think in Glasgow it comes out of the police rates, and no one seems to object?—Well, but all our burghs are policed by the county, and I would not like the matter left an open question. If there was anything being done in the burghs, questions might be raised about it. I usually ask the superintendent in the place if he has an arrangement with the Inspector of Poor, and if he has, then it is all right. The Inspector of Poor, in that case, has no difficulty or trouble, as he gives the money to the police, and not to the man.

11,759. But in that he acts illegally?—No; I don't think it. In some cases they are not very sympathetic, and I know of two inspectors being found fault with.

11,760. What were the cases?—The first was the case of the wife of an able-bodied man being found with a child on the shore. The man was a tramp, and made application to the Inspector of Poor before his wife was confined, but the Inspector refused to give any help because the man was able-bodied. Some ladies came to the police office, and told me of the matter. I was in Helensburgh at the time. I sent at once to get the woman removed to a lodging-house, if she was in a fit state, but she was delivered of the child before she was removed. The doctor and I considered that it was a case that the Inspector of Poor ought to have attended to. However, we agreed among ourselves to pay whatever was required to keep the woman for so many days, and I sent an officer to get for her whatever she needed. On the fourth day they were able to go. The man came and thanked me, and said he would refund me the money if he got work. He came from Inverness, he said. They got £5 or £6 altogether subscribed.

11,761. Was the man a respectable man?—Yes; and he offered to refund the money when he was able, but I told him there was no necessity.

11,762. What was the other case?—It was in Cardross, in the parish of Renton. The two—husband and wife—were on the way to the harvest, and she was within two months within her confinement. They had been lying in a shed on a cold frosty night, and she took ill. The man went to the farm-house, and roused the people, and told them where he was, but they would not believe him, and thought it was just an ordinary tinker's quarrel that had taken place. He came off to Renton to the medical officer. He thought the Inspector of Poor stayed there, but he stayed in Cardross. The medical officer would not go, because he had not a line from the Inspector. The man went back to his wife, and found that she was partly delivered of a child. He then went back to the farm-house, and managed to get some of the servants. After that he went off to Cardross, and arrived there between one and two o'clock in the morning. The policeman went with him to the Inspector of Poor, but the Inspector would not take anything to do with the case, because the man was able-bodied. He was, however, told to call at the office next morning at ten o'clock. The upshot was that the woman was delivered of a child which was dead. In the morning the man came to the Inspector of Poor as arranged, but the Inspector refused to relieve him, or to do anything for him. Then the man was sent to the sheriff, and the sheriff sent him to me. I sent a sergeant off to the place to see the nature of the thing, and he was so much struck with what he saw that he paid three shillings at once out of his own pocket to the servants to get some things. The dead child was lying there with nothing over it but a sack. I reported the whole matter to the sheriff, and requested that some proceedings should be taken. It was ridiculous that any such case should occur.

11,763. Would not the remedy for that be to amend in some way the provisions of the Scottish Poor Law with respect to such cases?—Yes. Another case came under my notice, which would show you how things occur. This was a case of ordinary tramps—street singers. The woman took ill on a Sunday. Notice was brought to the police, and a constable went and saw her sitting on the road-side on a bing of stones. Her husband, who was with her, was one of these men without an arm. The officer took the woman into a farm, and got all the necessary information about her. She thought she had cramp in the stomach. The farm she was taken to happened to be about a hundred yards into another parish, of which the Inspector lived about 800 yards away. The officer went to the Inspector, but he declined to interfere, because the woman had not been found in his parish. This would have necessitated the officer going six miles in order to get the other Inspector. The officer, in consequence, went to his superior, who came to me. This was three o'clock in the afternoon. I said, surely the Governor of the poorhouse will take her in, and I would be responsible. I sent up, but the Governor refused to admit her, as he had not got a line from the Inspector. I then sent to the Inspector of Poor, and explained to him, but he declined to do anything. Then I had to send an officer these six miles to Old Kilpatrick. All that time the woman lay in the farm-house till eleven o'clock at night, when the Inspector came. She was then removed into the poorhouse, but in the moving I think she caught cold, and she died. I reported the case, and Mr. McNeill came and made inquiries, with the result that he said she ought to have been admitted to the poorhouse at once on the word of the Chief Constable.

11,764. That was a difficulty in the administration by an official, and it strikes me that if a criminal prosecution had been instituted, a verdict might have been found of manslaughter?—What I thought was this, and I explained it to Mr. McNeill, that inspectors of poor ought to work together, and into each other's hands, like inspectors of police in different districts.

11,765. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Of course you don't want to interfere with the legitimate pedlar?—Oh no.

11,766. Are the legitimate pedlars who go about the country useful to the farming class?—Not in my county, but in such counties as Aberdeen, and over the north, where they carry cloth, they are useful.

11,767. Have you heard any complaints by small shopkeepers that these pedlars interfere with their legitimate trade?—No.

11,768. Is it easy, in these cases of pedlars, to tell where honest work ends and begging begins?—It might be easy enough. The most of them that come, particularly from Glasgow and Edinburgh, have nothing with them. They come with a few packets of matches and some sheets of writing-paper and boxes of pens. They have no stock, but they have the pedlar's certificate, and you cannot stop them.

11,769. Is there much complaint in your county in regard to tramps and vagrants?—A good deal in regard to vagrants and tinkers.

11,770. Could they not boycott them—not give them supplies?—They are usually very glad to give them something to get them away. When a tinker comes they are glad to get rid of him, especially if he is in drink.

11,771. It is a kind of terrorism?—Well, at least they don't wish them there.

11,772. If you had the powers that you want, and which the burghs now have, would that help the residents much? Suppose I met a tinker who begged off me, and I said to him that I would call a policeman, the policeman might be four miles off. Do you think that would make the law difficult to enforce?—Well, there is this difficulty, that respectable ladies and gentlemen don't care about being called to a police court to give evidence, and they consequently don't give information to the police, who cannot therefore get at the tramps. Sometimes complaints are made to the police, but at the same time they are told, 'On 'no account summon me or my wife or family to the 'court.'

11,773. And how is the law to improve that?—Well, if a policeman finds these tramps in a district he might follow them up, and if he sees them begging he could then take them up.

11,774. You think, if you had that power, it would be a deterrent?—Yes; and I think it would be judiciously used. A constable in a country district is not so ready to exercise his powers as in the burghs, where they are almost bound to do it.

11,775. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Do you ever deal with vagrants under the powers given in the Prevention of Crimes Act?—That is, lying in houses and shelters where they have no right to be?

11,776. It also deals with vagrants in tents and in the open-air?—That is only on private grounds.

11,777. I am not speaking of the Trespass Act of 1865; I am speaking of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871?—But that, again, is a criminal case.

11,778. Do you ever use that power?—Yes, if they are previously convicted.

11,779. Are you aware that a certain section of the English Vagrancy Act was made applicable to Scotland by the Prevention of Crimes Act of 1871?—I would not like to say that I am aware of that.

11,780. Then I presume you don't prosecute under it?—I should like you to let me see that.

11,781. Have you got your Chief Constable's Book with you?—No.

11,782. If you want to see the Act, you have not seen it before?—Well, I don't think we prosecute under that Act.

11,783. Are you aware of any reason why you don't prosecute under that Act?—No, I am not.

11,784. Then I want to know why you ask for more powers, when you don't use the ones you have got?—I would like to see that Act before I say more on that subject, because I really don't think that it applies. One or two individuals might pass over it, but it would not be passed over by the whole of the chief constables, and we have had meetings discussing the subject.

11,785. There are a number of chief constables who know of it and use it?—Well, where the chief constable is the prosecutor, it might be done, but where the chief constable is not the prosecutor it is different. You will not get the fiscals to take up cases under that Act.

11,786. Can you give me the reason why?—No, I cannot, because the fiscal is not entitled to take instructions from the police if he is not under the police.

11,787. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Your proposals in regard to vagrancy amount to this—that, under the Parish Councils Bill, the Parish Council should authorise the chief constable and his subordinates to provide shelter in lodging-houses, and a meal or two, out of the rates of course, for cases of vagrancy deserving of relief?—I do not think the police should have anything to do with it, except in the cases that might come under their notices.

11,788. You have already told us of cases of great hardship, amounting to almost cruelty, and, as you are aware, there is only one Inspector of Poor for each parish, and perhaps even for many parishes combined; would it not be much more to the point if this power to grant relief to able-bodied persons were vested in chief constables, who have policemen all over the county?—I am speaking only about admission to the poorhouse.

11,789. You dislike, for some reason or other, to shelter vagrants in the police cells?—Yes.

11,790. I understand you to say you would like to provide shelter in lodging-houses in the villages and towns for these vagrants whom you or your subordinates considered worthy of relief?—You and I would not agree on that point. I would like that to be done by the parochial boards or parish authorities. I do not think the police should have anything to do with it. If they come under the notice of the police, good and well—there is the place provided for them, and the police would see that they were sent there.

11,791. (By Col. M'Hardy.) It is exceptional cases you mean?—Yes. If you put a thing like that upon the police, I am afraid we should bring a hornet's nest upon ourselves.

11,792. (By Dr. Sutherland.) How do you explain that in the year 1885 there were 760 convictions for these specific offences in your return, and that in 1893 there were 1494, about double the number—how do you explain the rise of 100 per cent.?—It is altogether difficult to explain. The county has very much increased in population within the last year or two. The burghs of Clydebank and Milngavie are also now trying their own cases, which they did not do before. It is the new police courts, the new railways under construction throughout the county, and things like that, I think, account for it. The drinking in the county, out of which many of these petty offences arise, is no doubt also going up.

11,793. Do many of the gipsy children die in infancy?—Not in my county.

11,794. Are you always informed of the death of gipsy children?—I think so; I do not think any escape us.

11,795. Who certifies the cause of death?—The Inspector of Poor is communicated with.

11,796. Who undertakes the burial?—The Sanitary Inspector of the district.

11,797. But you are not aware that the children of tender years die?—No; I think they are a very hardy class.

11,798. But the gipsy population is not increasing?—No.

11,799. The births are not equal to the deaths?—No.

11,800. Would that not indicate that the mortality is great?—Well, it would; but I have not had a case under my notice.

11,801. Have you ever had a case of a child overlain by a drunken mother?—Yes, I have had a case.

11,802. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Your arrests have increased very much during the last ten years?—They have.

11,803. You have said there were some exceptional causes for that; have the number of your constables been increased?—Yes.

11,804. Considerably?—Yes.

11,805. Do you find the number of arrests increases with the number of constables?—No, I don't know that I would say that. The population has increased, and that is the reason of the police increasing.

11,806. The Inspector of Constabulary would like you to have more constables?—We are reported as being under the required number.

11,807. How many more should you have, according to Captain Moure?—Four or five more.

11,808. Population to constables is low just now—that is to say, you are tolerably highly policed for a county?—No, I do not think we are.

11,809. The men who tramp through the county average about 200; do they go along some fixed route—you always get them along a certain line?—Well, there are resident tramps who never go out of the county at all. They reside in the villages, and go out through the district begging.

11,810. And come back the same night to the village?—Yes.

11,811. Well, that is something like what the Chief Constable of Roxburgh told us, that there are some of them that really belong to the parish, and others that belong to the county, and that some disappear on roads that go beyond the county?—Some of them belong to the parish, and some of them get off the parish. Some of the worst vagrants we have get outdoor relief. The Parochial Board does not give them much—perhaps 3s. a week—and they are often got begging in the country by the police.

11,812. Is that a common thing that the vagrant and the parochially-relieved poor are identical persons?—Well, I would not say it is common in all places.

11,813. Is it common in Dumbarton?—Pretty common.

11,814. What proportion of your 200 would be receiving parochial relief? Allowing for children, I suppose you would have about 100 adults wandering about?—Well, I am not prepared to give that, because I do not think that the officers in booking them state whether they are receiving parochial relief or not.

11,815. But, as a matter of general knowledge, you know that a considerable number of them are?—Yes.

11,816. Now, you have seen a good many country places—do you think you could get these tramps, beggars, habitual inebriates, and habitual offenders to work in a country place? Have you ever thought about what could be done with them?—No, I cannot say that I have; but I don't thoroughly understand what you mean.

11,817. Well, instead of sending these men frequently to jail, if you were to adopt some other treatment to try and reform them, could you suggest anything? Can you reform an habitual drunkard—these men who are continually disorderly?—No; but a good deal might be done before they get to be habitual drunkards.

11,818. In what way?—Because many of the people in the country who are disorderly, and have become habitual drunkards, have become so not through the love of drink, but through the custom of the country. Four or five persons may meet in a public-house, and they each stand a round, and in that way they have each four or five glasses of whisky within an hour, with the consequence that they become helpless as soon as they get into the open air. They are taken home by the police, or very likely to the police station. If they have been in a public-house where they get good whisky they are easily taken home, but if they have been in a public-house where new whisky is kept, they would fight with their own shadow.

Chief-Constable
M'Hardy.

20 Dec. 1894.

11,819. You were going to say something should be done for them?—I think we should try to strike at the custom of treating. If the licences were out of private hands, I think the treating custom would go. They are encouraged to go and club in the public-house, with the result that they are there in the same place every Saturday. They are considered mean if they do not stand their round. If you take the English, they each pay for their own drink, and don't stand rounds to the others. The Scottish people are kinder to each other; they stand round after round.

11,820. (By Miss Stevenson.) I understand you to say that the only way you can suggest of dealing with the tinker children would be that the local authority of the parish in which the child was born should take some supervision of him under the Education Act, or the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act?—That is my opinion.

11,821. But the difficulty is that under these Acts you cannot take hold of the child—you can only deal with the parents?—Well, I would go further than that. I would say that if the parent failed, you should take possession of the child, but that the child should be reared according to what the parent wished.

11,822. The difficulty in regard to the Industrial Schools Act is that, although the child is wandering, he is in the custody of his parents. The difficulty under the Education Act is that the parent can give, as a reasonable excuse, that there are no schools within three miles of their residence, and these people, wandering about the country, can keep at a safe distance from a school, and not be compelled to send the child. Do you think it would be a desirable thing that these children should be taken away from their parents altogether, and committed to certified industrial schools in the nearest place, where there happened to be one?—I would be pretty much in favour of that if the parents did not agree to send them to the schools in the districts in which they were born.

11,823. Do you think if proceedings were taken under the Education Act of 1883, and it was possible to get hold of the parent and bring him before the court, that in the case where the sheriff issued an attendance order at some particular school, in some particular district, the parent could be induced to take up his residence in that locality for the length of time specified in the order, say two, three, or four months?—That would be a very nice way if it could be carried out, but I think it would be difficult.

11,824. These people, I understand, are attached to their children, and, on the whole, are kind to them; do you think if the alternative were given to the parent of taking the child altogether, and putting him into an industrial school till he reached the age of fourteen years, or of attending school under an attendance order for a specified time, that it might have the effect of making the parent stay in a district?—I do think that would be an improvement. You are dealing with only one class; they are natives of certain counties; and you are giving them an option.

11,825. In reference to the certified pedlars, I think you said that the power of endorsing the certificate by the Chief Constable, when a pedlar passed from one county to another, was a means of controlling them?—It was.

11,826. The Chief Constable of Argyllshire, who was here, said he preferred not to have that power, because, in case of refusal to endorse, the pedlar could appeal to the sheriff, and that caused a great deal of trouble and expense?—That is one way to look at it, but I think you could hardly point to a case where it was done.

11,827. By this a chief constable has a certain hold on the pedlars to keep them in good order?—Oh, yes. I have had cases of people, who had got their certificates at Glasgow or in other places, whom I knew to be convicted thieves. Well, I did not want to deprive them of their certificates, but before I endorsed them they promise to behave. In regard to drunkenness, there is another statement I should like to make. I have noticed that people who are addicted to drink are very often those whose mothers have been addicted to drink before them. It is a matter of heredity; I have watched the thing most particularly.

11,828. (By the Chairman.) Have you got any instances?—Yes; and I can tell you them, too. One was of two women brought in the worse of drink to the police office. They had been together, and one of them had a child. They were both locked up, and the child was taken away. I took the opportunity of watching how the two women would be affected, and I found that the woman who had the child at her breast wakened up in two hours as sober as could be, while the woman without the child took five or six hours to waken up, and was very drowsy even then. When the mother of the child woke up and was sobered, the child was given back to her, and in three minutes the child got helplessly under the influence of drink, sucking the breast. I questioned the woman, and she told me that she had been advised by the doctor to take stimulants. This was her third child. I went to the doctor and told him what I had seen. He would not believe me at first, but latterly he admitted that there was a tendency that way.

11,829. Did he admit it in consequence of anything you showed him in the police office?—He admitted it from what I told him of what I had seen. He could scarcely believe that the child would get under the influence of drink in that way, but I was perfectly satisfied of it.

11,830. I do not know that that has very much to do with our inquiry?—Well, these children grew up to be twenty-one or twenty-two—respectable young men they were—without taking drink. At a marriage one night two of them broke off, and they would have gone through fire and water next morning to get more drink, while others who were locked up would not touch it. The flame was once kindled, and they could not resist the craving desire. [The witness then withdrew.]

MR. WM. MACKAY, Chief-Constable of Ayr, called in and examined.

Chief-Constable
Mackay.

11,831. (By the Chairman.) You are Chief Constable of Ayr?—Yes.

11,832. How long have you occupied that position?—I am into my tenth year.

11,833. And before that?—I was 23½ years in the Ayrshire constabulary.

11,834. There is one peculiarity about Ayr that we should like your explanation of. I have here a diagram, showing the ratio of apprehensions, according to population, for breach of the peace, petty assaults, drunk and incapable, and drunk and disorderly, and in that Ayr shows 44 people arrested in 1893 per thousand of the inhabitants, which is the highest ratio of arrests in Scotland, except in Glasgow?—We are peculiarly situated. It is the county town, and a great resort of excursionists. On a Saturday morning it is nothing uncommon to have 7000 excursionists in the town. A great many apprehensions follow, as many of them are miners and steel workers, who are rough when they get drunk. It is not our own population, so much as the races, and the militia, and the barracks. It is also a seaport, and the county prison, county hospital, and poorhouse all bring a gathering of people about them. Then there are a great many followers at the militia camp, and during the race week there is a great deal of crime.

Chief-Constable
Mackay.

*Chief-
Constable
Mackay.*

20 Dec. 1894.

11,835. But you have had all these things for a good many years, and you seem to get up in your apprehensions!—The population is increasing,

11,836. Your population has, since 1881, increased 24 per cent., but your apprehensions have increased 69!—These are the only explanations I can give you that I have mentioned.

11,837. In 1892 you seem to have had a very small number; you had only 898 apprehensions, against 1145 in 1893. Was there any explanation of that?—Well, I think in 1892 we had not such a great influx of people during the summer time.

11,838. In the return of crime and offences which you present, you give a return showing the number of times each person has been charged with crimes, offences, and contraventions before the police court during the year 1893, and also the number of convictions that habitual offenders have had of crimes or offences within the burgh?—Yes.

11,839. Have you got a copy of this for us?—No; that is the only copy I have got.

11,840. It shows that you had 1623 persons brought up once, 107 twice, 29 three times, 5 eight times, 6 six times, and 1 each six, seven, eight, and ten times?—Yes.

11,841. You have got here the number of convictions. You have two who have been convicted from 8 to 133 times?—Yes; and we have one just now 135 times.

11,842. You have got 52 convicted from five to ten times in their lives, and altogether you have got 143 who have been convicted from five to ten times, up to 135 times?—Yes.

11,843. Have you conceived any idea how you could deal with these habitual criminals?—It would appear in a great many cases that the prison has no effect upon them. I rather think if there were some home or establishment, other than the prison or the poorhouse, some good might be done.

11,844. How do you deal with drunks in Ayr?—We bring them up under the Police Act.

11,845. Do you let them out on pledge?—Yes, if they are not the old offenders. I have sent them out on pledges because the authorities do not want to be troubled with holding police courts every day. If we had only a couple of drunks we would let them out on pledge.

11,846. Would you turn them out without a pledge?—Since this new Act has been in force we have the power to do that. Previously we had not; now we can turn them out and cite them.

11,847. Up to 1892 you could not do that?—Only on pledge.

11,848. How many have you let out without a pledge since the new power has been given to you?—I do not think there has been any increase in letting them out on pledge.

11,849. But without pledge?—We have now and again one, but nothing to make a number.

11,850. I thought possibly you might have been able to tell us some change of policy which would have some effect?—Well, the magistrates do not seem to think that in these drunk cases the prison is of any use. It is a very common remark of the magistrate, when an offender comes up, to say to him that the prison seems to have no good effect, and he just passes some sentence, without taking advantage of the further powers to give them fourteen days.

11,851. Have you ever had cases of fourteen days?—Very few; not more than three or four in the year.

11,852. And it has not done any good?—No, not in Ayr.

11,853. You are in the centre of the county, where there are elaborate arrangements made for dealing with vagrants. It is some system of passes and tickets?—I do not think it is to our advantage in the burgh.

11,854. How does it affect the burgh?—It was quite a common occurrence for vagrants to arrive at the police office in the evening and ask for a ticket for bed. Well, we have no connection with this county arrangement, and they seemed quite disappointed because they were led to believe in the neighbouring villages that they would get a ticket in Ayr; and a great many of them come about us in that way that otherwise would not.

11,855. Vagrants are a communicative class, and they spread very quickly among themselves what all the arrangements for their class are?—They do ultimately get these tickets. They get them from charitable people, who have got them, and are prepared to give them out. But these people are greatly taken advantage of. They become known, and they are run upon.

11,856. How long has the system been in operation?—I think about ten or twelve years.

11,857. Your experience does not extend back though; you have been Chief Constable ten years?—Yes.

11,858. But you were connected with the Ayrshire police before?—I was an inspector in the Ayrshire constabulary previously.

11,859. I was going to ask you whether you could tell us if there had been any marked increase of vagrants in the burgh?—There is a marked increase every year just now when we take this census of vagrants twice a year.

11,860. Do you remember what the census of the vagrants was before this ticket system was introduced?—I could not give that. The census has only been taken for six years.

11,861. What are the total number of vagrants found in your burgh at the summer and winter census for the last three years?—At the census on Sunday, 25th June 1893, there were 272; and on Sunday, 24th December 1893, there were 154.

11,862. The estimates for the three years—1893, 1892, and 1891—are as follows:—1891 is 135, 1892 is 150, 1893 is 213; that is a very large increase?—Yes.

11,863. And you think it is due to the ticket system?—I attribute it partly to that.

11,864. What does the ticket entitle them to?—A bed for the night in a common lodging-house, and they have bread tickets that they get also.

11,865. I see there are a good number of vagrants and beggars and migratory poor returned as in the police cells—these are for shelter?—No, not for shelter, on charges. In the month of June the early potato digging begins in Ayrshire, and a great many of these parties get drunk and are locked up.

11,866. There is another peculiarity in your administration—you are not more strict in your taking up drunks and other petty offenders than in, say, Paisley?—No, I do not think that we are. Of course our area has been increased.

11,867. But that does not disturb the ratio. I mention Paisley because there are only 22 per 1000 arrested, but in Ayr the ratio of arrests is 44 per 1000. —But that great increase is accounted for by the visitors, excursionists, militia, cavalry training, and race course, and so on.

11,868. Is there much prostitution in Ayr?—There is too much of it with young girls who are not easily got at.

11,869. I mean do the police take cognisance of it?—We have only very few cases lately. I think the return begins with thirteen cases, and we have down to two or three in the year. In 1889 we had thirteen convictions, in 1890 we had four, in 1891 we had one, in 1892 we had three, and in 1893 we had two convictions.

11,870. Would there be many apprehensions?—We had a few apprehensions; but they are more particular in convicting parties under this Act now since some difficulties arose in Glasgow about apprehensions that were made. The authorities are very backward in convicting parties unless there is the clearest proof, and it is rather a difficult matter to get proof.

11,871. Has the difficulty to get convictions made arrests still fewer?—Well, the police are not very stringent.

11,872. They are less careful?—They are not anxious to bring parties to court, because they get such heckling in the court, and I think too much so.

11,873. Do you think the evil has increased in consequence of this laxity of the police, brought about by the causes you mention?—I am afraid it is. There are a great many young girls breaking away from their homes, and making their living by that.

11,874. And you think that has increased in number since the constables and authorities got frightened?—Yes, I think that did a great deal of harm.

11,875. What sentence do the Ayr magistrates generally impose in such cases?—Fourteen days.

11,876. (By Dr. Sutherland.) I find from your return that out of 1792 apprehensions 1623 were apprehended for the first time, and only appeared before the Court once?—Yes.

11,877. Does that not indicate that the police cells for a few hours, and a pledge left or a small fine, is a sufficient deterrent for 90 per cent. of the people?—There are a great many of these people strangers, who are only there for the time, and we have no experience of their conduct afterwards.

11,878. They are only once before your court?—Only once.

11,879. (By the Chairman.) You say only once before your court. You speak of excursionists, and you do not say that these people, who get drunk spending one day with you, may not get drunk at home?—We have no experience. I have four persons, habitual offenders, that I thought it might be worth while drawing your attention to. We have one woman who has appeared eighteen times before the court this year. She is one of these poor drunken unfortunates, going between the police office, the prison, and the poorhouse. There seems to be no way of dealing with these people.

11,880. How often has she been in the poorhouse?—I could not exactly say, but I have a list of her convictions here.

11,881. What do her convictions run on?—Mostly drunk and incapable, lying on stairs, exposing her person, also theft and assault, and so on.

11,882. (By Dr. Sutherland.) A prostitute?—She has no conviction that was for prostitution, but she has everything else. Then there is a woman, M. M——, 135 prosecutions since 1872. She has 20 for contravention.

11,883. What is that?—Lying in stairs and such like.

11,884. Could you get us the times this woman has been in the poorhouse?—Yes, I think so. I think I could get it from the Governor.

11,885. What would you do with these?—My idea is that these parties should be put into some home, and the prison authorities and Parish Councils pay so much for their support, as they practically live on them just now.

11,886. But would you have the police authorities pay nothing towards the cost? They give you a lot of extra work. You would be able to spare a constable or two if you got rid of these women, and perhaps a few police cells?—I am quite of opinion that it would lessen crime.

11,887. You feed and supervise her while she is in the police cell, and so on, and if you got rid of your habitual offenders you would reduce your expenditure?—No doubt about that.

11,888. Therefore it would be right that the municipal authorities should contribute something, would it not?—I think so. I think it would be reasonable, so far as they are relieved of such expense.

11,889. (By Miss Stevenson.) Have you more than one police station in Ayr?—No, just one.

11,890. Have you a police matron or female turnkey there?—We have what is called a female warder, who attends the females who require special attention.

11,891. But she is not there of necessity over-night when these women are brought in?—She is there every day, because she keeps the place clean.

11,892. But she is not there having an official position as female turnkey as in other places?—Only when we call her in. She lives conveniently, and we call her in to search, or when a woman is ailing. [The witness then withdrew.]

[ADJOURNED.]

TWENTY-THIRD DAY.

Glasgow, Friday, 21st December 1894.

PRESENT :—

Sir CHARLES CAMERON, Bart., M.P.

Dr. FARQUHARSON, M.P.

Professor DOVE WILSON.
Dr. J. F. SUTHERLAND.
Miss FLORA C. STEVENSON.

PROFESSOR JAMES DUNLOP, Glasgow, called in and examined.

Professor

Dunlop.

21 Dec. 1892.

11,893. (By the Chairman.) Would you please state your qualifications?—I am an M.D. of Glasgow University, Professor of Surgery in Anderson's College, lately Senior Surgeon of the Glasgow Royal Infirmary, Medical Legal Examiner of the County of the City of Glasgow, and I am Visitor or Vice-President of the Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons of Glasgow, and Senior Surgeon of the Glasgow Lock Hospital.

11,894. It is in regard to your experience in the latter capacity that we wish to ask you a few questions; have you any powers of detention?—None.

11,894A. There is a power of detention, I think, in what there remains of the Contagious Diseases Act in England, is there not?—I am not aware. We have never found in working our hospital that there was any need of any legislative procedure at all.

11,895. I was not asking regarding the need of it, because that would be beyond our remit. I wished, as a matter of precedent, to know whether there was any?—No, we have none, and we have never required it. I have never felt the want of power to detain a patient, my difficulty, rather, has been to get them to go out. When patients are sufficiently recovered, intimation is made to them that they will be ready to go out the following day. I frequently see that there is something wrong, and I ask them, 'Have you no home?' and they say 'No.' I never send out a patient who says 'I have no home at all to which to go.' We make some kind of provision whereby she may have a roof to cover her. I hand her over to the matron, and if she finds the case is one that she can improve or benefit, she arranges that the young woman is sent to some home.

Professor

21 Dec. 1894.

11,896. The Lock Hospital here is reformatory, as well as medical?—It is purely medical so far as the doctors are concerned, but the matron in her own way endeavours to do a good work. We do not permit the good work to interfere with the medical. We do not permit the reclamation element to bulk much, far if we did we would find the patients would not ask for admission. We allow no preaching by the medical staff. There is never any inquiry as to how the disease arose, or under what circumstances. We simply see the disease, and cure it if we can.

11,897. Does your experience lead you to believe that a large percentage of these women owe their situation to drink; or do you think that drink in many cases follows as the result of their occupation?—I think that drink follows as the result. A large number of our patients are young girls, sixteen to nineteen years of age, many of them about seventeen, and in many of these it is sheer wickedness, and there is no drink. It is simply a desire to be rid of the parental control.

11,898. And have many of these young girls passed through the hands of the police, or been in prison?—Very few. It is only the older ones who find their way to prison.

11,899. I suppose it is no part of your duty, nor possibly would it be expedient for you to make any such inquiries of them as would enable you to form an opinion of the deterrent effect of the police system on them?—I could not get information from them, but having been a surgeon for thirty years, and having been connected more or less with the police all that time, and being naturally observant, I can judge of the present condition of the city as compared with what it was twenty-five years ago.

11,899A. What is it?—Vastly improved. There is not the flaming vice, there are not the opportunities for young men going wrong now that used to exist. We have prostitution in the city of Glasgow, and we have importuning in the streets, but it is reduced to a minimum through the efficiency of the Glasgow Police Act.

11,899B. Have you any experience of Edinburgh?—Very little; but any experience that I have had leads me to think that Edinburgh is fully worse than Glasgow. Walking along Princes Street, for instance, from the Surgeons' Hall, as I often do, to the Caledonian Railway, I recognise unfortunate women in larger numbers than I could walking the same distance in the city of Glasgow.

11,900. To recognise women you took to be unfortunate women does not signify much, but have you been subjected to any more annoyance in Edinburgh than in Glasgow?—No; but we have this, that we treat the Edinburgh patients in Glasgow. They have got no Lock Hospital in Edinburgh.

11,901. And they come through here?—Yes, I think we have got several Edinburgh patients just now.

11,902. But our business deals not with prostitution itself, but with the offence of prostitution,—namely, loitering and solicitation?—Well, I am not familiar with that in Edinburgh at all.

11,903. My point in asking you was that the sentences differ in the two places. I wish to know if you could give us any information as to the results?—I can only speak very decidedly of the city of Glasgow, and it is very greatly improved. When I look back twenty-five years ago, there were houses with seven or eight or nine girls, many of them English girls from Nottingham. That was the town that supplied the prostitutes. Many of them had been lace sewing girls. Then on Saturday and Sunday we used to see them driving out in open carriages, gaily dressed, and accompanied by men.

11,904. You were surgeon of the police for many years?—Yes.

11,905. You must have visited the police offices?—Constantly.

11,906. What is the impression from visiting the police offices as to the possibility of cases, or any percentage of cases, that did not require police interference, having been subjected to arrest?—They are very few in number in my experience. I think the police are exceedingly lenient; and they also seem to me to be very careful. I might, perhaps, give you an example. Some boys coming from a West End school in the winter used to be importuned by a woman in Elmbank Street. I went myself, and had a look at her. A simple intimation to the police got her removed. We heard of her no more.

11,907. What I wanted to ask is this:—We have got in Glasgow 60 per 1000 persons arrested in 1893 for breach of the peace, petty assaults, drunk and incapable, and drunk and disorderly. In Govan there were only 20 per 1000, in Paisley 21 per 1000, in Leith 20 per 1000, in Aberdeen 24 per 1000, and in Edinburgh 19 per 1000. Now, how would you account for the extraordinary fact that the percentage of arrests per 1000 of population in Glasgow is nearly twice as much as in any other place?—It is in the population; we have a very wild population.

11,908. Wilder than Govan?—Yes, there is no city in the world that presents the same characteristics. The lowest stratum of the city of Glasgow is not to be compared with anything in the world. Go down the High Street on a Saturday night, and you see women and men having almost ceased to be human in their appearance.

11,909. And that sufficiently explains the difference?—Yes, and when I go in sometimes on a Saturday night to the Southern Police Office, the class of people that are brought in I never see except in the police office.

11,910. Have you any particular views on the subject of the treatment of habitual drunkenness, or the possibility of reclamation?—I would be very fond to see some means of reaching habitual drunkards. I have no special views, but I am in hopes that some day there will be some legislation that will meet not the case of the poor drunkard only, but that will meet the case of the rich drunkard as well.

11,911. What legislation?—Well, I think there ought to be some means whereby a husband might be locked up six or eight months to get the alcohol entirely out of his system, and give him a fair start again. In private work we see people who, in the first place, do not repent when they are well. They do not express any great sorrow at their having been very much intoxicated even for a week, and they do not resolve to amend. They are quite prepared to keep well for a time, and then by-and-by from some little excitement or otherwise they begin to drink again, and they drink for weeks, and have the delirium tremens. I would like to lock up these persons.

11,912. And you think these cases could be improved by compulsory separation?—Yes, I do, locking up the patient is the only remedy.

11,913. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you share the opinion that prostitutes and importuners are harshly dealt with in Glasgow?—I think they are not.

11,914. Is it possible, under the system by which women are convicted of importuning, that injustice might be done to innocent persons?—I think that a woman may be innocent, and still may be under circumstances in which there is a strong suspicion that she was very far from being innocent. A particular case in which I was a witness was that of a young woman, sister-in-law of a medical man in town, occupying a very respectable position. She herself was a virgin, but she was used as a decoy by a woman who was a prostitute.

11,915. Who proved the prostitution in that case?—There was no action against herself. There was an action simply against the woman in whose house she was found along with a man. In that case the householder said the young woman was not a prostitute, but the police said she was there for that purpose, and that the house was a brothel. The young woman denied that she was a prostitute, and offered herself, through her agent, for examination, and it was found that she was a virgin. But she was found in circumstances under which she ought not to have been.

11,916. From your opinion, would you say that prostitution and drunkenness are synonymous among that class of people?—Oh, no; there are young women in Glasgow prostitutes because they prefer it to work.

11,917. Take the majority; is prostitution not associated with inebriety?—It is, among the older women, because it is necessary for them to drink along with the victim.

11,918. Do you think that even thirty days—the maximum allowed by the Glasgow Police Act—is of any reformatory value?—I do not think it has any effect at all, except that it gives them a little turn of good health. As a general rule, they come out of prison physically improved.

11,919. And to prosecute their calling again?—Yes.

11,920. Supposing that inebriety and prostitution in the great majority of cases were intimately associated, would it not be desirable to detain the prostitute and inebriate for a long period for reformation?—I think that we should lock up the inebriate, but I am not quite prepared to say that we should lock up the other.

11,921. But if you found that a woman came before the Police Court in Glasgow, say thirty times in a year, and was convicted fifteen times of drunkenness and fifteen times of importuning, you would lock up that woman?—Yes.

11,922. (By Miss Stevenson.) I think you said you had a great many women from Edinburgh of the class you were speaking of, and that there was no lock hospital in Edinburgh?—Yes.

11,923. Are you aware that there is a large ward in the Infirmary set apart?—Yes; but they won't go there. Many of the patients decline going, for the reason that the ward is open to students. The Glasgow Lock Hospital is not open to students. The only persons who ever see the patients are, firstly, the surgeon and his assistant—his assistant at present, or rather for the last term of service, was a lady—and the nurse. Medically, these are the only persons who ever see the patients. The matron and governor simply see them officially, in order to enter their names in the register.

11,924. Do you find that the same girls and women come back to you at longer and shorter intervals?—Frequently they do; some of the young girls as often as five and six times in the year.

11,925. And there is no difficulty about their being admitted?—The door is open. All that a patient has to say is that she is suffering. There are no lines of admission, so that she does not need to go to this or that subscriber asking for a line. She merely rings the bell, asks to be taken in, and she is admitted.

11,926. From your experience of these girls, do you think there is any truth in the statement that a very large proportion of these in Glasgow, especially the young ones, are employed in shops, where their earnings are really insufficient?—Not in shops, but in mills. There is a difference between the shop and the mill. Many of them are mill girls.

11,927. Do you not find that any of them come from these eating and restaurant kind of shops? I saw a statement made in a report on the employment of girls in shops in Glasgow, that they were very insufficiently paid, had long hours, and that many of the unfortunates belonged to that class?—That is not my experience; but there is this to be mentioned, that there are so many schemes of a medical kind in every district of the city that girls in shops and mills receive medical treatment and medicine under the most favourable circumstances, and they don't apply to the hospital till they are practically compelled.

11,928. What number can you accommodate in your hospital?—Seventy-five.

11,929. What proportion of the beds are occupied?—Not the half. A very curious fact is that in the year 1869 we had 598 patients. Since that time the numbers have gone steadily down, till now our average would probably be something like 350 for the year. About twenty-six persons is perhaps the average per night in the hospital.

11,930. For what periods do you detain them?—The average is about twenty-three days, but you can readily understand that the average will be increased by one or two very severe cases. We take in cases from all over the west coast of Scotland. We have had them from Ardnurchan, Islay, Ayr, and Stranraer, and we have them also from Edinburgh, Hamilton, and other places, —not the city of Glasgow alone. We take all who come. Some of the country patients from Dundee and Perth are often very ill, and they may remain as long as nine months with us. You can readily see how that will increase the average. [The witness then withdrew.]

Miss Agnes
A. Bryson.

Miss AGNES ANN BRYSON, Glasgow, called in and examined.

Miss Agnes
A. Bryson.

11,931. (By the Chairman.) I understand you are lady visitor at the prison in Glasgow, and that you have great opportunity of talking with the female prisoners?—Yes; I have visited the prison for the last twenty years.

11,932. What do you find to be the effect upon them of sentences of ten, twenty, or thirty days? From what point of view do they regard them? Have such sentences much reformatory effect upon them?—Well, I don't know how they regard them, but we have always had a feeling that short terms are utterly useless.

11,933. Would you prefer longer terms?—Longer than they have just now. Many of them are sent in for a few hours, or a few days, which are quite useless. Another point perhaps I might mention is that we regard the gratuities that they get when coming out of prison as rather a hindrance than otherwise to them. Those that have had longer terms of sentence have pretty large gratuities, and they spend them in the public-house, and just get into prison again directly.

11,934. Then you are against the gratuity system?—Yes.

11,935. But you must have some system of rewards as well as of punishments to enforce discipline and keep them at their work?—Perhaps so, but the system of gratuities has very often been found to be a hindrance to them.

11,936. You talk about short sentences. Suppose there was a fallen girl you wished to try to reclaim. She at present is liable to get thirty days—and in many cases does get thirty days—would you, with a view to reforming her, be inclined to inflict a longer term, or do you think thirty days sufficient?—It depends upon the case. These habitual drunkards, who cannot keep sober if they have got a few pence in their pockets, would require to be kept very much longer than that; but thirty days for an ordinary girl just taken off the streets is quite sufficient.

11,937. These girls taken off the streets are committed one time for being drunk and incapable, another for breach of the peace, another for assault, and often for importuning: they ring the changes on different charges?—Drink is at the bottom of every one, more or less.

11,938. Do you think that?—Yes.

11,939. Do you think that the drink precedes the downfall?—Generally the drink precedes the downfall, that is my opinion.

11,940. That is what they tell you?—No, it is not what they tell us, but what we know as a positive fact by following up the cases.

11,941. In the case, at all events, of these imprisoned petty offenders the drink?—Goes along with their other offences.

11,942. And precedes the downfall of the girl?—Usually.

11,943. Do you do anything in the way of looking after the women when they come out of prison?—Yes, we have a home in Whitevale. That was the outcome of our first years of prison visiting. The Whitevale Mission Shelter has now always seventy women in it. As one goes out far more are willing to come in. They come of their own accord.

11,944. How long do you keep them?—We keep

Miss Agnes
A. Bryson.

21 Dec. 1894.

them now for a year, and, if they stay, we pay them a small wage.

11,945. Do you give them a wage or an outfit?—We have given them a wage till this year; but we are now trying a different system, because the last was not self-supporting. We are trying to make it more self-supporting. They are now to get at the rate of about £3 a year in clothing if they stay.

11,946. The £3 would be invested in an outfit?—Yes. Formerly they got a small rate of wages, about 6d. a day, more or less, according to their work, and we kept the wages till they got out.

11,947. That was at the rate of £8 or £9 a year?—That is for a year, but they did not all get that; it just depended on the work they did.

11,948. You say that you find a great number of women willing to take the place of every one who goes out, which shows that there are a number wishing to get the opportunity of pulling round, and you mentioned that the wages under the former system, when the rush existed, were somewhere about 6d. a day?—It is not 6d. a day all the year round; it is just according to the work. You might take the average under the old system at £3 a year.

11,949. And that sum was practically invested in the outfit?—Yes; but we went on a different system from the other homes. Sometimes the women would not have the clothing, and they wanted the money.

11,950. Would you have them going out having earned probably £3 or £4?—Yes, about that on the average.

11,951. Now you propose to change the system, and give them only an outfit?—Yes, just because the home was not self-supporting.

11,952. But you have not commenced the new system yet?—Yes; this year. We take the women now for one year instead of the shorter period.

11,953. Do you find the women are as willing to come to you when they are virtually working for reduced wages?—Yes; the home is quite as full.

11,954. And as many applications for every vacancy as formerly?—I think so.

11,955. They work at what?—Washing, laundry work, and sewing.

11,956. These appear to be the only industries that are current in any of these homes?—Yes; we have more washing than the House of Shelter in Hill Street, which is our sister home.

11,957. Are the two homes in partnership?—We are in partnership, but work quite separately.

11,958. Is your home on the same principle as the Hill Street place?—It is not on the same line as to wages.

11,959. I understand you represent the Free Breakfast for the prisoners?—Yes.

11,960. Can you tell us anything about what is done in the way of getting work for the female discharged prisoners?—A number of the women are taken to the different shelters, whichever can take them in. Usually they are brought to the Mission Shelter.

11,961. Have you got the numbers?—About 3000 pass through our hands in the year,—that is to say, take the free breakfast.

11,962. How many discharges are advised to you?—I should say about that number. I mean for getting help. They are not advised to the Free Breakfast from the prison.

11,963. But you are advised of the discharge from prison of every one who has got a gratuity of 4s. or over?—Yes.

11,964. (By Col. M'Hardy.) And not only that but your visitors are allowed inside the prison, and know the prisoners?—Yes.

11,965. (By the Chairman.) You have, I see, got 3300 who come to your Breakfast; of these you can only place a few in the homes—how many?—The largest number I think are habitual drunkards who cannot be received into the homes.

11,966. Would you say there would be 2000 of them habitual drunkards?—I should think there would be quite that, counting some many times there.

11,967. That would leave you about 1300 who are not habituals?—Yes.

11,968. How many of these would you manage to get into the homes in a year?—I could not exactly say.

11,969. You could not possibly get 200, looking to the accommodation?—In all the homes in a year I should think so.

11,970. The admissions during the year at Stirling Road Home, Lochburn, Hill Street and Whitevale amount to 443, but these would not be all your women?—Oh, no.

11,971-2. I suppose not more than half of them would be your women, from what we saw in Hill Street?—I don't know that they would; they don't all go from the Free Breakfast.

11,973. Say 200 go from the Free Breakfast, that would leave you still 1100?—But some girls go direct perhaps from the street to the other homes.

11,974. Then say there were 300, or even 400 if you like, that would leave you 900 non-habituals to account for; would you tell us what you would do for them?—I can only answer for these who are in our own place.

11,975. You attend the breakfast table?—Yes.

11,976. You don't try to get the girls work outside?—We try to get those who are suitable into some home.

11,977. But you can only send them to Whitevale Shelter?—No, we send them to all the homes—wherever we can get them in.

11,978. Stirling Road, Lochburn, Hill Street and Whitevale?—Hill Street, Whitevale and Stirling Road. Lochburn does not receive them direct. They go there through Stirling Road.

11,979. The total admissions during the year to these homes were 443; on the most extravagant assumption you could not have sent 400 of these 443?—No.

11,980. Though you did, it would still leave 900, and, if you have the information, I would like you to explain what efforts are made to protect and advance the other 900—the 900 that are apart from the 2000 habituals?—I can only answer for the some 300 or so that pass through our hands in the year. Of course all the other homes go on the same system in trying to do the same thing for them, and in getting situations for them.

11,981. But there is a gap in our information as to the way of helping these 900?—They probably go back to their old ways. The 900 can be accounted for by some of the same women getting breakfast every two or three weeks all the year round.

11,982. Do you see many juvenile offenders, young girls?—Yes; up to sixteen.

11,983. But, since the law was altered enabling the magistrates to send to reformatories up to sixteen, have there been many?—Yes, a good many young girls.

11,984. How many?—I could not say.

11,985. We were round the prison the other day, and found two under sixteen?—We have not the means of knowing how many are in prison.

11,986. I suppose you agree with us that it is very undesirable to send young people to prison?—Yes.

11,987. In the case of boys the magistrates have the discretion of birching in place of sending to prison; is that an alternative you would advocate for boys?—Well, I don't know. I don't approve of whipping.

11,988. Of course in the case of girls it is out of the question. Is there any alternative you could suggest for imprisonment in the case of girls—of course there is sending them to reformatories?—Many of them are sent to us instead of to prison for the first offence.

11,989. But then, of course, they can walk out as soon as they like?—Yes, but then they don't get any payment or advantage at all.

11,990. But they don't do any work so that that does not matter to them?—We engage with them for a year.

11,991. That is quite right, but if they choose to go at the end of a week?—Then they just go with their rags on.

11,992. But they escape imprisonment by having been sent to you as an alternative?—That is so.

Miss Agnes
A. Bryson.

21 Dec. 1894.

Miss Agnes
A. Bryson.

21 Dec. 1894.

11,993. Can you suggest any other kind of work than sewing and knitting and washing for these people in prison or out of prison?—These are the principal; I cannot say others.

11,994. (By Miss Stevenson.) Are you working with the Prison Aid Society?—Not exactly; there is a connection with the Prison Aid Society but not in the homes.

11,995. How do these girls come to the breakfast?—We have a Bible woman who meets them at the gate. She is not paid by the directors of the House of Shelter but by private means. It was, in the first place, through a legacy that was left specially for the purpose of employing a Bible woman, lately an additional sum from the Prison Aid Society.

11,996. Does she see the girls inside the prison?—Yes; she can see a special case, but she goes to the inner gate of the prison to meet them.

11,997. Is there any lady or female agent of the Prison Aid Society who sees these girls in the prison?—Not except the Bible woman.

11,998. There is no one visits them in the cells?—Not in connection with the Prison Aid Society. We have fifteen lady visitors who visit in the prison, but not in connection with the Prison Aid Society.

11,999. (By Col. M'Hardy.) I may say that is more a technical point than a practical one, for you are really doing the Prison Aid Society work; that is to say, you are aiding discharged prisoners along lines of your own?—That is so.

12,000. (By Miss Stevenson.) How long have you been in the habit of visiting the prison?—Twenty years.

12,001. Do you see a large increase in the number of girls who are sent in for street offences—importuning for instance?—I could not exactly answer that. I think that the numbers were equally large for that offence when we first began.

12,002. Do you see any difference in the age of that class of women who come in?—No.

12,003. They are not younger now than they were 10 or 20 years ago?—I do not think so. I do not think there is very much difference in that respect.

12,004. (By Col. M'Hardy.) I want to put a question to bring out clearly the position of the Homes Committees; you have every facility that you need or desire for seeing prisoners inside the prison, and arranging for them on their discharge?—We have every facility. [The witness then withdrew.]

Mr. Alexander
Thomson.

MR. ALEXANDER THOMSON, Governor of Maxwelltown Prison, called in and examined by the CHAIRMAN.

Mr. Alexander
Thomson.

12,005. We understand that you have been very successful in devising means for the employment of prisoners, and in persuading prisoners with no great natural taste for work to turn themselves to industries?—There have been no failures.

12,006. How do you manage that?—Well, there is a set minimum task for all prisoners. They are shown how to perform that task, and it is so set that any man can accomplish it. Then, for a greater degree of industry, they earn marks according to a scale, and by that secure a gratuity on liberation.

12,007. But that is the case all through?—Yes; it is the case all through the prisons.

12,008. But I understand you have been exceptionally successful, and that you have been able to deal with cases that have not worked at all satisfactorily in other hands?—There is sometimes a difficulty in dealing with some men that are persistently lazy, but by persisting in giving them the work, and showing them that they may do a great deal more, and that they may earn marks and secure a gratuity, most of them come to work. Indeed they all come to work. They all do the minimum task, and the great majority of them come up very well for gratuity.

12,009. The amount of gratuity is limited to a certain extent?—Yes; four marks is the utmost that any prisoner can earn daily.

12,010. And do you require a greater amount of work to give them the marks, or is that regulated?—It is regulated very much by the medical officer's opinion in the case.

12,011. But, let us understand; is the minimum work regulated by the medical officer?—Well, no, it is not. The minimum task is so low that any man can do it unless the medical officer says he is unfit.

12,012. But the medical officer has nothing to do with giving marks?—Not the ordinary marks; but the minimum task is set so low as to meet all cases where the man is at all willing to work.

12,013. But what I ask is this:—Is this system of so much work for so many marks regulated by you as an individual, or is it laid down by the Prison Board or some central authority?—It is approved of by the Commissioners.

12,014. And is uniform throughout the prisons?—In some prisons there is labour that is not found in others, such as quarrying, and stonebreaking.

12,015. What labours have you?—Stonebreaking, sack-repairing, hair-teasing.

12,016. Oakum?—No; not now.

12,017. How is that?—Because it is not needed. We have been able to get other employment. I have been able to find other work without employing any at oakum.

12,018. Have you any other industries? What do you employ your women at?—They repair sacks, pick hair, and do the domestic work of the prison such as washing, and so on.

12,019. But have you any special form of industry for them?—No; it is not necessary for all the numbers. The number is always low.

12,020. How many women have you?—There will be an average of eight daily.

12,021. How many men?—I think forty-six is about the average.

12,022. I find in the Rules and Instructions for Prisons in Scotland a general principle is laid down as to the awarding of marks, but of course the actual awarding of them falls upon the warders, and they act under general instructions again from the governor?—Yes.

12,023. So that there may be some difference, based on the individual differences of governors and warders, but an attempt is made to ensure uniformity?—Yes.

12,024. How many men are not sufficiently provident to care to pile up any marks? How do you manage to persuade them to be industrious?—Well, they must do the minimum task or they render themselves liable to punishment.

12,025. Which consists in?—Reduction of diet.

12,026. And that, of course, is the same thing all round?—Yes.

12,027. You have more punishments than reduction of diet?—Well, sleeping on guard beds, but sentences under thirty days have to do that in any case.

12,028. Do you require to have recourse to much punishment?—Yes, at times, chiefly for idleness.

12,029. Which do you find most efficient?—The guard bed.

12,030. And reducing the food?—Both, at times.

12,031. Supposing you had eighty women, could you think of any way to employ them?—Yes.

12,032. What?—Well, I would find sack-repairing—a very good employment.

12,033. You can get any amount of sack-repairing apparently?—Yes, I could, if it were necessary.

12,034. In Perth Prison we found there were a number of sacks made for Dundee, but we were told that the industry was very fluctuating; is sack-repairing a steady trade?—It is increasing every year since I commenced in the place I am now in, and we get it from a large district—from Annan, from Sanquhar, and from Castle Douglas.

12,035. How does it pay?—Very well as compared

Mr. Alexander Thomson. with other prison industries, which are all poorly paid.

21 Dec. 1894. 12,036. Take stonebreaking; you must make some profit on the stones?—Oh yes.

12,037. What wage per man would you earn at stonebreaking?—He may average tenpence a day.

12,038. He earns for you tenpence a day?—Yes; one that is fairly well up—one that is earning marks.

12,039. Well, take the average?—About tenpence a day.

12,040. And at sack-repairing?—Sixpence.

12,041. Therefore stonebreaking is better than sack-mending?—Oh yes, but the one with the other suits very well.

12,042. The one for dry weather and the other for wet?—Well, yes; it suits well everything, and it meets certain cases. There are some prisoners that don't do to be associated. They are not associated exactly in the prison yard, but they are within sight of each other. Defiant men, who have a bad effect on others, are better to be kept in solitary confinement till they earn a good many marks, and then they behave better for fear they lose the marks.

12,043. What do you make out of hair-teasing?—About sixpence a day.

12,044. Hair-teasing is very disagreeable work, is it not?—Yes, it is dirty a little, but it is beaten well in the open air before being taken into the cells.

12,045. You don't do anything at mat-making?—No; it is not necessary.

12,046. How do you find it pay?—It would pay very well where there are prisoners under long sentences, but not in a prison where the greater number are under short sentences. In a short sentence they do not acquire sufficient knowledge in mat-making to do it well.

12,047. One point we particularly wish to ask you about is this. Supposing it seemed good to the Committee to recommend some system of adult reformatories for the treatment of habitual offenders, it would probably be considered desirable that they should work. That would enter as an important part into the reformatory scheme. We have had any amount of evidence as to possible employments for men, but we have had rather a paucity of suggestions as to possible employments for women. Could you give us any light on that matter? Of course you have got washing, and sewing and knitting. But washing work seems to be overstocked, and you could not have female reformatories all over the country for the habitual offenders, and confine them to washing and these industries?—Washing is a very good industry.

12,048. But we are sick of washing?—Well, there is sack-making.

12,049. But you could not employ a large number at that?—Oh yes; all the female prisoners that could be had in Scotland for that purpose, I am sure.

12,050. Sacks?—Yes; both new and repairs.

12,051. Is there such a market for repairs?—No, there is no demand, but the work would have to be got as all work is, by asking it from employers.

12,052. But people would not keep sacks simply for the purpose of getting them repaired. The amount of work that can be done in the way of repairing sacks is measured by the amount of sacks in use, and worn into holes?—The railway companies have large quantities of sacks. I don't know what they are doing now, but they used to send a very great number to prison to be repaired. I think before I left Edinburgh Prison there would be an average of 500 or 600 daily.

12,053. Did the 500 or 600 per day exhaust the wants of the railway companies that sent these sacks?—Yes; but there was sack-making as well, and we could have given more work if we had had hands.

12,054. There is no lack of work in that direction?—No.

12,055. It has been suggested that, as a lot of women who have been engaged in textile work in mills and so forth, find their way into the class of habitual offenders, they might be employed in a small factory of some of the more easily manufactured fabrics; do you think that would work at all?—I do not think it would be a profitable business.

12,056. Have you had any outcry against your sack repairing as competing with outside work?—None; I think the inducement is that it is better done.

12,057. In prison than out of it?—Yes; if the work is carefully looked after, it is certainly better done.

12,058. Do your customers admit that?—They admit it by sending all they have to do.

12,059. How do you ensure that?—They are carefully examined before being let outside, so that there is no cause for complaint.

12,060. You don't do anything in the way of sack-making?—No; it is not necessary there. It is not a district for that, and it is not a jute manufactory district such as Forfarshire.

12,061. Would sack-repairing not be hard work?—Not the least. Most of them who are employed at work at all—of course it is hard work that they do—they can all do it very well and expeditiously after a little training.

12,062. At one time, I think you were in Dumbarton and in Edinburgh?—Yes; nearly ten years in Edinburgh.

12,063. In what capacity?—Well, I commenced as a warder, kept the civil prison for debtors, then was steward or storekeeper. After that I was appointed to Dumbarton in 1876, and was there for nearly seven years under the old County Board.

12,064. And you were at Inverness?—Yes, for three or four years.

12,065. I suppose you had a good opportunity of seeing the working of the administration of justice in different places; have you been struck at all with the diversity of sentences for the same offence? Take an offence such as drunk and incapable or prostitution or solicitation; have you been struck at all with different sentences imposed in different places?—Yes; the sentences vary very much in any one place.

12,066. And still more in different places, I suppose?—Well, I can't say that. It depends very much on the magistrate where sentence is pronounced.

12,067. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you keep prisoners for 18 months and two years?—Yes.

12,068. Have you got many in close or separate confinement for that period?—Only those in separate confinement, unless associated on medical grounds.

12,069. That is to say, you keep a man or woman for 18 months or two years in separate cells?—Yes.

12,070. And the only period he has free from the cell is an hour a day?—No, he may be 10 hours a day.

12,071. But I am speaking now of the prisoner who is in solitary confinement for 23 out of the 24 hours; you have had such cases?—Yes; but not for 18 months.

12,072. Do you believe it is a good thing for a man or woman physically to be kept in solitary confinement for 23 out of the 24 hours for a period of 12 or 18 months?—I do not think so.

12,073. What do you notice about men or women so kept who are not allowed to work outside?—It increases the idleness. They coil themselves up in the cell, and they come to like that, although it is not the best thing for them.

12,074. Do you notice any change in complexion?—Yes; pale.

12,075. So that you are not in favour of any extension of the system under which a young man or young woman would be kept in solitary confinement for more than nine months, which is the period prescribed for convicts?—No; not more than three months, unless characters who would destroy the outside parties.

12,076. (By Col. M'Hardy.) In regard to the labour that you can get out of prisoners; a great many of the prisoners enter prison with very confirmed habits of idleness?—Yes.

12,077. But you find that, by some means, it is possible to take them out of that state in most cases?—In all cases.

12,078. Can you really get every idle person to become a very industrious person?—Not very industrious, but he becomes sufficiently industrious to per-

Mr. Alexander Thomson.

21 Dec. 1894.

Mr. Alexander Thomson. form his task without pressure, after a few weeks' training.

21 Dec. 1894.

12,079. Can you tell the Committee on what lines you go in effecting that reformation on a man?—The prisoner is kept strictly by himself, and, if punishment has to be resorted to, care is taken that he does not associate with the others, so as to be encouraged in his defiant attitude. He soon comes to find that it is to his interest to pull up with the work. He is kept away from the others and he finds that dreary. Then the work he is employed at is less desirable than he might have if he were working in an open yard.

12,080. Breaking stones and so forth?—Yes.

12,081. Do you think if you collected a large number—say a couple of hundred—of the habitual offender class—habitual inebriates say, that it would be possible to rouse them up within a year to really active habits?—A couple of hundred of such men would vary much and be composed of all sorts. You have the criminal, and, although not under a long sentence, he may be the very worst character amongst this class. That is a difficulty.

12,082. Well, but you think it would be practicable to really get in time these associated habitual offenders into good, industrious form?—Yes, I do.

12,083. You cannot suggest anything further beyond what you have stated to the Chairman about occupation for females?—I cannot, because I have never had to look out for it. It is something I have never had to go in quest of; I have always had sufficient employment for my numbers.

12,084. I suppose that, in the variety of occupations, there are some which the prisoners are more ready to be industrious at than others?—There are, but a good deal of outside employment is the best for bringing up prisoners.

12,085. The best for developing physical activity?—Yes, taking out the laziness of that sort who coil themselves up in the prison cells. All old jail-birds are fond of cell work. [The witness then withdrew.]

Mr. William Napier.

WILLIAM NAPIER, Governor of Greenock Prison, called in and examined by the CHAIRMAN.

Mr. William Napier.

12,086. You are governor of Greenock Prison?—Yes.

12,087. How long have you held that position?—Eight years, but I have been thirty-five years connected with the police and prisons altogether.

12,088. Before Greenock you were at Jedburgh and Dunfermline?—Yes, as governor of the prisons. I was also at Airdrie.

12,089. And before that you were connected with the police force in Fife?—Yes.

12,089A. Now, I understand, you don't think that imprisonment is of any use in the case of habitual offenders?—Not very much, if any.

12,090. Have you any experience of weak-minded prisoners?—A little.

12,091. Have you any in just now?—I have.

12,092. Give us an example?—I have one in just now who has been in 196 times, and he is nothing else but weak-minded, else he would not be there. His name is M'C—.

12,093. Just give us M'C—'s history?—He is a labourer on the quays at Greenock when working, and is about fifty-five years of age. He began to drink occasionally and every now and again he goes off into drunken sprees and is brought to prison. During the last six or seven times he has been in he has been just like a lunatic.

12,094. Is he in that state at present?—Yes; you could hardly make anything of him. He forgets himself. There are several others of his sort, but I have not noted down the names. There is one case that comes from Campbeltown repeatedly, and he just goes between the Campbeltown Poorhouse and the prison in Greenock. He is seventy-nine years of age. That is a case in which the man ought to be compelled to stay in a poorhouse.

12,094A. But, probably, the parochial people in Campbeltown think it is cheaper to have him with you?—I have no doubt of it. He prefers to be with me because he has a cell for himself and gets more peace.

12,095. What is he generally in for?—Petty assaults and drunkenness.

12,096. Theft?—No, never.

12,097. What are his sentences?—The Campbeltown people are pretty smart with their sentences; they generally give sixty days and thirty days.

12,098. For drunkenness?—For drunkenness and petty assaults.

12,099. A man of seventy-nine does not seem to be a very formidable assailant?—He may be bad enough when he is drunk and a stick in his hand, which he carries.

12,100. It is not simple drunkenness?—Oh no; it is very few cases of simple drunkenness we have. They generally are intoxicated and commit offences afterwards.

12,101. Does he ever explain to you how he manages to get drunk when he lives in the poorhouse?—They easily get out, and when they get out kind friends are usually ready for them. We find that at the prison gate too. We find that friends meet the prisoners as they go out, and the first thing they do is to put a half gill over their throat and a pipe in their cheek, and they are ready for another offence.

12,102. You say M'C— is weak-minded?—Yes; and the Campbeltown man is weak-minded in a certain sense.

12,103. After M'C— has been in with you he pulls round again?—Yes; but you see an amount of weakness about him.

12,104. What would you do with him?—I would compel him to remain in the poorhouse.

12,105. But, if he did not care to be kept in, he would soon commit another offence, and you would get him again?—No. If they had compulsory powers to keep him in the poorhouse they would keep him there.

12,106. But, if he wanted to get out of the poorhouse, he might commit some offence and get to you again?—Well, I think if they had the power they would control him better.

12,107. Take the Campbeltown man; I suppose you have not any of his poorhouse records?—None.

12,108. They have a poorhouse in Campbeltown?—Yes.

12,109. You have got an old woman, a Julia M'A—?—She is another who is weak-minded; very much given to theft when she is out. In fact, I got her into the poorhouse last time after she served three months with us. She was just in three weeks when she managed to get out. She walked right into Greenock, got a little whisky, and went to a shoemaker's shop and lifted three or four pairs of children's boots, and got sent back to prison for six months.

12,110. Has she any delusion about children requiring boots?—No; she has a delusion that she can get so much money for the boots, and get so much more whisky. That is her object.

12,111. Then, that does not display absolute weak-mindedness, but I understood she had some delusion about children wanting boots?—I do not think she has that at all.

12,112. What is her record?—She has been 35 years in prison altogether, and she has been in almost every prison in Scotland.

12,113. You think she is weak-minded?—I do, or she would not continue in that state, but not sufficiently weak-minded to cause the medical officer to say that she is fit for the asylum. That is the difficulty we have.

12,114. Do you think her sufficiently fatuous to be confined?—It would be better for society at large and for herself to be kept in the poorhouse.

12,115. What is her line of offence?—Always theft.

Mr. William Napier.
21 Dec. 1894.

12,116. Does she take anything she can lay her hands on?—The first thing that she can lay her hands on, and she does it deliberately too. She does not go forward in a hidden way. She will go straight up to a shop door and lift the first thing she can. That is where I think she shows the weakness.

12,117. It does not matter whether it is boots or anything else?—No. For instance, she went into a jeweller's shop the time before last, and walked away with a bronze statue of Burns, and the shopman looking at her.

12,118. When she is with you do you get her to understand the prison rules and conform to them?—Not to conform to them in a certain sense. She has been reported frequently, but, knowing she is weak-minded, I don't punish her. She has a mania for stealing, even in the prison.

12,119. What has she done there?—She steals various articles. If she can get outside for a minute she will steal another prisoner's oakum, or food or whatever she can get. She seems just to have a sort of desire to take things.

12,120. Kleptomania?—Yes; anything within her reach she is sure to take.

12,121. And if anything is lost?—We just go to her, and we get it.

12,122. Does she make any fuss about giving it up?—No; she just laughs as if she had done a smart thing.

12,123. That would almost indicate a mental weakness sufficient to justify her being consigned to a lunatic asylum?—But the doctors connected with the poor-house in Greenock are not willing to do that.

12,124. They would rather the Prison Authorities keep her?—Yes.

12,125. What is the cost of keeping that woman for 35 years?—Taking it at £20 a year, it would amount to £700.

12,126. You have handed in some notes here, in which you make the suggestion that drunk and incapable should be altered to intoxicated and incapable, as the charge is too strong, and sometimes difficult to establish?—Well, it is very hard to state when a man is really drunk.

12,127. Well, but the charge is not drunk, and not even drunk and incapable, but drunk and incapable and not being in charge of some person that can look after them?—That is so, but intoxicated would put us to little trouble to prove that they were intoxicated, while we could not but with difficulty prove that they were drunk.

12,128. But, don't you get enough of men in at present?—I don't want them sent to prison while they are intoxicated.

12,129. But they are not sent while intoxicated?—No, but it takes about a week or fortnight, and even three weeks, to get them round when they are intoxicated. For instance, I have got a woman in since Monday, and she won't be clear in the head for a week or so yet. I have had them for three weeks before you could say that they were in their ordinary senses.

12,130. You would advocate a more prolonged detention of these people?—Quite so. I would give them not less than three weeks. That is to say, I do not want them to be brought in there for being drunk and incapable, or intoxicated and incapable at all. I would give them a chance to get away home, but, when you really find that they will drink and continue drinking, then, I should say, not less than three weeks for them. For instance, drunk and breach of the peace, or drunk and disorderly, I should send to prison for three weeks. In my estimation, it is no use giving them less.

12,131. You say that in many cases prisoners are charged as a first offence, whilst, in reality, it may be the tenth or twentieth, as he may have figured in all the courts of the city, as well as in all the towns in the neighbourhood on similar charges; do you see any practical means to obviate that?—I think that the proper way to do is to find out the previous convictions, and charge them with these convictions, so that the magistrate may know what sort of a character he has before him

12,132. But, if he had previous convictions in other towns, how would you get these to charge him with them?—His description would be sent round.

12,133. But not for petty offences?—But it could be done quite the same as for serious offences.

12,134. That would make a tremendous business of it?—Well, perhaps it would.

12,135. For instance, if you got all the convictions for drunk and disorderly, and assaults, and so on, sent down to you in Greenock, I doubt whether even you would care to wade through them?—No, we would not wade through them. Suppose a person had been convicted a hundred times in Glasgow, we would just put that on the libel.

12,136. Yes, but suppose he goes down to Greenock and gives you a change of name?—Well, but if we are able to trace him.

12,137. As a matter of fact, we have been told that the habitual drunkard or the habitual offender in connection with drunken offences generally sticks about the same spot?—That is true, and therefore we know a good deal about them.

12,138. And, even if he went to Greenock, he would soon run up the tale of convictions?—Yes. There is one thing, I think, and that is that the magistrates should exercise their full powers. They seldom go beyond seven days, and fourteen days is considered a heavy sentence. They have the power to give thirty days and sixty days in some cases.

12,139. You have been in other places; what was the run of sentences for drunk and incapable, say, at Jedburgh?—They generally are about the same thing—fourteen days.

12,140. You don't mean to say that they give fourteen days at Jedburgh? Is it under the Police Act?—Well, it is a very small burgh, and we get the most of our cases from the county.

12,141. Well, in the county, the most punishment they had under the old Act was five shillings or twenty-four hours?—Yes.

12,142. In Dunfermline they would possibly have a Police Act of their own; what was the usual sentence there for drunk and incapable?—2s. 6d., or three days; 5s. or five days; and 7s. 6d. or fourteen days.

12,143. But, I suppose, there were precious few of fourteen days in Dunfermline?—Yes.

12,144. Well now, you come to Greenock, where the magistrates give you fourteen days; do you find the people there any more sober than in Dunfermline or in Jedburgh?—Not one whit.

12,145. Does that not argue against the efficiency of these long sentences in cases that are not confirmed? I would not advocate the long sentences, if the short sentences would do them good, but I think the long sentences would do them good.

12,146. For intoxication without any aggravation, do you think that an admonition would be sufficient?—I do think so, even for two or three times.

12,147. But, in charges with an aggravation of violence or anything of that sort, the sentence should be not less than a week and not more than six weeks, with an alternative of 1s. per day; that is your suggestion?—Yes.

12,148. You advocate an Inebriate Home; would not something in a shape of an adult reformatory meet the wants of your clients?—Quite as well.

12,149. What sort of work would you employ them at in these Inebriate Homes?—I would expect nothing to be there but old men, because they are pretty old before they get convicted so often.

12,150. Well, we need not run up the tale to a couple of hundred times?—At that figure you would have very few.

12,151. Take a more moderate number of, say, half a dozen times in a year, or ten or fifteen times in three years?—Well, every case would require to be studied upon its merits.

12,152. But you could not very well take charge of all these people without getting some work for them, because you would turn them out without training. Can you suggest any sort of work?—I cannot. After

Mr. William Napier.
21 Dec. 1894.

Mr. William Napier. all my time in prisons, I cannot suggest any kind of work, unless farm work.

21 Dec. 1894. 12,153. What sort of work have your men? Do you do anything at sack-making or mending?—We do no sack-mending, but preparing Manilla pays very well, although we did not go and ask for it. We had sack-mending a while, but the townspeople objected to it, as it was doing away with the work of the poor people. It is like many other things in prison; we dare not go against the public in taking certain work into prison.

12,154. Could you have got as much work at sack-mending as you could have taken?—We could have got more than we were able to do.

12,155. Who mended the sacks, or are they mended now?—The women of the poorer classes in Greenock go to the stores and carry them away in dozens, take them home and mend them there, and get so much for it. They objected to us getting the work, and they told the manufacturers that they would not work for them if they sent sacks to the prison.

12,156. Then, have you tried sack-making?—No, we cannot get it to do at Greenock.

12,157. Have you tried stone-breaking?—No, I requested the town surveyor to let me do that, but he would not allow it. There was another objection there of depriving poor people of work.

12,158. Hair-teasing?—We do a little at that.

12,158A. But you must interfere with some people outside?—No, they don't care. It has to be quickly done, and we can do it quickly.

12,159. You still stick to oakum?—Yes, but we only do that as the last resort. We have Manilla-teasing—that is, opening up the knots in Manilla for making ropes. We make good money at that.

12,160. Have you had any protest against that?—None whatever.

12,161. Have you taken the bread out of the mouths of any outside workers in that?—Not wilfully.

12,162. Is it open to that objection?—No; and the reason we have no objection to that is, that that firm employed boys.

12,163. Unfairly?—Exactly so; and the boys ran away from it; it was too irksome for them. The firm, in consequence, applied to us, and we were glad to get it.

12,164. Is there an agency for reclamation of prisoners in Greenock; a Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society, or anything of the sort?—There is a Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society for females, but not for males.

12,165. They are all employed in a laundry?—Yes.

12,166. You have been at Jedburgh, and you must have seen a good number of vagrants there?—Yes.

12,167. Were there any shelters for them?—Yes, one in Jedburgh.

12,168. Did it attract many vagrants to your place?—No, I think the police were very sharp with them in Jedburgh, and got them out as quickly as possible.

12,169. You were in the Fife police force; I understand they had rather an effective method of dealing with vagrants at that time?—They had.

12,170. What did they do?—An order was given to the constables that, whenever they met them, they were to get them out of the county as soon as possible.

12,171. To give them extradition?—Exactly.

12,172. Where did you send them?—The first port we could get them out at; it depended upon the part of the county we found them in.

12,173. The places you preferred were Broughty Ferry, Burntisland and Queensferry?—Yes.

12,174. What did your neighbours in Midlothian say to that?—They were never consulted on the subject.

12,175. And in Perthshire and Kinrossshire?—Oh, nothing.

12,176. Did they know it?—They must have known it.

12,177. You paid their fares over, I suppose?—Yes, and charged the Inspector of Poor for it.

12,178. Did he pay without a murmur?—In fact, I may say honestly he used to ask me to send them out, so that they might not be charged upon him.

12,179. What was the end of it?—The end was that the Chief Constable got taken up to the Court of Session, and I think he had to pay £100 damages. The action was raised by a mason who was apprehended between Burntisland and Kinghorn as a vagrant by a constable. He protested that he was not a vagrant. The constable replied, 'I don't care whether you are so or not; I think you are one,' and he was turned back to Edinburgh.

12,180. And in Edinburgh there were too many lawyers?—Well, he was acquainted with a lawyer there, and that was the first thing that opened our eyes to the fact that we had no right to do anything of the kind.

12,181. You say that shebeening has been very sharply dealt with in Greenock?—Yes.

12,182. Under a local Act?—Yes.

12,183. Do many shebeeners come into you?—No; they generally pay the fine before they come in. We have had one or two sent to us, but paying their fines of £5 or £10 soon afterwards.

12,184. They generally get the money to pay the fine?—Yes; it does not pay them to be kept in.

12,185. £5 or £10 is a pretty big sum?—They easily make that. The mixture of methylated spirits and whisky is very cheap, and they can make a great deal off it.

12,186. Is that the composition you think it is, or do the prisoners tell you that it is methylated spirits?—The prisoners admit that it is methylated spirits they usually mix up.

12,187. (By Col. M^r Hardy.) From your knowledge of men on the tramp, how would you propose to deal with them? Would you make any preparations for assisting them along their route?—If you could make out that they were on the tramp, and legitimately looking for work, I certainly would assist them in every possible way.

12,188. Would it be the best way to have shelter houses at certain places, or simply to empower the police to provide lodging for them in some existing house in the village or town?—I think they should be under the control of the police. The police have a better idea of the characters of these persons.

12,189. You believe, from what you have seen in the country, that there is a certain number of men always on the tramp looking for work?—There is a certain number of men continually on the tramp, and they make more by that than by working, and consequently they are constantly on the tramp. We have about thirty in a tramp house in Greenock every night, and the keeper of that house tells me that he gets the same characters over and over again.

12,190. Then he must know that they are not legitimately in search of work?—He cannot help himself, because, according to the rules of his institution, he must give them a supper and a bed, although it is only lying on the boards.

12,191. But who are the people who are entitled to receive accommodation or shelter in that rest?—Any person that likes to go and ask for rest there, if they are sober, will get it.

12,192. Without any regard to whether they are looking for work or anything else?—Yes; one night's rest or shelter. They have only to go there at nine o'clock at night, and apply to the keeper, and he admits them till the house is full.

12,193. (By the Chairman.) Men or women, or both?—Both.

12,194. (By Col. M^r Hardy.) Does that lead to begging do you think?—It leads to begging on one day in the week in particular, namely Sunday. On Saturday they can get two nights' shelter till Monday morning, but they go out of the house at nine o'clock on the Sunday morning, and they cannot go back till nine at night. In consequence, during all the afternoon, the surrounding district is deluged with these people asking for a bite. I think they should keep them in on the Sunday

Mr. William Napier.

21 Dec. 1894.

Mr. William Napier.

21 Dec. 1894.

12,195. (By the Chairman.) I observed on Sunday frequently pairs of tramps, or two or three at times walking along the Inverkip and Gourrock Road towards Greenock?—Quite so.

12,196. What brings them out on Sunday?—They may have travelled from the house in Ayrshire on Sunday.

12,197. But they won't get into this Greenock place if it is full already?—They may, and they may not. If the house is full the next course they take is to go to the police office, and ask for shelter, and the police superintendent there gives them an order on certain lodging-houses.

12,198. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Who finds the funds for that?—I think it must come out of the burgh funds.

12,199. I understand you complain more of the administration of this shelter than of its existence?—Oh, I think the shelter is a good thing, and that there ought to be more if they were properly conducted, and under police control, because the police know what sort of characters the parties are.

12,200. How would you come to discover the honest man searching for work?—There would be no difficulty, I believe, in that, because you know the working man when you meet him. You will examine his hands probably, and you see whether he is a working man or not. I think I could tell a working man very easily,—that is, a person who is accustomed to work.

12,201. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You are of opinion that the police are better able to discriminate between the honest tramp and the worthless one?—I think so.

12,202. And constables being considerably more numerous than Poor Law Inspectors, who may be at long distances from the points where tramps turn up stranded, it would be better to place the temporary relief in the hands of the constables than in the hands of Poor Law officials?—Certainly.

12,203. Do you know of any case of hardship where Poor Inspectors have declined to interfere?—I have heard of such cases, but I could not point them out particularly, unless after some reflection.

12,204. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Is this a tramp-house kept up by a charitable society?—There were funds left for it by the late provost's father or uncle. It is called the Buchanan Institute.

12,205. Is any payment exacted from the persons who use it?—No payment whatever. They get a supper and their bed, which is just the plain floor, and their breakfast free.

12,206. How many does it hold?—Thirty.

12,207. Does it take in females as well as males?—Yes; there is one room for males, and one for females.

12,208. What are the numbers separately?—

12,209. Do they take in children?—Along with females. Mr. William Napier.

12,210. Is it always full?—Well, I could not say always, but I shall get the information. 21 Dec. 1894.

12,211. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Do you think this shelter makes Greenock popular with the vagrant class?—It makes it popular in this way, that those who are accustomed going about tramping know where they can get a night's shelter; and if they can at all get the length of it, it prevents them lying about farms by the roadside, where they would probably cause mischief by smoking and such like.

12,212. Have you any decided opinion about the connection of drink and crime?—Well, I think the most of crime has drink at the bottom of it.

12,213. Do you think it is cause and effect in every case?—In about 90 per cent.

12,214. Not an incident?—No.

12,215. (By the Chairman.) One point I was looking at was the large number of prisoners that come to you from Rothesay for begging?—That is in the summer season. I think I had only eight cases of beggars being brought to prison during last year, and five of these eight were from Rothesay.

12,216. How do you account for that?—Simply because they go down there in the summer time. They make more at the seaside than they would do in the town.

12,217. But there are a number of other seaside towns besides Rothesay?—Well, but Rothesay is the most popular. Most of the Glasgow people go to Rothesay. Some go to Dunoon, which is also popular, but the Glasgow working people all go to Rothesay.

12,218. Do the Rothesay magistrates bother themselves much about whether the Glasgow tourist or visitor is begged from or not?—The police are standing at the gangway to watch who come ashore, and, though they cannot pounce on them there, they follow them up.

12,219. The police take energetic steps to put down begging in Rothesay?—Yes, that is one of the chief things they attend the harbour for.

12,220. And what sentence do the Rothesay magistrates give?—About fourteen days, as a rule. The hardest sentences we get are from Islay, Campbeltown, and Inveraray. For breach of the peace they give hard labour.

12,221. But I am asking about beggars. The punishment runs up to sixty days; have you ever any sentences of that extent?—No; magistrates won't go that length.

12,222. Do they give the women or the men the stiffest sentences?—They are not particular as to that. [The witness then withdrew.]

Mr. A. Macleod M'Adie.

MR. ALEXANDER MACLEOD M'ADIE, Manager of the Glasgow Night Asylum and House of Industry, called in and examined.

Mr. A. Macleod M'Adie.

12,223. (By the Chairman.) You are the manager of the Night Asylum?—Yes.

12,224. That is at present in Garscube Road?—Yes; but that is merely a temporary place.

12,225. Well, we went there the other night, and saw it for ourselves?—You can hardly consider that a fair sample of the work of the institution—in a temporary place.

12,226. Well, in what respect—inferior accommodation, or what?—Yes; and the manner in which they are put up in the place.

12,227. How do you intend to put them up in the new place?—That is under discussion just now. We had a meeting to-day about it, but it has not been decided.

12,228. How did you put them up in the old?—Something similar to the present arrangement.

12,229. Sleep on the floor?—Yes.

12,230. Had you any heating—water pipes?—Not in the old, but we are to have in the new.

12,231. Have you statistics of the people accommodated during last year?—During the year ending August last 46,139 were night-sheltered.

12,232. That is a nightly average of what?—126 per night.

12,233. Of whom there were males?—23,073; females 15,500; boys 3659; and girls 3907.

12,234. Those that you class boys and girls will go with the females?—Mostly.

12,235. Unless they were in charge of a father or something of that sort, and then I suppose boys would go with the males?—Yes.

12,236. You give them a meal when they come in?—Porridge and milk, and the same in the morning.

12,237. Have you any rule as to preventing them coming back oftener than once in a certain time?—We have to use our discretion, and see that they do not come. We do not encourage them to come back more than just two or three nights, if they get employment.

12,238. Do you find that the change of your quarters from North Frederick Street to Garscube Road has altered the character of your inmates?—No.

12,239. Are you in communication with the various police offices? Are you on the telephone?—No.

Mr. A.
Macleod
M^r. Adie.

21 Dec. 1894.

12,240. Were you on the telephone?—No.

12,241. So that the police were not in a position to know whether you had any vacant accommodation?—No.

12,242. But they are in communication with you, and they bring you cases?—Yes, they send us cases; but the great difficulty with these cases is that they usually come when our place is filled up.

12,243. The other night, in the police office, we saw several cases get shelter, and among others a woman and two children?—Just so.

12,244. The reason why she was receiving police shelter was that the superintendent at the Central Police Office believed your place was filled, and, as a matter of fact, we had just come from it, and it was almost empty of females?—Before going to the temporary place I made arrangements with the police superintendent to be more indulgent with those seeking shelter. We had less accommodation. Our average number accommodated in the temporary place is about 100, while the accommodation in the reconstructed Institution is arranged for 260.

12,245. But the night we were there there was not a score of women?—That is so.

12,246. But there was no means of communicating?—That is so.

12,247. To put yourselves on the telephone exchange would settle that?—Yes.

12,248. What sort of people is it that come to you? You don't take them if they are at all in drink?—No.

12,249. And you have got a director of the Institution sitting there to check the admissions?—Yes.

12,250. Are the most of your men, do you think, respectable working men, or men of one class or another reduced by misfortune, or are they chiefly professional tramps and vagrants?—I should say a goodly number of the cases are owing to intemperance.

12,251. Intemperance has probably to do with most of them; but are there many of your clients respectable working men in temporary difficulties through lack of work, and looking out for it?—Yes, we have a large number; and we have had even cases of men coming back offering payment after they get work.

12,252. Out of 46,000, how many tenders of payment have you had?—Very few. I merely mention that.

12,253. That does not speak very largely for the independent-mindedness of your people?—No.

12,254. What sort of people are the women?—Just the very lowest. They are mostly deserted wives.

12,255. The deserted wife need not necessarily be the lowest,—that is to say, she is a person, prima facie, who has been unfortunate, and owes her reduced circumstances not to her own fault?—But in many of these cases we trace it back to intemperance.

12,256. The woman has been drinking, and the husband has left her?—Yes.

12,257. For these the parochial authorities are responsible?—We send them there. We give them a note certifying that they have resided in the House for a night, and that enables them to get into the poorhouse.

12,258. But the parochial authorities won't thank you for this?—No.

12,259. You have connected with this Night Asylum a Home of Industry for Females. How many inmates have you there?—Eight at present. In view of these alterations, we do not increase the number.

12,260. How many did you use to have?—We had 80 in it some years ago, but that branch of the Institution is under consideration just now. The directors have decided not to continue it on its present basis.

12,261. What was the average period of residence for each inmate?—For the last twenty years, say two years and eleven months.

12,262. What were they employed at?—White seam work. The maximum period of residence through the whole history of the House was thirty years.

12,263. Do some of the women remain with you all their lives?—Yes, practically. That was the chief objection that the directors had to it.

12,264. How did you pay the women?—According to the work done, and they paid us for their board.

12,265. How much?—The first three months is 2s. 6d. for the board; and the next three months it is 3s.; afterwards, however long they may remain, it is 3s. 6d. Mr. A.
Macleod
M^r. Adie.

21 Dec. 1894.

12,266. Could you do it for 3s. 6d.?—Not quite now. It was forty or fifty years since that was fixed.

12,267. What are the earnings?—For the last twenty years the average payment per annum to each inmate, after deducting board, was £4, 9s. 11d., or 7s. 5½d. per month.

12,268. Coming to the last year, the total amount paid to nine inmates, after deducting board, is £46, 10s. 9d., an average of £5, 3s. 4d. to each, or 8s. 7½d. per month?—That is so.

12,269. Do you get enough out of the work to pay the inmates their wages?—Oh, yes, we get rather more than that; but there is the salary of the matron and the servant. That does not pay itself.

12,270. You do not charge house rent in any case?—No; that is one of the reasons why the directors have resolved upon some alteration.

12,271. Now, do you think that, given a house and a decent lot of women, and given this white seam sewing, could you have a self-supporting Institution?—Yes. For a good number of years it was self-supporting.

12,272. Do you have any complaints from the outside as to competition?—Never. We keep up the prices of the work.

12,273. That is all you find necessary?—Yes, to keep up the price of the work.

12,274. But if it had been any business that was carried on by an organised body of workers outside, would you have expected to have complaints?—If you keep up the price I don't see that they would have much to complain of.

12,275. From your return I see that the maximum amount paid to an inmate for last year was £8, 13s. 3d. for eleven months—that is an average of 15s. 9d. per month?—That is so. The reason that they were able to do so much is that they are all old inmates, and they have got proficient at it.

12,276. Of the eight inmates at present in the House, the average period of residence is nine years and ten months, and the maximum twenty-eight years, so that they are all old residents?—Yes.

12,277. As a matter of fact it could be little or no use in passing the women through, and you are reconsidering the whole matter?—Yes.

12,278. (By Miss Stevenson.) In the women who come to you for shelter at night, do you find any women of the unfortunate class?—Yes.

12,279. Do you receive them?—Yes; we give them the night's shelter.

12,280. Do you find that the same people come back to you night after night, or have you any limit as to the number of times they are admitted?—There is no limit. It is entirely in the hands of the director present. Of course they do come back, and the directors have been very indulgent with them. They don't care to turn away a woman if possible.

12,281. Are they required to do work for the night's shelter?—No work.

12,282. There is no test?—No.

12,283. You say a very large proportion of them are deserted wives?—A goodly number.

12,284. Do they come to you just as a temporary thing till they have found a fresh home, or apply to the parish?—Just as a temporary thing—three or four nights at the most.

12,285. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Are you aware if the directors have ever had under consideration whether they ought not to apply some test?—That has been under their consideration.

12,286. And what is the result?—They have never been able to prepare a scheme that they think would be practicable.

12,287. (By the Chairman.) What parish is your asylum in?—The City Pariah.

12,288. You tell us that you have a lot of deserted wives, and that you give them a note certifying their residence for the night in the asylum—don't the City

Mr. A.
MacLeod
M'Adie.

Parish people complain of your concentrating all the deserted wives upon them?—We give them a line, which enables them to get in. The poorhouse authorities settle them in their respective parishes. They complain of the trouble, but that is all. [The witness then withdrew.]

Mr. A.
MacLeod
M'Adie.

21 Dec. 1894.

21 Dec. 1894.

Colonel C. E.
Macaulay.

COLONEL C. E. MACAULAY, late of the Bengal Staff Corps, and Governor of Ayr Prison, called in and examined.

Colonel C. E.
Macaulay.

12,289. (By the Chairman.) You are Governor of Ayr Prison?—Yes.

12,290. And you have been how long there?—I have been upwards of eleven years Governor of the Prison.

12,291. Have you had any other prison experience?—No, I have had no other prison appointment in this country.

12,292. What number of prisoners have you in Ayr?—About 80—60 males, and 20 females.

12,293. Ayr has a painful pre-eminence among the Scottish county and country towns in the number of apprehensions. There are 44 people apprehended per 1000 of the population in Ayr for breach of the peace, petty assault, drunk and incapable, and drunk and disorderly in 1893, and that is much bigger than any town in Scotland, except Glasgow?—I have no doubt.

12,294. Can you give us any explanation?—It is probably the drunkenness.

12,295. Do you think the drunkenness is native, or imported?—Partly native, and partly imported. There is a considerable amount of imported drunkenness.

12,296. We have been told there are excursions, and the races, and the militia training, but do you think that that accounts for the fact that Ayr should have in ratio very nearly twice as many of these offences as Edinburgh?—I think the drunkenness is very considerable there, and I think that is the general opinion as regards excursionists specially.

12,297. Is there anything in connection with the police administration that would strike you there?—I think it is rather lax with regard to drunkenness. We have an excessive amount of drunkenness and laxity in the enforcement of the law against licensed houses who supply liquor to persons already intoxicated.

12,298. Have you many drunks sent in to you?—Yes, a good many. I have brought a number of cases, both male and female, with me.

12,299. Could you give us any statistics?—Last year, for instance, there were 1188 males and females committed for offences specified on Table A,—that is, breach of the peace, petty assault, drunkenness, begging and vagrancy, and importuning.

12,300. I understand that there is next to nothing of importuning arrests?—Very seldom.

12,301. You have got a good lot of breach of the peace?—Yes, under the influence of drink in most cases I should think.

12,302. You have got a large number of drunk and incapable, or drunk and disorderly? You have here, I see, 53 cases of begging and vagrancy. Of the 53, 45 were males. Can you give us any explanation of the large amount of vagrancy you have?—In Ayr?

12,303. For instance, we were told a few minutes ago that there had been only eight vagrants in Greenock Prison, and five of these came from Rothesay?—There is a good deal of vagrancy, no doubt, throughout Ayrshire.

12,304. Have you any explanation of that?—None, except that they pass through Ayrshire in large numbers, as they are passing all over Scotland.

12,305. You are aware that there is a peculiar system of handing them on by tickets. The Chief Constable of Ayr told us that he thought that it was that that attracted so many vagrants there?—I do not think that is a very strong reason. The ticket system stops the professional beggar alleging starvation, and thus stops the chief cause of the misapplied charity by which he used to live so well. I think they are going towards Glasgow at this time of the year.

12,306. Have you ever talked to any of these vagrants?—Yes; but they are very reluctant when they come to prison to admit that they are vagrants. I talked to several yesterday, both males and females, and they would not admit for a moment that they were vagrants. They come in for begging; but they say, 'No, we are 'on the tramp in search of labour.'

12,307. Then how do they explain their coming to Ayr? They are on their way to—where?—The arrests are not only in Ayr, but they are all over the county of Ayr.

12,308. How are they arrested in Ayrshire?—By the burgh police. I think the vagrancy at Ayr is chiefly in the summer. I have very few vagrants under arrest at present. There are only three males at present under punishment for begging, and there are only nine male and three female prisoners who have no fixed residence.

12,309. When prisoners come in you ask them where their residence is, and of these none will admit that they are vagrants. It is a little difficult therefore to check them in prison. They admit the begging, but not the vagrancy?—That is so; and certainly the men I have got in just now are not vagrants.

12,310. What is the charge against them?—The charge in some instances is begging, and in some instances breach of the peace. I had a man from Cumberland in prison yesterday. He said he had no fixed residence, but that he had been working for three or four weeks running as a navvy, and then lost all his money in three days' drinking.

12,311. Do you think that is likely?—Yes, I think that is exactly what brought him into prison. He drank from Friday till Monday.

12,312. Had he ever been with you before?—Yes, I think once before.

12,313. What do your prisoners work at?—At oakum and stone-breaking, mat-making, picking hemp, and beating carpets. Picking hemp is teasing flax and hemp ropes, which come from Konisborgh and Riga in Russia, to be manufactured into new rope, lead line, and thick cords.

12,314. And your women?—Well, they sew, and knit, and wash.

12,315. They do not do any sack making?—We have not any of that in Ayr.

12,316. Have you any complaints about mat-making?—No.

12,317. We have been told by a governor of the prison, where a large number of mats are made, that complaints are made that the industry interferes with the work of the blind asylums?—Well, that is possible.

12,318. But he said the complaints were ill-founded?—I should think so.

12,319. And he said that he had sold his mats to blind asylums to sell again—have you ever done that?—No, but an asylum might suddenly require them to complete a large order which it might otherwise lose.

12,320. Have you ever been applied to by blind asylums for mats?—No.

12,321. Do you make many?—Not so many at present. Not so many as I was making two or three years ago. The industry has been declining, so far as my prison is concerned.

12,322. You have never had complaints levelled against you?—Never; and, as far as my inquiries went, it was not an industry in Scotland, except in blind asylums.

12,323. You have never been remonstrated with?—Never.

12,324. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You have a fair number of habitual offenders constantly passing through your hands. Do you think that the system of sending them to prison for twenty-four hours or thirty days is of any service whatever?—None, except in so far as it keeps them out of mischief.

Colonel C. E.
Macaulay.
21 Dec. 1894.

12,325. Have you any suggestion to make in the way of treating these people with a view to their reformation?—It quite depends on who they are. There may be some habitual drunkards for whom the best thing would be to put them away. Some of our worst characters might be put away, but there are a large number who come to the prison who are working hard during the week, and just get on the spree occasionally. They come in pretty frequently.

12,326. (By the Chairman.) How often does this respectable drunkard come in, not the man you would have no scruple in dealing with, but this man whom you say is respectable?—I did not say respectable, but hard-working outside. There is a man, Archibald F——, who works hard. He says he is thirty, but he is older. It is eighteen years since he began his prison life, and during that time he has been 58 times in prison, from twenty-four hours up to six months, for all kinds of offences. He is a dock labourer, "drinks when 'he gets his pay, has no money at the time he goes to 'prison, would not call himself exactly a drunkard. He 'does not take drink sometimes for weeks, and never 'thinks of it when in prison." That is a marked thing. None of these men admit that they ever think of drink while in prison. They have no desire or craving for it. He is not married, so would be a better man to send to some institution. If, he says, he could get away from the place, he might be better as regards drink.

12,327. What are his offences?—He commenced in 1876 with 20 days, his next was 7 days, then 21 days, then 5 days, then 4 days, then 21 days. Then 5 days, then 7 days, then 14 days, then 60 days, because he apparently intended to steal on that occasion. Then 14 days. All these are breaches of the peace, or chiefly so. Then he had 30 days, 14 days, and so on.

12,328. How many times was he in during 1893?—In 1894 he has been in six times.

12,329. I think I should prefer a better man as a sample of the respectable class?—He is a fairly decent man this; he works very hard. Then here is a regular dipsomaniac, John F——, who is over seventy years of age, and who might go to a retreat. He cannot refrain from drink.

12,330. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Can you suggest any new legislation by which a man like Archibald F—— should be safeguarded?—I think so. He is one of the men, I think, who should be taken before the sheriff, and have his case thoroughly considered all round. Then there is another man, M'C——, a hard worker outside, not married, has been nearly five years in prison, 53 times in, under forty-three years of age.

12,331. (By the Chairman.) What is the number of convictions this year?—He has only been in three times, but I am not quite sure that I have got his last conviction here.

12,332. (By Dr. Sutherland.) That is to say, fairly respectable?—Yes, but he is a very rough customer when in drink.

12,333. (By the Chairman.) We have been told that there is a class of working men who get drunk every pay-day, every fortnight, who is probably the model father of a family in every other respect—an admirable citizen, except this one day a fortnight—do you ever come across that kind in your prison?—I come across men who work hard outside, and keep a fairly decent family. I don't say they are model fathers or citizens.

12,334. And are they among the people who are with you perhaps four or five, or six times a year?—Here is a man, P——, who is very frequently in, but he blames his wife. He is a capital shoemaker, and he comes in very frequently.

12,335. Give us a statement of the number of times and days these typical respectable men have been in?—

12,336. (By Col. M'Hardy.) You have been observing closely the increase in the number of prisoners during the last two or three years at Ayr?—Yes.

12,337. The increase seems to come from the county more than the burgh, so far as I can make out?—Yes; I think that is so.

12,338. But there is nothing specific or special about it that you have been able to trace the cause to?—No.

12,339. At Ayr there are some occasions when the militia are up, and when the race meeting is held, when the population becomes excessively high?—That is the case.

12,340. Are the persons who cause the rise in the prison population local individuals or are they strangers, as a rule?—A good many local, and some few from all parts of England—racing characters.

12,341. But I suppose the great bulk of them are for breach of the peace and so on. Well, are they local people who get tipsy then, who would not otherwise, or are they race people imported from other towns, such as Glasgow or the south?—Chiefly Ayrshire, I should think. You are speaking of the race meeting. Well, there are some men even from London.

12,342. Do you find the prisoners work at certain things more heartily and better than they do at others—for instance, at mat-making than picking oakum?—Oh, decidedly.

12,343. And in conducting a prison you can do it with less punishment when the occupations are such as the prisoners take some interest in?—Quite so. Picking oakum is the most penal and irksome you can give them. [The witness then withdrew.]

Dr. W. J.
Naismith.

W. J. NAISMITH, M.D., F.R.C.S.E., Surgeon to Ayr Prison, and Medico-Legal Examiner for the Crown in South Ayrshire, called in and examined.

Dr. W. J.
Naismith.

12,344. (By the Chairman.) You are Surgeon of Ayr Prison?—I am.

12,345. And you have a large consulting practice in Ayr and Ayrshire?—Yes.

12,346. And you are brought into contact with a good number of cases of habitual drunkenness outside your prison practice?—I am.

12,347. Have you any suggestions to make regarding habitual drunkards? Where do you recommend people to go to; or do you consider any of them should be put in retreats?—I have always felt a very great difficulty in the treatment of cases of habitual drunkenness in private practice, and have felt very much the want of legislation on that head.

12,348. Legislation, I suppose —?—Directed towards the confinement of habitual drunkards. At present I take it that their retirement in an asylum, for instance, is merely voluntary on their part.

12,349. We have been told by a number of medical gentlemen, or certain medical gentlemen, that they knew of people in the remoter districts of the Highlands and Islands, where liquor was comparatively difficult to be got, who took charge of inebriate cases; have you ever sent any patients there?—No. I know of these people, but I have not sent patients to them.

12,350. Have you recommended patients to go as voluntary patients to an asylum?—I have, and have succeeded in many instances; or, when I say many, I should rather say a few instances. My experience is that these suggestions are very seldom acted up to. If you leave it as a voluntary matter, persons will not go into retreats.

12,351. And those that you have got, do they remain there?—In a few instances. We have known them to go; they have never stayed longer than three or four months, and it seems to me that their having stayed there has never been followed by satisfactory results—probably because they stayed there too short a time.

12,352. Have you faith in any of the remedies advocated for the cure of intemperate habits?—None. I have no personal experience in the use of these drugs, but my information is derived from the medical journals of the country, and from reading of the experience of others in the profession.

Dr. W. J. Naismith.

21 Dec. 1894.

12,353. That relates, of course, to secret drugs; and there is no orthodox recognition of any drug as curative?—None whatever.

12,354. Coming to your prison experience, have you any suggestions to make? A very large number of your cases of petty offenders are persons who are primarily —?—Brought there through drink, and the number seems to be largely increasing. At least, I find that, for instance, speaking very generally, so far as the prison of Ayr is concerned, in 1890 the total arrests were 1748, and in 1893 these had increased to 2415, and out of that number 1188 were committed for offences in Table A—that is, under the petty habitual offences. That is, of course, very large—very nearly half.

12,355. How do you account for that increase?—I account for the increase partly from the fact that I believe short sentences have no effect.

12,356. But short sentences have been going on for many years before, and the increase has been most notable of late years?—I fancy that these cases of habitual drunkenness are simply getting worse. They get drunk at shorter intervals, and their entries are increasing.

12,357. That is an explanation that has not yet been offered us; but there was an explanation, we were informed, that the high percentage of arrests for these drunken offences in Ayr was due to the Ayr races, to the number of excursionists who visited Ayr, to the militia training there, and to the fact that the Ayrshire method of treating mendicity encouraged vagrants to come to it?—The population of Ayr is increasing.

12,358. But not in the same ratio to the arrests?—We have had racing and these other things for a long time. These things may have a great deal to do with it, but I firmly believe a great deal of it is due, as I have said, to these short sentences, which, so far from stopping drunkenness, actually increase it. That is to say that the demoralisation continues increasingly, and often habitual offenders are being brought into prison at much shorter intervals than they used to be. Of course, a number of these may be recommitments.

12,359. Of course there is a large number of them recommitments; but the Chief Constable pointed out that there is a very large increase in the vagrant class in Ayr within the last few years?—I should not like to express any opinion upon that point.

12,360. Have you any proposal to make with regard to their present treatment?—I am very strongly of opinion that their sentences should be cumulative.

12,361. But, assuming that in places where they have long sentences, the results are no more satisfactory than where they do otherwise?—Well, that I do not know personally; but I may be allowed to hold the theory that to allow a prisoner to leave the prison cell after the usual three, five, or six, or seven, or even fourteen days, is just to allow him to leave prison with the strongest craving for drink upon him.

12,362. Suggestions have been made for reformatory treatment—that is, that habitual offenders might be sent to an adult reformatory, and detained there?—I believe that the earliest part of the treatment must be compulsory and forcible, and my belief is that the man who is kept a longer time than the usual short sentence is much more likely to be turned out with less of the craving for alcohol than now prevails. I believe if you sent that man to a voluntary place he would not stay there.

12,363. But we are talking of compulsory places of detention, and it has been universally suggested to us that, in connection with any institution of that sort, work should constitute a part of the treatment?—That is the most excellent plan of all. That quite fulfils the conditions of longer imprisonment, such as I suggest. It is the best of arrangements. He would be compulsorily kept from drink.

12,364. Colonel Macaulay, as an advocate, in dealing with respectable drunks, mentioned a man with 56 convictions, who was, in his opinion, within that class. He was a good worker, and sometimes he worked very well. And then he came into the hands of the police, and he had submitted to fines and sentences of imprisonment, some of six months. Now, have you seen, in your prison experience, many repeated convictions that at all came under the class of useful citizens outside respectable men?—I cannot say that I have.

12,365. You would not consider such a man as deserving of much consideration? You would think that he was sufficiently habitual to entitle the state to deal with him as an habitual?—Quite so.

12,366. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Do you hold confident views as regards the possibility of curing these habitual cases absolutely by voluntary detention?—I cannot say that I do. My opinions are simply in the direction of amelioration. I would not express any opinion as to absolute cure.

12,367. Because we have statistics that 30 per cent. of these cases are cured, and can be cured?—I have no personal knowledge of the kind.

12,368. Do you think that the desire of inebriates to drink goes on increasing with the continuation of their drinking habits?—Yes, most firmly. They lose self-control as they go on breaking down.

12,369. I do not mean self-control, but the physical effect on them?—Certainly, on themselves.

12,370. The same quantity of drink will produce a greater effect upon the man who has been in the habit of drinking for a long time?—Yes, that is my opinion.

12,371. What is your opinion of the effect of heredity?—That there is no disease known where heredity has such a frightful influence.

12,372. I only ask that because we have had a difference of opinion?—Far worse than for phthisis, or cancer, or any other disease.

12,373. Is it your opinion that the child of drunken parents who lapses into drink is more hopeless than any other case?—I do.

12,374. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Have you observed whether sentences for drunkenness and offences committed through drink have been increasing in severity of late?—No.

12,375. They have not?—No.

12,376. How long would you think it necessary to detain an habitual drunkard to give him a fair chance of his getting quit of the drink craving?—It is very difficult to mention a time; but I should say that the present sentences are utterly inadequate, and I would be inclined to mention a month or two as the shortest time.

12,377. Do you know a class of people who are called pay-day drunks?—I have heard of them.

12,378. Have you any suggestion as to how you would deal with them?—No, I cannot say I have.

12,379. (By Dr. Sutherland.) In speaking of the inefficacy of short sentences for drunkards, and suggesting a longer period of detention, is it in your mind to detain these people in prison?—No. I quite acquiesce in the reformatory plan.

12,380. Is it your experience as a prison surgeon, in observing the prisoners who are under detention for a long time—say 12 or 18 months—and are kept in their cells 23 hours out of the 24, that this confinement is deleterious both to the mind and body?—I should say that Her Majesty's prison at Ayr is not a long sentence one, and that we have very few prisoners in for such a length of time.

12,381. Is it not for the same sentences as in other prisons in the country?—During my tenure of office I have had no experience of prisoners who have been in that length of time, with very few exceptions.

12,382. It is contrary to your experience, both practical and theoretical, to expect physical and mental health to continue up to a standard after long periods of what is known as separate confinement?—Quite so.

12,383. In fact you would fix a time when separate confinement would cease, and outdoor work should take its place?—Certainly.

12,384. Do you find that epilepsy is in any way identified with alcoholism?—I find it is very strongly identified with it.

12,385. It is just an evidence of the neurotic temperament, as drunkenness itself may be?—I think

Dr. W. J. Naismith.

21 Dec. 1894.

Dr. W. J. Naismith.

21 Dec. 1894.

that epileptic drunkards are not suitable for prison discipline at all. We have to associate them; we cannot let them be alone, and prison discipline has no effect upon them, but, I believe, the very reverse.

12,386. So long as you are not able to certify them insane, where can you put them?—I should be inclined very strongly to send them straight off to an asylum.

12,387. But you are not able to certify them insane; do you think they are fitter inmates for the poorhouse than the prison?—I do.

12,388. You have in your experience come across cases of inebriety which have gone on unnoticed,—at all events, to the authorities, for years; and were only detected when a fatal assault was committed?—I have known of such cases.

12,389. What would you suggest should be done with this form of inebriety? What steps do you think should be taken to bring this phase of inebriety to the notice of the sheriff before dangerous assaults are committed?—If his inebriety is unnoticed, how are you to take him in hand.

12,390. Suppose it is known to the neighbours and relatives, as well as the family, who might hesitate to act, would not the neighbours be entitled to bring the case under the notice of the police, and demand an inquiry?—That is where I think there is a hiatus in our legislation, and that there should be some place where the relatives, by application to the sheriff, should be able to place such a person under restraint, if he is a drunkard.

12,391. Before he commits a dangerous assault, or is likely to commit crime?—Yes.

12,392. (By the Chairman.) As you mentioned cases of epilepsy combined with drunkenness, and exceptional treatment if necessary in that case, have you many instances of weak-minded persons in the prison under your charge?—I have, but have certified them insane.

12,393. And what is the result?—Taken to the District Asylum.

12,394. At the expense of the population?—Yes, it is a pauper asylum, the district one.

12,395. We have been told that in many cases where that has been done, the district asylum people do not take the prison view of the asylum, and turn them out?—They have not in the instances I refer to.

12,396. Well-marked insanity is one thing, but we have been told of various weak-minded persons. We have been told to-day of a female who had been numerous times in jail, and who stole when she got out, with no attempt at concealment; and her mania for stealing was so strong that if she got into a passage in the prison, she would pick up another prisoner's oakum and take it into her cell?—I would have no hesitation in certifying that woman as insane. She is in no case fit for prison discipline.

12,397. Take the case of D.T.'s,—what would you do with them? Would you treat them as insane?—Well, if there is an asylum at hand, I would be inclined to send them there till they were better.

12,398. You send a prisoner temporarily insane to an asylum, and then get him back when he recovers?—Yes, I have done so. I do not know I have got him back if his sentence had lapsed.

12,399. But, if his sentence had not lapsed, he comes back to you?—If I have certified him as insane, I should not be inclined to take him back.

12,400. I suppose these weak-minded people you think would be proper subjects for the care of the Parochial Board?—I do, because I do not hold them to be responsible.

12,401. Do you think it would be desirable that the Parochial Board ought to be given power to detain these people, and not let them out, without, at all events, notice?—I think so.

12,402. Would it not be rather hard to the imbecile or fatuous persons to be put into a pauper institution, and compelled probably to submit to jeers and rough language, at all events unfeeling treatment?—It is a question of alternative. If they are not sent there, I should think it would be far worse to be sent into prison.

12,403. But I suppose, if you point out that a prisoner is peculiar, has a tinge of insanity or imbecility, the prison discipline is not so strictly enforced, and he is not punished for things another prisoner would?—But it throws an enormous responsibility upon the prison officials, for if such an imbecile should come to grief in any way, we would be responsible for not having treated him as a person not being responsible for his own actions. This responsibility I should be very sorry to take, and therefore I say I think the kind of weakly person you speak of is not a person to be detained in Her Majesty's Prisons.

12,404. Is the number of such persons in prison, according to your experience, large?—I have only been a prison surgeon for three years.

12,405. I was going to ask if you thought the number of such persons would be sufficient to justify their separation to some special establishment?—During my three years of office, several persons have been brought in like that.

12,406. How many?—Perhaps a dozen; less. Every now and then a case of that kind occurs.

12,407. Have you any in Ayr just now?—Not at present. I have one or two epileptics who are brought in for seven or fourteen days. Then they go out and soon come in again. [The witness then withdrew.]

Dr. W. J. Naismith.

21 Dec. 1894.

CAPTAIN HARDY M'HARDY, R.N.,* Chief Constable of Ayrshire, called in and examined.

Captain Hardy M'Hardy.

12,408. What we wish to see you chiefly about is, that we understand that in Ayrshire you have organised some system of dealing with tramps which is known throughout Scotland, but details of which we have not yet been able to get. Would you please tell us your system in Ayrshire?—I have with me the annual reports of this Society. The occasion of its being instituted was that several people complained of the number of applications they had from tramps, and my answer was:—'It rests with yourselves to cure that. If you do not encourage them by relief you will find you will not be troubled;' and I further said: 'If you feel it necessary to relieve them then I would strongly urge that you endeavour to see that they consume on the premises what you give them in food-relief.' To this suggestion, some kind ladies, who being particularly generous in responding to appeals at a time of slackness in the shipbuilding yards, said their difficulty was not so much in feeding the tramps as that they all wanted money to help them towards their night's lodgings. Some would say they had 2d., and they wanted 3d. more to make up the price of their lodgings. This was in the Large and Skelmorlie districts, which are particularly well-to-do parts of the county, and there is no doubt that in these places many undeserving tramps were drawing a great deal of charity by posing as ship-yard workers out of employment. I could give no answer in regard to these cases of supplying money towards the night's lodgings as to how the relief could be given in a form less liable to abuse, but I made inquiries in England, and particularly in Dorsetshire, Herefordshire, Kent, and Worcester-shire, regarding societies for dealing with tramps, and we established the Ayrshire Society on the system of the Dorset Society, which latter has now been in existence for 24 years.

12,409. Would you please give us particulars about the operations of the Society and how it works?—It provides for the public supplying themselves with bread tickets, which are exchangeable for a portion of bread at the towns and villages (68 places) throughout the county. About every five miles on his journey through Ayrshire, the vagrant would be able to get not more than two pennyworth of bread. It takes two tickets

Captain Hardy M'Hardy.

* Vide Appendix xxxvii.

Captain
Hardy
M^r Hardy.

21 Dec. 1894.

to give him two pennyworth of bread, and the public pay for the tickets the half of that value, that is, the tickets are sold at half par value.

12,410. They are sold to the public?—At half par value, because it is reckoned that only about half of the tickets will be presented.

12,411. But you run the risk of the loss?—Yes, but besides the income from the sale of tickets, subscriptions are invited to defray working expenses, and to provide for any balance against the Society on the Relief Account.

12,412. Will you give us specimens of your different tickets?—Specimen tickets handed in.

12,413. You say half a pound of bread will be given for this ticket. Do you allow a man to get four tickets?—He can only exchange two tickets at one bread station. It is a half pound for each ticket. A man can get a pound of bread if he possesses two tickets, and a similar supply could be obtained for each five miles or thereby travelled.

12,414. But do the bakers make half pound loaves?—Half a pound is a penny loaf. They generally give them in scones, and I find the bakers give very liberal value for the penny. They never confine them to the bare quantity that they are obliged to supply.

12,415. Bread is the only relief you give?—No, lodging ticket-books are also sold to the public. The tickets provide that, "If the bearer is a wayfarer in 'need of relief, an order for a lodging for the night will 'be given at — Police Station.'" The person giving the ticket is instructed to sign, date, and insert the name of the police station, and it will only be available on that date for exchange at the police station mentioned. On the cover there is a list of the stations that the tickets can be made available for exchange at, and the list includes every place (25) which has common lodging-house accommodation.

12,416. Is there any other feature?—Some of the public who considered that dry bread was not sufficient relief to give, said they were obliged to give relief in some other form in the way of food, and asked if the Society could not arrange to give hot coffee and bread and butter, or bread and cheese, or tea. It was thought advisable to try it experimentally first in not more than two places in the county, but I met with the District Committees, and there was only one division in the county that was inclined to try it, and that was Ayr.

12,417. Ayr burgh do you mean?—The division of the county is called Ayr, but that takes in six or seven parishes.

12,418. Have you got a list of them now?—The Ayr district takes in the burgh of Ayr, and Tarbolton, Dalmellington, Prestwick, Monkton, and Dalrymple parishes.

12,419. And, I suppose, this is the most populous district?—Except Kilmarnock, which is rather more populous. This ticket, which is being tried tentatively in Ayr, is described as 'Superior Food Ticket.' Its value is 2½d., and it is made exchangeable at the constabulary office for an order, either to the Ayr coffee-house or to the baker who supplies bread, and arrangements have been made for its being exchanged for hot soup and bread, or coffee and bread and butter at the coffee-house, or for bread and cheese, or bread, tea and sugar, at the baker.

12,420. You did not tell us the price of the lodgings' ticket?—They are sold at 3d. a ticket—2s. 6d. for a packet of 10 tickets, or 1s. for a packet of 4 tickets. The cost to the Society for lodgings varies from 3½d. to 5d.

12,421. How do you manage to sell under cost price. Do you find they are not presented?—Nearly all of these are presented, and each year there is a deficiency on these tickets, although they are sold nearer the real value than the bread tickets.

12,422. Tell us about the coffee ticket. You say its value is 2½d. What do you sell it to subscribers at?—1s. 6d. for 10 tickets. Very few however have been used. They have been in use for two years, and the report of the trial of the two years is that the Committee do not feel justified in approving of any extension of the system, but make no objection to the continuance of the trial in Ayr. £3 worth only have been negotiated in two years.

12,423. Would you let us have the results of your operations, as set forth in the last report. When did the Association start?—In 1885.

12,424. What do you call it?—The Ayrshire Mendicity Society for the Repression of Professional Vagrancy, and the Supply of Relief to Destitute Wayfarers.

12,425. What do you generally call it?—The Mendicity Society.

12,426. What are your operations for the last year?—The number of people who have used the Society in one year has varied from 1418—the greatest number in the year 1887–88.

12,427. The number of people?—That is the number of the public who bought tickets, with which to relieve wayfarers.

12,428. When does your year end?—The 31st March.

12,429. Varied from what?—From 1418 in the year 1887–88 to 94 in the year 1891–92. Last year the number was 540.

12,430. (By Col. M^r Hardy.) That is the people who have bought tickets?—Yes.

12,431. (By the Chairman.) How do you account for that falling off between 1887 and 1894?—It is entirely due to whether or not there have been applications to the public to buy the tickets. The fact is, I have not felt justified in allowing the police to importune the public, but, more than once at the annual meetings, it has been alleged that the public did not sufficiently know of the existence of the Society, and that they would be glad to buy the tickets if they were applied to more. To meet this complaint that the Society was not sufficiently known, circulars giving particulars of the system have occasionally been delivered by the constables to the inhabitants; and when such a circular has been distributed, there has been a great increase in the number who have bought tickets.

12,432. What was the purchase money of the 1418 in 1887–88?—£140, 18s. 6d.

12,433. Can you tell us what class of tickets were run upon?—I find that £70, 13s. 6d. was received for bread tickets, and £70, 5s. for lodgings' tickets in that year.

12,434. And in the last year, 1893–94?—The amount received was £80, 19s.

12,435. Of which, how much was for bread, lodgings and superior food?—The report of that year is not yet printed, but I can say, from memory, that about £2 of it was for superior food.

12,436. And the rest about equally divided between lodgings and bread?—£50, I think, in lodgings' tickets. There was an advantage in them, and the remainder was for bread tickets.

12,437. Then, as to the financial results of your big year's operation, 1418?—The expenditure in relief given was £136, 0s. 8d. in that year, and therefore it gave nearly £4 profit. In adjusting the price of the tickets, the object of the Committee has been to secure that the full amount received for tickets sold shall be expended in relief given, and they make up any deficiency by the subscriptions obtained from the public to cover the expense of working the Society, and any balance on the relief account that is against the Society.

12,438. How far have you required to draw upon subscriptions from the public otherwise than for the purchase of books of tickets?—The difference between the amount received for tickets sold, and the expenditure on relief given, is £47 in the nine years—£609, 5s. is the income from relief tickets sold, and £656, 8s. is the cost of relief supply.

12,439. Leaving a deficit of?—£47.

12,440. Which you have covered by subscriptions; did you require subscriptions to pay other expenses?—When starting the Society, we received £107, 19s. 8d. in subscriptions and donations, and the working expenses in that year were £45, 17s., and that year, including balance in favour of the Society on the Relief

Account, we had an excess of income of £95, 13s. Of course, at the close of the first year, many tickets were still in the hands of those who bought them. Then the next year it was £2, 15s. 8d. excess of expenditure; the third year £9, 18s. excess of expenditure; the fourth year £30, 8s. 4d. excess of expenditure. Then in each year since, there has been an excess of income as follows,—the fifth year £14, 9s. the sixth year £23, 5s., the seventh year £22, 16s., the eighth year £5, 19s. 8d., and the last year £7, 8s. 5d. The balance in favour of the Society in the nine years is £126, 11s.

12,441. You say that half the bread tickets are not made use of—why don't these tramps, who do not use their bread tickets, sell them to people who want bread?—They could not sell them to anybody but a wayfarer. The bakers are not allowed to exchange the tickets from any of the local poor.

12,442. So that they really give part of them to one of those who is qualified to obtain a ticket for himself and use it. Take this case: you have got a good many shops in Ayr—?—Only one baker at each place is authorised to negotiate the tickets.

12,443. And these are five miles apart?—Yes, and no one can exchange more than two tickets at the same place.

12,444. So that they cannot be exchanged for anything else?—No. I find that the bakers really carry out very satisfactorily the regulations, though they are often applied to, to give something else in exchange for the ticket. The object of having the ten divisions of the county is, that a man comes into the country at the north end—say at Skelmorlie—and passing through the county to the south, though he might be very successful in begging in Skelmorlie and Largs, and get thirty of these bread tickets, they would cease to be of use to him after he reaches Dalry. He could use them passing through Skelmorlie, Largs, Fairlie, West Kilbride, and Dalry, and after that he would have to go into the Irvine district for tickets, and they would pass him on a certain distance, but the tickets in that district would not be of use to him after he passed into the Ayr district.

12,445. And he could not sell them to the inhabitants, no matter how poor, because the poor person so sold could only get 1lb. of bread at the end of the journey?—If he met a tramp going north in the direction he had come from, he could supply that tramp with the tickets, and he would be able to use them instead of asking others for tickets.

12,446. They can exchange tickets?—Yes.

12,447. I notice you don't have any dating to these tickets or any limitation of the time for which they are available?—Not with the bread tickets. The fact is, there is no abuse of the bread tickets, and I have explained to the public that my experience of this Society is that they may give them quite freely—there is no abuse. It is quite different with the lodging tickets, because efforts are made by men who are in employment to get them, although quite able to pay for their lodgings.

12,448. We were told at one meeting something about the very independent nature even of the tramp in Scotland?—No, I cannot confirm that.

12,449. You say that men, who have had work and could pay for their tickets, would avail themselves of lodging tickets if they could get them, to save the threepence?—I find instances of the tickets being presented by men who are in work, and are not known in the district well. They have trusted to not being known to get the ticket exchanged.

12,450. Would you give us an instance?—There was a man named Patrick C—, who presented a ticket at the Largs Police Station. He was recognised as a professional vagrant, and, on being required to turn out his pockets, £1, 5s. 11d. was found in his possession.

12,451. And what was done with him?—Nothing could be done. He did not get his lodging ticket exchanged.

12,452. Would not that be obtaining relief under false pretences—falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition?—It is doubtful whether a Court would convict. It is obtaining charitable contributions under false pretences.

12,453. Have you any others?—There is a registry kept, giving full reasons on any occasions on which the constabulary refuse to issue the order on the lodging-house. The following cases are related in one of the Annual Reports of the Society as illustrative of the grounds upon which the constabulary did not issue lodging orders in exchange for tickets presented—1. R. W. presented an order at the constabulary station at 6 p.m. He was the worse for drink, and suspected not to be in need of relief; he was asked to call again, between eight and nine, for his night's lodging order, but he did not return. 2. T. M. answered the description of a man named Thomas G—, wanted at Galston for theft. He was accommodated in police cells for the night, and pleaded guilty of the theft on the following day. Another, an able-bodied young man, Matthew S—, suspected not to be needing relief, was found to have 17s. 10d. upon him.

12,454. You have mentioned a case in which a theft was brought under the cognisance of the police by means of the working of this ticket system—have you had many cases of criminals or offenders who have been wanted?—No; only three in nine years.

12,455. You have not told us how many of these different tickets have been issued; you have given us the total amount, but it will take some calculation to make out the tickets for each year?—I will send figures to the Secretary.

12,456. There is no means under that scheme that is working in Ayrshire of attempting to differentiate between the respectable working man out of work, the tramp in search of employment, and the professional vagrant?—It is a fact that there has not been proved an instance of one of these tickets being presented by a respectable working man.

12,457. The lodging-house tickets?—No ticket whatever. I mean to say, that of those that we have investigated, I have not been able to establish that one was a really respectable working man—I have only investigated the cases of those who were thought likely to prove an exception.

12,458. You have only investigated the respectable cases with a view to relieving them in some other way?—With a view to finding if they were instances of the respectable working man out of employment seeking relief from this Society.

12,459. And you have never been able to find any instance of a respectable working man presenting a ticket?—No; but against that, I quite recognise that a respectable working man, when he was down like that, would be disinclined to give any information which would enable the police to communicate with those who had known him under better circumstances.

12,460. Of course you must have a certain percentage, be it large or small, of respectable men who have been thrown out of work,—take it through the slackness in trade in the shipbuilding yards or the coal strike, or anything of that sort, who may have no money at all, and may be glad to get these tickets for a night's lodging?—I suppose there must be, and perhaps a great number, but, since this superior food ticket was established, I was anxious to find out whether these persons who get the superior food ticket, judged by those who relieved them to be better than the average, were really so. I have investigated the accounts given by those people, and in no case as yet have I found that they were industrious working men. They are men who work hard at times, but they have lost their employment through being unsteady and irregular in their habits and not to be depended on.

12,461. Do you find that those lodging-house tickets, or the superior food tickets especially, form any temptation to tramps to go into districts where they are known?—They certainly require to be given away with discretion, tickets of that value, and, if they were freely given away by people who would give no relief at all if they did not have this means of relieving, then they would decidedly encourage it. Very little will encourage a tramp to a district.

12,462. I ask that, because the Burgh of Ayr Police do not work the system?—No.

12,463. Well, the Chief Constable spoke of a great increase in vagrancy within the last few years, and attributed it to the system of tickets introduced. He said many tramps came to the police office wanting tickets. They were told at first they could not have them, but they got them from the subscribers in Ayr, and they were attracted to Ayr where these superior food tickets and the lodging-house tickets were in existence. That was his explanation for the increase of vagrancy. He said there was an increase, and attributed it to the working of these tickets. Do you think there is any ground for that view?—I do not think so. I had to meet the same view of one Inspector of Poor in Ayrshire—I think there was only one who was of opinion that the Society rather encouraged vagrancy instead of checking it. Immediately I heard that expression of opinion I asked the District Committee to meet and to consider the matter; because, if they were of opinion that there were grounds for that, I would certainly advise giving up the Society at once, for I had no interest in continuing it if there was any suspicion of it encouraging vagrancy; but I showed that, while there had been an increase in that district, that the increase was below the average increase all over Scotland, and in all other districts. I think that perhaps Mr Mackay, in reference to Ayr, has too hastily supposed that it is due to this Mendicity Society.

12,464. Can you give us the figures with which you refuted the Inspector of Poor who brought a similar charge against the Society?—I will send them to the Secretary; but I was in London yesterday, and saw a report which mentioned that, in the year 1893, there had been an enormous increase over the country in vagrancy, that it was greater than in any year for 35 years, with the exception of 1869 and 1881.

12,465. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Are you talking about Ayr?—No, the Return related to England and Wales.

12,466. (By the Chairman.) Was that official?—It is in the Local Government Board Returns.

12,467. That is the English Local Government Board?—Yes.

12,468. Then, that of course applies to England, but we have no statistics for Scotland to that effect. The vagrancy census has only been taken for a few years past?—That is all. I am afraid these statistics of vagrancy are very unreliable.

12,469. Why?—There is such a variety in the way the census is taken.

12,470. How are they taken—according to the individual directions of each Chief Constable?—Yes.

12,471. But, are there no instructions laid down by the Inspector of Constabulary?—No, there is just a form that has to be filled in. One takes in all the strangers in the district, whether they are working or not, and another omits those who have got work.

12,472. How did you get the increase—you had Scottish figures for two or three years I suppose?—There has always been a system of recording in the Constabulary Report the number of challenges.

12,473. But that is very unsatisfactory?—It is no index to the actual number; still, I think, the Returns afford some index to the annual changes in the same district.

12,474. Was it by comparison of the number of tramps challenged that you arrived at your figures?—Yes.

12,475. And you showed that the figures in Ayrshire were not so great as in the other counties in Scotland?—Yes.

12,476. And then even in this parish, where the Inspector of Poor complained, the increase had not been so great as in other counties?—Yes.

12,477. You will let us have the figures?—Yes.

12,478. Do you find that the fact that these tickets are available prevents people giving relief in money or in other exchangeable articles?—No; I cannot say that it appreciably does. There are still very many who give direct relief in money or food to beggars, but those who use the tickets state that they are not troubled now by any except those who are in actual need of the relief which the Society gives.

12,479. Well, then they get off without anything except the tickets—do you think that a large number of the population give money?—Yes. They give as they always did. I can only claim for the Society that it just meets the case of those people who feel that they cannot relieve strangers or tramps for fear of their charity being abused, and those people who say they are probably nine times out of ten relieving unworthy cases, but they would rather do that than run the risk of refusing relief to one man who was destitute.

12,480. You say the system was adopted after obtaining information from Dorsetshire?—Yes.

12,481. Do you know what the result of the Society's operations in Dorsetshire was, and also in those English counties you mentioned?—The Dorsetshire Society is the one that I have based our Society on.

12,482. (By Col. M'Hardy.) How long had it been going on in Dorsetshire?—Twenty-four years. I have in my hand the twenty-fourth annual report of this Society. It states "There has been an increase in the admissions to the Casual Wards, the numbers being 18,431 in the year ended December last, as compared with 13,678 in 1892,—an addition of 4753, which is the largest increase recorded since the formation of this Society."

12,483. (By the Chairman.) I was going to ask you about that point. In every English parish there is provision made for casuals; every casual can get a night's lodgings and some food—is not that so?—Yes.

12,484. That is not the case in any Scottish county, or under the Scottish Poor Law?—No.

12,485. What do they want this organisation for lodgings and food for in an English county, where they have got lodgings provided for them, free of expense, and food provided?—They do not offer lodging tickets in the English county Mendicity Societies. Our lodging system is necessary in Scotland, because there are no Casual Wards.

12,486. So that they have only bread tickets in England?—Yes.

12,487. And, instead of having three sets of tickets they have only one?—Yes.

12,488. Do they give any recommendations there, or have they any system of passes to the people in charge of the Casual Wards to facilitate the movement of the working man in search of work—to free him at all from the tests that are imposed upon the professional tramp?—That is the system that is in use in Wiltshire and Gloucestershire, and, I think, other counties, but that differs from the Dorsetshire system.

12,489. Which is simply the giving of bread tickets?—Yes.

12,490. What do they sell these tickets at?—In Dorsetshire they do not sell the bread tickets. The tickets are distributed free to all subscribers.

12,491. And how does the financial result of that system work out?—I see that their balance in hand was £94, 18s. at the commencement of this year, and it fell to £67 at the end of the year—this year 1893 having been a bad year. The number of tickets exchanged for bread was considerably in excess of previous years, and amounted to 19,089, at a cost of £79, 10s. 9d. For some portions of last autumn the bread outlay exceeded £10 per month, but, as a rule, they have been going on with a little profit. I have noticed this Society has had a balance of upwards of £180, and it has now gone down to £67. I think that is the lowest balance during the past ten years.

12,492. (By Dr. Sutherland.) I notice from the return you sent me that there has been a steady increase in your apprehensions for the five specific offences during the past 18 years?—Yes.

12,493. An increase from 2025 in 1885 to 3140 in 1893—to what do you ascribe that enormous increase, amounting to 50 per cent.?—I attribute it, for the most part, to the creation of police burghs in the county

Captain

Captain

12,494. And to any new offences created by statute? —That statute created new offences in the parts of the county that formed police burghs, but there is also each year more expected by the public from the police. What was tolerated ten years ago is not tolerated now in the way of disorder. More offences are taken notice of each year.

12,495. In the year 1893, 305 apprehensions had been made of vagrants and beggars for petty offences committed in your county, a much larger number than in any other county in Scotland. Do you ascribe that to the influx of vagrants into Ayrshire or to what other cause?—Certainly not to any increase of vagrants in the county, rather to the fact that Ayrshire has a larger proportion of police burghs than other counties, which enables offences committed by vagrants to be taken notice of in those police burghs which could not be dealt with except in police burghs. Also this, that, in recording the occupation of persons who are convicted, I have instructed the constabulary that they are not to record the professed occupation of a man whom they have no doubt about being a vagrant. You will understand that there is no vagrant who does not state an occupation. They describe themselves as tailors and bakers, but there is no doubt as to their being vagrants, and but for the instructions I have referred to I can quite understand that in our district two-thirds of those who are classed as vagrants would be classed by the occupations which they stated they followed.

12,496. Do you believe that the relief of those vagrants, is, and would be, better administered by the police than by the Parochial Authorities?—I can go back to the county of Essex when they commenced to use the police as relieving officers. They reduced the number of vagrants in, I think, six Unions who adopted it, from over twenty thousand to just over two thousand.

12,497. (By the Chairman.) That is exceedingly interesting. Then, on the other hand, there are more police constables in Ayrshire than there are parochial inspectors, are there not, to carry out the relief?—Yes.

12,498. That is to say, in many cases it would be hardly possible to find an inspector to give the necessary relief and shelter, whereas there can be very little difficulty in any part of Ayrshire, at any time, to find a constable at a reasonable distance?—I do not think that, in Scotland, such a transfer would make any reduction in the number of tramps relieved.

12,499. But if relief were granted, there would always be a police constable at a reasonable distance to approach and ask for relief?—Yes, quite so.

12,500. (By Col. M'Hardy.) After all your experience, what do you think ought to be the system, if there was a national one, for dealing with migratory poor?—I could not say; I would not venture an opinion.

12,501. Do you consider that there are a certain number of people tramping who ought to be assisted some way or other?—Yes.

12,502. You consider there are a certain number of men actually needing work?—I know there are.

12,503. And you would be for assisting them in some way?—Yes.

12,504. Otherwise the men are forced to beg?—Yes.

12,505. And they probably are deserving persons?—Quite so.

12,506. But there is, on the other hand, a large class of professional vagrants, a disreputable class, who should be repressed?—Quite so.

12,507. But you are unable to suggest a scheme for dealing with those who are believed to be, or who have some means of saying, that they are labouring men actually in search of work—you cannot give us a scheme for dealing with them satisfactorily?—No; I see all the schemes that have been tried have failed. I saw that the system of giving them a way-bill in Gloucestershire and Wiltshire is very strongly condemned by those whose opinion should be given weight to upon the subject.

12,508. (By the Chairman.) By whom?—I see the Chief Constable of Dorsetshire in his report says —

12,509. Who is the Chief Constable?—Captain Amyatt. He expresses the opinion that the effect of the card suggested would be to create a new class of licensed travellers.

12,510. That is the way-bill?—Yes; who would have a certain claim on the workhouse, and on the charity of the public, and the alleged loss of a ticket would be sufficient to work on the feelings of the charitable. Captain Amyatt pointed out it was only the revival of an ancient statute, which had proved ineffectual some centuries ago; and remarked that, though vagrancy had increased in Dorset during strikes and depression of trade, the increase was not so great as in other places.

12,511. You mentioned that in Essex, by the employment of police constables as relieving officers, the number of vagrants had been diminished from 20,000 to 2000?—From 25,000, I think.

12,512. Can you give us a reference to your authority?—I think it will be found in the evidence of Sir John Walsham, Inspector of Poor Laws, and of the Chief Constable of Essex, in the first report, page 48, or the second report, page 152, of the Select Committee of The House of Commons on Police, 1853.

12,513. As to the advisability of employing police constables in Scotland in similar duties, don't you think it would be a very difficult thing for them to be sufficiently versed in the technicalities of the Scottish Poor Law—the matter of relief of able-bodied men, and the responsibility of not relieving men apparently able-bodied, who turned out to be in ill-health?—I was not at all favourable to that duty being extended to the police.

12,514. You don't go that length. Have you any bye-laws against vagrancy in Ayr?—No. I hand you the order that governs the police in Ayrshire with regard to vagrancy. They were orders for the treatment of tramps.

12,515. What I want to know is, what powers you have of dealing with them for begging offences?—Simple begging is an offence within the burghs.

12,516. I am excluding the burghs—they, of course, are under the Burgh Police Act. Outside the burghs is it an offence?—Not simple begging.

12,517. And I suppose being drunk and incapable is an offence only against the licensing laws, incurring a liability for twenty-four hours' imprisonment, or a five shilling fine.—Quite so.

12,518. You have experience of the more drastic provision of the Burgh Police Act in the police burghs—do you think it would be an advantage if the provisions of the Burgh Police Act, with regard to drunkenness and vagrancy, were extended to counties?—I feel very strongly it would be a mistake to extend the provisions of the Burgh Act relating to vagrancy to the rural districts.

12,519. You think that would be an mistake?—Yes.

12,520. You are aware that the Ayr County Council attempted to frame bye-laws?—No.

12,521. And you do not desire any extra power?—In those counties that have been dealt with it—

12,522. They have been supposed to be ultra vires?—I think that may have caused the county of Ayr to delay consideration.

12,523. That is simply a question of their being ultra vires, which can at once be settled by legislation, and, supposing the question were settled, do you think it would be absolutely undesirable by legislation to extend the vagrancy clauses of the Burgh Police Act?—It is the simple begging that I would fear being extended to the county districts. I have a report in my hand which I submitted to the Police Committee on that subject.

12,524. Would you give us the gist of it?—I think that simple begging excepted everything that is contained in the 408th to the 411th of the vagrancy clauses of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892—all the offences that are included in these clauses could be dealt with in the county under various statutes, such as the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, which extended to Scotland the Rogue and Vagabond clause of the English Vagrancy Act; the Trespass (Scotland) Act, 1865; the Industrial Schools Act, the Pedlars' Act, and the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act.

*Captain
Hardy

12,525. I see in this address to the Police Committee of Ayrshire, you have dealt with the subject very elaborately, and I will ask you to put it in; but you mention here that the attempt to suppress vagrancy by committals to jail was tried some years ago in the county of Essex. During a period of three years a 1000 were committed, but it led to considerable expense without producing any favourable result—what is your authority?—It is printed on the margin of the Report.

12,526. You make frequent references to Essex?—My father, the late Admiral M'Hardy, was the Chief Constable of that county from 1840 to 1881.

12,527. You consider that it is desirable that opportunity should be taken to provide for powers for special cases—acts of begging, attended with abusive or insulting words, or behaviour not necessarily amounting, in a legal sense, to intimidation—but is not that a crime at common law?—No.

12,528. Another matter which you want more powers upon, is to deal with common prostitutes loitering or importuning; is that an offence which is at all common in the country districts outside the burghs?—Yes, on the outskirts of large Burghs. They are driven outside the burghs by the action of the police under the Burgh Act.

12,529. And what about old clothes men dealing from door to door?—They don't come under the Pedlars' Act.

12,530. Rag and bone gatherers—have you many of them?—No, not many.

12,531. Parliament is a very practical body, and any new proposals that are brought before it are not likely to be favourably entertained; but, if you say—'Here is a clause dealing with vagrancy which is a law in all the burghs, and apparently works well; extend it to the counties which surround them, and enable them to protect themselves from having these disorderly or vagrant classes thrown into the county,'—to what harm could it be? Your people need not imprison a thousand vagrants; but they would have the powers to deal with them as severely as in the burghs?—I take a case such as this. There is a county house in which they are in the habit of relieving everybody who appears in need and applies. That house is let to a stranger, and the stranger, who goes there, finds that he is inconveniened by the number of applicants for relief, and he calls upon the police to enforce the statutory powers for summary apprehension of beggars.

12,532. He would give a beggar in charge; that means that the beggar would be taken to the police office, and the stranger would be obliged to walk up to the police office next morning and give evidence, and he would think twice before he arrested the next beggar?—He would send the lodge-keeper.

12,533. But the lodge-keeper could not give evidence unless he saw the beggar?—Well, he would likely see him.

12,534. (By Col. M'Hardy.) What Act is it that you say begging is prohibited by?—Simple begging is not prohibited, except in burghs.

12,535. I understand you to say that by present statutes everything you wanted prohibited?—No; with the exception of simple begging, or even begging with abusive language.

12,536. And, as I understand, you would be sorry to see powers of apprehension given for cases of simple begging?—Yes.

12,537. (By Miss Stevenson.) I understood that you said, in answer to Col. M'Hardy, that you believed there were very many honest men tramping in search of work?—Yes.

12,538. But that you could not suggest any means by which they might be assisted and helped on their way?—I am afraid to suggest any system.

12,539. Am I also right in believing that, in answer to the Chairman, you said that amongst the tramps relieved by your Mendicity Society you had in your experience found very few of the class which might be characterised as respectable working men in search of work?—I said that I had not been able to find one of those that I had investigated; but I would not like it to be understood that there really may not be a great number, because those whom I think most respectable men may hesitate to give the information that enables you to investigate their antecedents.

12,540. And also you think possibly they would prefer not to apply to such a Society for help if they could do without it?—Amongst that class, doubtless, there are many who will suffer a great deal before begging.

12,541. Am I right that your Society does not deal with women and children, but only with men?—It includes women and children.

12,542. And you provide lodgings for them also?—Oh, yes; for any destitute wayfarer, whether man, woman, or child. [The witness then withdrew.]

*Captain
Hardy
M'Hardy.*

21 Dec. 1894

*Mr. Archibald
A. Young.*

MR. ARCHIBALD A. YOUNG, Assessor at the Central and St. Rollox Police Courts, Glasgow, called in and examined.

*Mr. Archibald
A. Young.*

12,543. (By the Chairman.) You are assessor at the Central Police Court?—I am interim assessor and clerk of court in the Central and St. Rollox Police Courts.

12,544. Would you please explain the duties of assessor to the Glasgow police magistrates?—The assessor sits along with the magistrate, and keeps the court book, and also advises the magistrate on all questions of law which may occur, and generally gives his advice to the magistrate regarding the penalties that should be imposed, and other matters that come before the court.

12,545. In fact, he is the power behind the magistrate?—To a considerable extent; especially when the magistrates come at first, they require to be guided a good deal. When they have gained a little experience they do not depend so much upon the assessor, except on legal questions.

12,546. There are several assessors in Glasgow?—Yes.

12,547. Do they ever consult at all with the view of trying to arrange in any way uniformity in dealing with cases of the same sort?—We sometimes have meetings together.

12,548. I should rather say with the view of recommending or advising the magistrates, so far as in their duty lies, in the direction of uniformity?—Yes. 'We sometimes meet together, and talk over things; and I think generally we are pretty much on the same lines as regards uniformity.'

12,549. We have been told that under the Police (Glasgow) Act, as the law is interpreted by the procurator-fiscal, care is taken not to make any mention of previous convictions?—Yes, that is the case.

12,550. Even when the prisoner had been found guilty, except in charges where previous convictions form part of the charge?—Yes, where they are scheduled.

12,551. A witness that we examined after that gentleman, had taken a note of the proceedings that transpired in court, and in almost every case we found that the magistrate informed himself previously to passing sentence, and informed himself by questions, as to whether this was the first offence or not?—He informs himself in our court by getting the information from the assessor pretty frequently, and sometimes he asks the prisoner the question, 'Have you been here before.'

12,552. Is that not rather straining at a gnat to swallow a camel, to take such trouble to keep the authentic record of books out of the magistrate's knowledge, and allow him to ask the prisoner a question,

Mr. Archibald A. Young. when the prisoner is liable to be contradicted by constables?—Whether they ask a prisoner or not, we do not allow a constable to come forward. The prosecutor does not allow him to come forward.

21 Dec. 1894. 12,553. And so the prisoner may tell as many lies as he likes?—No.

12,554. Is that known to the prisoner?—Unless he is a knowing one; but, as a matter of fact, the magistrates, and more especially the assessors, very soon get to know the run of habitual offenders who are up for drunkenness and incapability.

12,555. And you would think it a matter of ordinary course to inform the magistrate that this was an old offender?—Yes.

12,556. In connection with habitual offences, have you any suggestions to make?—I have had a pretty extended experience. It extends to about twenty years in the police courts. I was clerk of court to Stipendiary Gemmel all the time that he was stipendiary magistrate—that was for seventeen years. The class that I think legislation perhaps is required most for, in the way of confinement for a lengthened period, is the class of drunk and incapable women. I have been struck with this, that there are far more habitual women brought up for being drunk and incapable than men.

12,557. Yes, we have evidence on that point; we have statistics and figures?—I do not think as regards the men that there is so much necessity for it. There is a question regarding the number of people brought up in Glasgow for being drunk and incapable. During a number of years, Stipendiary Gemmel questioned all the drunks individually as to where they lived and what they did, and I noticed as a result of that—and he used often to remark it to me—that of all the male drunk and incapables on a Monday morning, there were at least one-third who did not belong to Glasgow. They were men who came in from Motherwell, or Hamilton, or Dumbarton, or elsewhere, perhaps to see a football match, and got the worse of drink.

12,558. Many footballers?—Yes, a good many. Stipendiary Gemmel used to remark that after a large football match we had rather an increase in these cases.

12,559. Many from Govan?—Yes, a good many.

12,560. More than its share?—No. I would not say more than its share, considering its large population.

12,561. But a good share for 65,000 of a population, as compared with Glasgow's 672,000? Do you think there is a considerable share from Govan?—Yes.

12,562. I asked that because it bears upon a point which I am going to ask you now. Can you give us any explanation as to how the number of apprehensions in Glasgow in 1893 was 60 per 1000 for breaches of the peace, petty assaults, drunk and incapables, and drunk and disorderlies, whereas the number of arrests in Govan was only 28?—I would be inclined to say the reason of that was that a large proportion of our cases occur on the Saturday night. Our Monday court would be equal to any other three days of the week. On Saturday evenings I understand that a great number of people come in from these outlying districts into Glasgow. If you were going down, say to the Govan Road, between two and six on a Saturday afternoon, you would see a stream of people making for Glasgow. Later in the night the stream returns from Glasgow, and in that way Glasgow, I think, gets a great many outlying cases on a Saturday night of people who come into the city, get the worse of drink, and are apprehended for being drunk and incapable; while, on the other hand, Govan and the surrounding districts do not get from Glasgow a number corresponding to the same extent. Glasgow is the centre of attraction and amusement.

12,563. But you do not think the people of Glasgow have more original sin in them than the people of Govan?—No.

12,564. Or of Greenock, or of Leith?—No, I do not think they have.

12,565. And yet Leith has only one-third of the number of arrests in Glasgow, and Greenock has little more than one-half?—I would say Greenock won't have any influx. Leith people, I would fancy, go up to Mr. Archibald A. Young. Edinburgh.

12,566. Well, but Edinburgh is only 24 per 1000?—But if you take Edinburgh as the centre of a radius of 10 miles, and take Glasgow as the centre of a corresponding radius, I would say that Glasgow is the centre of a far larger population than what Edinburgh has immediately around it.

12,567. You have had a long police-court experience, and you have sat under Stipendiary Gemmel, who was a gentleman disposed by nature to deal leniently with the vast majority of cases that came under his notice?—Yes.

12,568. Do you think the number of arrests can be at all due to the officious interference of constables with cases that could be perfectly well left to find their way home?—I think not. I sometimes see cases where I think constables would have, perhaps, been better to let the people go home, but, taking the mass of cases generally, I do not think it can be due to that. The drunk and incapable cases form a large proportion. Now, all these cases are quite justifiably apprehended, because it is a very rare thing for a drunk and incapable to plead not guilty. There will be one in thirty, at the outside, who plead not guilty.

12,569. And of those who plead not guilty?—The majority are convicted. There are sometimes special circumstances. A man will plead he got a knock on the head, which made him stupid, and the magistrate may consider there is a doubt as to whether he was drunk or not, and he gets off.

12,570. Do you think that many of these cases of disorder arise from the injudicious interference of constables? The Chief Constable of Govan told us that he largely reduced the arrests by ordering his men not to interfere more than they could help,—that previous to his going there they had interfered very often in cases where it was not necessary, and that they had the whole population against them to such an extent that, on a man being arrested, a crowd got round him, and took parts for the prisoner and against the constable, and there was a cause of riot, and half a dozen people were run in in consequence; that he had changed all that, and that the people now regarded the police more as their friends, and that fewer arrests were required, and the police work was more pleasantly done?—I do not think I could say the police of Glasgow unjustifiably arrest people.

12,571. Do you think there is an irritation arising out of the frequency of police intervention which leads to the arrest of any large number of people in connection with the arrests made by the people unnecessarily arrested? Do you find many people taken up interfering with the police when they are arresting a drunk and incapable man?—Not a large proportion. There are a few perhaps—perhaps more in the St. Rollox district of that kind. About Garngad Road there is rather a disorderly element.

12,572. But you think, on the whole, you can offer no explanation, except what you have given us?—The situation of Glasgow, and the nature of the occupations of the mass of the population, and good wages that are earned in some districts may have something to do with it. There is a large amount of money in the hands of some of these people.

12,573. Do you come across many pay-day drunkards? That is to say, men who every big pay-day get drunk?—Not many.

12,574. It has been urged as an objection that, if we make any attempt to deal with habitual drunkards, such as the men who come before the police court so many times in a year, that we should get into our net a very large number of respectable and estimable working men, who get drunk every fortnight?—Yes.

12,575. Does your experience lead you to believe in the existence, on a large scale, of such men?—I do not think there are many men who come before the court once a fortnight or once a month.

12,576. It is suggested he would not come into the hands of the police anything like so often?—There may be pay-day drunkards who only drink to the

Mr. Archibald extent that they get the worse of drink, but do not come into the hands of the police.

A. Young.
21 Dec. 1894.

12,577. But it is suggested that, for every time a man comes into the hands of the police, he manages to get home six times?—I daresay that is the case.

12,578. Do you find any respectable people coming up?—There are a good many of the men, I would say, on the Monday morning who come before us who are respectable working men in pretty steady employment, who just get drunk through it just being Saturday night, and having means at their hand.

12,579. The bailies deal very differently with cases of the same class, don't they, or do you ever try to get them pretty much on the same lines?—Yes, they vary a little. Some give the 'drunk and incapables' a fine of 2s. 6d.: others admonish them, and others give 5s. at once.

12,580. Some of them 14 days at particular seasons, especially at New Year time?—My experience has rather been that they are inclined to be more lenient than that. That is the citizen magistrates.

12,581. We have been told that before the New Year a number of habituals were run in for long sentences?—Yes. Mr Gemmel used to do that, and some of them do so in order to keep the habituals out of temptation during the New Year time.

12,582. Have you the same variety in dealing with cases of solicitation, that is, importuning?—Yes. There is, perhaps, even more variety there among the citizen magistrates. There are some of them who look upon these cases in a severer light than others.

12,583. What is the usual thing here?—In all cases where a woman is brought up for the first time, they dismiss her with an admonition.

12,584. What is the evidence against her on the first occasion?—Just two constables who swear on the same lines that they have known this woman for perhaps two months, they have seen her walking about the streets late at night, and speaking to men. We generally take care, on the first occasion especially, to ask them whether they had ever warned the woman, and the general answer is that they have previously warned them. The constables will speak as to the particular night, and to having seen her talking to three, four, or five different men, and loitering for a specified time about the place.

12,585. But you were telling us that the different magistrates treated the thing differently?—In regard to the penalties, there are some of them who do not care perhaps to give much more than 10s. 6d. or 15s.; others take advantage of the Glasgow Police Further Powers Act, and in all cases where a woman has been fined before, if she is convicted, they fine her 40s. or 30 days' imprisonment.

12,586. And the custom is always to bring forward previous convictions as evidence of the woman being a prostitute?—Yes.

12,587. You never in such cases have any evidence except police evidence?—Practically never. I have seen it on rare occasions, but not often. There is one thing regarding that that I may mention. Mr Gemmel spoke to a great many of those girls privately. He used very often to take me into his room at the time, and I was struck with this, that while in some cases I was inclined to think the police might have been hasty, in all cases he investigated he found that the women were really women who had gone wrong.

12,588. We have seen a large number of women in prisons and in homes, and we have been struck with the consistency with which many of them told the same story,—namely, that on the present occasion, or on some other occasion when they were sent to prison, that they were not guilty of loitering or importuning. One woman told us that she was going out for the purpose of prostitution, but that she was collared before she got almost down her stair, and they say that once a woman has been convicted she has, as they call it, no chance, and that she is run in by the police at every possible opportunity. Do you think there is anything in that?—As a general rule the cases are those where women were out between eleven and twelve o'clock at night, and they could give no reason for being out at that time. Of course policemen are not infallible, and I daresay at times they may not tell the truth.

12,589. Evidence has been given to us that on those two occasions the evidence of the two policemen was often suspiciously identical?—It runs on the same lines, but the one last examined does not hear the first give his evidence. When they go into the police office they are together.

12,590. They bring the woman together to the station?—Yes, it is a difficult question, that of prostitution, just for that reason that you are always dependent upon police evidence. There is another class of case I wish to make a remark upon. That is beggars. I think it would be a good thing if, in the case of non-able-bodied beggars—

12,591. If they were remitted to the poorhouse authorities with the power of detention?—Yes.

12,592. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Have you observed whether there has been any increase of severity in the sentences within recent years that are pronounced upon drunk and incapables?—I think not. The magistrates, perhaps, within the last two or three years, had been a little more inclined to lengthen the alternative in the case of habitual women, to make it ten days or fourteen days where they come in regularly.

12,593. But that is only within the last year or two?—I think it is more prevalent within the last few years.

12,594. Has that been attended with diminution in the number of charges?—It would be very difficult to say. I think they have kept pretty much the same.

12,595. Notwithstanding the increased severity?—Yes.

12,596. In dealing with persons that are drunk and disorderly, I suppose they are brought up for breach of the peace?—They are brought up, and the charge is 'riotous and disorderly in your conduct by cursing and swearing, and making a noise.'

12,597. That is practically a common law charge of breach of the peace?—Yes.

12,598. Has there been any increase in severity in dealing with such cases?—No, I think not. They are a class of case that vary more in their nature than the drunk and incapable cases.

12,599. Is it customary to rely only upon police evidence?—In the majority of the cases I think it is.

12,600. In the case of loitering, are the police constables always asked how they come to know that the person is a prostitute?—Yes, they are asked that always.

12,601. What is taken as amounting to loitering?—The fact that they are seen on the street for a time, and speaking to different men. They are almost never charged with just loitering, but with importuning also.

12,602. Is simply accosting a man held to come up to importuning?—Yes. In the great majority of cases there is no evidence forthcoming as to what the woman said.

12,603. Or whether she persistently followed one man?—Very seldom.

12,604. Has there been any increase in the severity of the sentences in their case?—Except since the passing of the 1892 Act, when the term of imprisonment was increased. Formerly it was limited to fourteen days, but the passing of that Act increased the term to thirty days or one month, and pretty often that alternative is given.

12,605. Has there been any, or have you observed any change in the appearance of the class of women that are brought up? Some people have said they are falling off very much in appearance?—I daresay they are a little, in the Central district. I have not been often at the Northern Court, but sometimes when I was there, I noticed the class that came before that court are a better class than those who come before the Central. The Northern Court prostitutes are those

Mr. Archibald
A. Young.

Mr. Archibald A. Young. who loiter about the theatres, and the northern quarter of the city.

21 Dec. 1894. 12,606. In regard to previous convictions, have you any power to libel previous convictions of statutory offences?—No.

12,607. It is only then in common law offences that it is done?—Yes.

12,608. When they are libelled on a common law offence, is it the practice with you for the clerk to read the main charge first?—The fiscal really reads it; that is just the main charge.

12,609. Nothing is said about the previous conviction until the main charge is disposed of?—No.

12,610. When they are not libelled, in what class of cases, if any, does the magistrate take them into account in fixing the amount of his sentence?—It is almost only in the drunk and incapable; occasionally in the riotous and disorderly.

12,611. Under what power is that done?—I do not know of any power that is given in regard to that, except that Mr. Gemmel, who sat from week to week all the year round, and for many years, got to know the prisoners, and he did not really require to ask any person. He knew them from his personal knowledge.

12,612. The point I want to get at is, is there not a great liability to mistake in simply asking the constable?—They do not ask the constable.

12,613. They ask the fiscal?—No; just the assessor, or sometimes they ask the prisoner. I always take great care, unless I am perfectly sure of the person. I never say they have been here before unless perfectly certain of the fact, but there are some of our prisoners who come before the court that we know almost as well as members of our own family—they come so often.

12,614. Well, in these cases, is care always taken not to bring up the fact of previous convictions until finding the main charge proven?—Yes, the most of these cases where the magistrate consults with the assessor, are drunk and incapable cases, and they plead guilty.

12,615. And admit the previous convictions?—Yes; but they are not always asked.

12,616. But, when a magistrate asks you, and you tell him that the person has been previously convicted, does he then ask the prisoner what he says to that?—Not always.

12,617. Then it might happen that the prisoner was supposed to have been previously convicted, when, if the matter had been put to him, he would have disputed it?—He might.

12,618. Do you ever use in the Glasgow Police Court the power of the Act of 1881, to give time to pay fines?—No, never.

12,619. What is done about them? Is the prisoner detained in a cell for a while till his friends get time to get the money?—Yes.

12,620. How long after his sentence is it before he is sent to prison?—It varies considerably. The court begins, say, at half-past nine. The prison van comes about two o'clock. Well, if a prisoner happens to be brought up shortly after the court begins, he will have three hours or so; but, if the court sits long, he might not have half an hour after sentence.

12,621. What is the reason they never give a time? There is power to put it in the sentence, under the Summary Act of 1881?—The court can allow payment to be made by instalment, requiring security or caution to be found. I rather think that the most of our cases are not brought under the Summary Jurisdiction Act. They are brought up as police offences.

12,622. Then do these powers not apply to the police offences?—I am not quite sure whether they would apply, unless the case was charged under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts.

12,623. But, at any rate, as a matter of practice, it is not done?—No.

12,624. Are the powers of First Offenders Act much used?—Yes, they are used in a good many cases, especially with juveniles. We do it in a kind of way by delaying the sentence for three months, and ordering the offender to come up for sentence, and, if he behaves in the interval, he is then dismissed.

12,625. When does your court begin to sit in the morning?—The magistrate who takes the Central Court takes St. Rollox Court also. Some of them begin at fifteen minutes past nine, and, whenever the St. Rollox Court is done, we go down to the Central.

12,626. How long does the St. Rollox Court usually last?—On Monday morning it lasts an hour.

12,627. How many cases will you dispose of in that time?—About thirty on an average—a good many of them pledges, and a few remits.

12,628. And from the St. Rollox Court you go to the Central Court?—Yes.

12,629. And how long will it last?—On a Monday, I would say, on an average four hours.

12,630. And how many cases will you dispose of in that time on an average?—From 100 to 120.

12,631. That is about the same rate?—Yes, a great many of these pledges, too.

12,632. Do you think that is sufficient time?—I think it is. I do not think even longer time would be much benefit.

12,633. It is a little rapid?—If you take into account that out of 120 cases there will be 60 of them drunk and incapables it is not so much so.

12,634. But it is only four minutes each?—But there are pledges among the others.

12,635. But it does not occur to you that giving a little more time might possibly save risk of an occasional mistake?—No. I think the magistrates are generally pretty careful. In the matter of witnesses the prisoners are almost always asked whether they have any witnesses to call.

12,636. When Mr Gemmel was Stipendiary, did the same speed exist?—No, not quite. I would say on an average he would take an hour longer. He inquired more into the circumstances of offenders, such as drunks.

12,637. (By Miss Stevenson.) You said that you thought that the necessity for longer detention in cases of people apprehended for being drunk and incapable was more necessary for women than for men?—I find from the returns we have here, that in 1893 21,926 arrests were made of males for being drunk and incapable, and 12,072 of women—therefore the proportion of those who were arrested more than once, must be very much higher in the case of women than of men?—Very much.

12,638. I suppose this class of drunk and incapable women includes also a large number of the prostitute class?—Yes, although there are some of the most habitual drunkards among women who are never up for importuning.

12,639. But I suppose there are very few of the other class who are not up for being drunk and disorderly and drunk and incapable?—Occasionally it is the case.

12,640. I suppose the causes of the multiplication of apprehensions in the case of women being so much higher than in that of men is that these apprehensions are for prostitution? Are not the figures you stated, 12,000, for apprehensions for drunk and incapable?—I think those are for drunk and incapable pure and simple.

12,641. It simply says the number of times they are committed to prison, but it does not differentiate the offences?—Taking the drunk and incapable cases alone, I should say the women are very much more frequently also. The class that come before us are very much more of the habitual class.

12,642. It is not the fact that these women are repeatedly run in for the other offences that multiplies the number of committals in the case of women?—I think not.

12,643. Have the policemen any interest in summing up the number of arrests they make?—I think not.

12,644. My reason for asking that is this, that the other evening in an evening paper I saw a report of a constable being tried for assault. In the evidence of

Mr. Archibald A. Young.

21 Dec. 1894.

Mr. Archibald A. Young his good character it was stated that he was frequently rewarded for the number of arrests he made?—That was an incorrect report. That prisoner was tried before me, and the statement made in his defence was that he had been twice rewarded for arresting house-breakers in a brave manner. It was not for the number of arrests he made. [The witness then withdrew.]

Mr. Archibald A. Young

21 Dec. 1894.

Miss Mary Paterson.

Miss MARY PATERSON, Factory Inspector for Scotland and North of England, called in and examined.

Miss Mary Paterson.

12,645. (By the Chairman.) We wish to see you to ask you whether the practice of not inspecting sewing establishments, conducted in charitable institutions, is universal, or whether it prevails only in Glasgow, and, if so, why the exception is made in the case of charitable institutions?—I understand it is universal, so far as I know. I do not know where they are inspected. There is nothing in the Act that I can find that excepts them.

12,646. Can you tell us when that exception came to be made. Was it made by instructions from the Home Office or from the late Chief Inspector of Factories?—I cannot tell; I made some little inquiry and I cannot find. There is nothing in the Factory Act about it, but they are considered exempt, and the only opinion I have got from the Superintending Inspector is, that there must have been an order from some Secretary of State.

12,647. Your district includes not only Glasgow but the North of England?—And all Scotland.

12,648. And the same practice prevails in the North of England as in Scotland?—Yes.

12,649. What is your idea as to the policy of excluding them? Do you think it is right that women, working in institutions where they are more or less under control, and often under lock and key, although not imprisoned actually, but really that; do you think it is right that they should be allowed to compete with the sewing work done outside on different conditions, or do you think they should be under the same law?—I think personally they should be under the same law. I made a good many visits to charitable institutions and places of that kind when making inquiries as to the policy of including laundries under the Factories Act, and I recommended that, in any inclusion of laundries under the Act, that all charitable institutions, laundries in refuges, and convents, and places of that kind, should be included.

12,650. And the same would apply to sewing and other work?—Yes, worked on the same principle.

12,651. Do you know if that is the opinion of the Chief Inspector of Scotland, Col. Meade King?—I don't know, but I think it was recommended by the Chief Inspector, Mr Orme, at the Home Office, in sending up a general report with regard to the laundries.

12,652. I am speaking about workshops. Do they fall under the Workshops Act?—I do not know. Laundries do not fall under the Workshops Act at present.

12,653. Has the matter been brought under the attention of Mr Orme or the authorities in the head office in London?—I know it was at one time, when a request that some prison should be visited. A request came from the governor of a prison, and it was stated at that time by the Chief Inspector, who is not the Chief Inspector now, that these places were all exempt.

12,654. Yes, a prison would be exempt, because it is under more direct inspection from another quarter. Your inspection is for the purpose of seeing as to the hours worked and the sanitary arrangements. You have told us that your personal opinion is in favour of including laundries as well as workshops?—Yes, and charitable institutions. I think pretty much the same rules apply to sewing and such work as is carried on in charitable institutions and in laundries.

12,655. You do not know anything about the hours worked in these charitable institutions?—In connection with laundry work I do; but not in connection with the sewing.

12,656. I think in a statement you have made, you say that a creamery is a workshop. Will you give the definition?—I will give you the clause, from the Factory Act of 1878, which says—'Any premises, room, or place, not being a factory within the meaning of this Act, in which premises, room, or place, or within the close or curtilage or precincts of which premises any manual labour is exercised by way of trade or for other purposes of gain, in or incidental to the following purposes or any of them, that is to say, in or incidental to the making of any article or part of any article; in or incidental to the altering, repairing, ornamenting, or finishing of any article; or in or incidental to the adapting for sale of any article, and to which or over which room or place the employer of the persons working therein has the right of access or control.'

12,657. There is another clause or part of a clause that also, in your opinion, bears upon the applicability of the Workshops Act to the work done in these charitable institutions. Would you please read it?—It is section 94, and is as follows:—'A child, young person, or woman who works in a factory or workshop, whether for wages or not, either in a manufacturing process or handicraft, or in cleaning any part of the factory or workshop used for any manufacturing process or handicraft, or in cleaning or oiling any part of the machinery, or in any other kind of work, whatsoever incidental to or connected with the manufacturing process or handicraft, or connected with the article made or otherwise the subject of the manufacturing process or handicraft therein, shall, save as is otherwise provided by this Act, be deemed to be employed therein within the meaning of this Act.'

12,658. Therefore you think that the inmates of these places are clearly employed in workshops, and that, if we were to recommend that these places should be inspected, that that could be brought about without any legislation in that direction?—As far as I can find from the Act that is so.

12,659. As far as you have consulted Col. Meade King as to whether he is aware of any decision exempting workshops in charitable institutions, and he has told you that he is not aware of it?—He has just considered them exempt.

12,660. (By Miss Stevenson.) In visiting these laundries in these different institutions, did you find the hours were longer than allowed under the Factories Act, or did you obtain that information?—In some of them. The hours varied very much, and from season to season: the work was very irregular. I found there were some of them too long, according to the Factory Act, at times, and that the holidays were irregular.

12,661. Are you aware that in some of these institutions work is taken in to be finished, the previous parts of which have been done under the conditions of the Factory Act in outside establishments?—No, I was not aware.

12,662. In one institution which came under my notice, they take in work from a warehouse where the beginning of the work is carried on under the conditions of the Factories Act, but is finished in this institution outside of the conditions of the Factory Act?—I can quite believe it. It seems quite a consistent arrangement.

12,663. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you think the same necessity exists for factory inspection in those homes, managed by charitable ladies, as institutions worked for private gain?—I have not sufficient experience to give information on the subject.

12,664. Supposing you are assured that the hygienic surroundings, and the moral and social influences, in such a home are superior to what is experienced by women who work in other places, would that be sufficient extenuation for the length of hours which are

Miss Mary
Paterson.

21 Dec. 1894.

worked in some of these charitable institutions?—I think it would be almost impossible to find people working under better conditions than in some of the public laundries.

12,665. I am not speaking of the laundries. I mean when they go to their homes; would that be sufficient to exclude them in regard to time?—Not in my opinion.

12,666. And, supposing I tell you that 30 per cent. less work was done in the same amount of hours by women working voluntarily in charitable institutions than in public laundries where they work for the day's pay or piece-work, do you think that would be a reason for excluding them from the rigid enforcement of the Factory Act?—One would need to know why less work was done.

12,667. It has been found in all institutions, prison and others, and voluntary institutions, that the same amount of work is not got from the inmates as from free labourers. Would not that be some justification for the longer hours?—I think the hours allowed by the Factory Act are long enough.

12,668. Provided they do the amount of work?—No. Whether the work is great or small.

12,668A. You would make no allowance?—No. [The witness then withdrew.]

Miss Mary
Paterson.

21 Dec. 1894.

Dr. Batty
Tuke.

J. BATTY TUKE, M.D., Edinburgh, called in and examined.

Dr. Batty
Tuke.

12,669. (By Dr. Farquharson.) You are a physician in practice in Edinburgh?—I am.

12,670. How long have you practised there?—Thirty-five years.

12,671. And your degrees are?—M.D., and Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians.

12,672. And you are a member of the General Medical Council?—Yes.

12,673. You have given special attention, have you not, to matters connected with lunacy?—Yes.

12,674. And also matters connected with habitual drunkenness?—Yes.

12,675. Would you care about hazarding any opinion as to the connection between lunacy and the tendency to habitual drunkenness?—It is rather a large question. Of course undoubtedly the excitement of insanity very often shows itself in drink, and in drink only. You can put it in this way. An attack of acute mania in one case may be represented by an attack of heavy drinking; that is the means by which excitement is shown. Then again you have the hereditary class of drunkard, who breaks out at various periods of his life, or continuously.

12,676. Are habitual drunkards a fairly numerous class?—They are numerous, I am sorry to say.

12,677. And, do you think, they are increasing?—I cannot say. Of course my experience has lain almost entirely with the better class of society. I cannot offer any opinion as to the pauper class.

12,678. Do you think that the present means of dealing with the class of offenders—if we may call them so—of which you have experience, are sufficient?—They are entirely inadequate. In fact, practically, there are none for Scotland.

12,679. Are you satisfied with the present definition of habitual inebriety?—I do not know of any definition there is, except in the 1879 Act.

12,680. Do you think that is sufficiently good?—It is one that might be misapplied in many ways.

12,681. Have you any definition of your own that you would like to substitute for it?—I should take the very simple one of following the Lunacy Act, in which a lunatic is defined for the purposes of the Act. 'Lunatic, when used in this Act, shall mean and include every person certified by two medical persons to be a lunatic, an insane person, an idiot, or a person of 'unsound mind.' I hold that a definition of a similar kind, in connection with inebriates, would remove all difficulties as to definition. I would put it in this way:—'A habitual drunkard shall mean and include every person certified to be so by the order of the chairman of the court provided in this Act, or who voluntarily submits himself to its provisions.'

12,682. The class whom you have had to do with is not those who make ostentatious display, but who drink quietly at home and do not come before legal authorities. What would your machinery be to get hold of them?—I hold, if it is proposed to limit their liberty, it should be done by a properly constituted court, very much in the same way as a court interferes in the matter of the lunatic. In Scotland and now in England there is a calm judicial procedure, by which a petition is sent to the sheriff, who obtains such evidence as satisfies him before committing the person to an asylum. This procedure is conducted in camera.

12,683. In camera?—Yes, mainly because the public at large are very well aware of the necessity of such procedure, and they do not ask for it to be conducted in public.

12,684. But, would your court carry on its operations in public?—I believe it would be better for the sake of the public, and so obtain a thorough feeling of public confidence in the working of the Act.

12,685. Then you would have a judge sitting as a High Court. Would you have any other officials?—I ventured to suggest, in an article in the Nineteenth Century (June 1893), that the judge might be assisted by two assessors, one appointed by the inebriate himself, and the other by the petitioner.

12,686. Where would the medical evidence come in?—Simply by evidence in court.

12,687. Not by certification as in lunacy?—I do not think that would be sufficient. I do not think the public would be satisfied with that at present.

12,688. It would only be one part of the other evidence that would combine to ensure a committal?—I believe the action of such a court as that would very seldom be brought into play, for this reason, that the person who submitted himself or herself voluntarily to seclusion would not require to go before a public court; but one would have it always in reserve. Let me mention a case that occurred only last Sunday. A man came to me and said—'What am I to do with my wife, she is ruining my business; she is making my house uninhabitable.' I said 'Will she submit herself to confinement. Would I do any good by seeing her.' 'No,' he said 'I do not think it will do any good, but what can I do.' I said 'You can do nothing. You are absolutely helpless.' But if there was an Act, such as I am suggesting, it would be there to enable the husband to say 'Well, in that case, we will see what the sheriff says about it.' That threat being held over the drunkard would, in nine cases out of ten, be effective. I believe the drunkard would then feel that a stronger power being over him or her, voluntary seclusion would be acceded to.

12,689. (By Dr. Sutherland.) It would not do away with the voluntary method now in operation?—Far from it.

12,690. It would work side by side with it, and make the voluntary more operative?—Yes. In America, for instance, 94 per cent. of the inmates of retreats are "voluntaries."

12,691. (By Dr. Farquharson.) In America?—In those states in which you have the strong compulsory Act.

12,692. But the essential part of your plan is compulsory power?—Always to have it to fall back upon.

12,693. Have you formed any definite opinion as to the length of detention to abolish the drink curse?—Not less than two years. My experience is, that not less than that period has produced anything like perfect recovery.

12,694. Would you make that a minimum or maximum?—I should make it a maximum, I think.

12,695. Do you think your court would involve much expense either to the State or the individual?—

Tuke.*

21 Dec. 1894.

I should think not. I should think it would be very cheap. Of course the expense would be more in the matter of defence than of prosecution. I should think there would only be the cost of the evidence of half a dozen respectable persons, medical or otherwise.

12,696. What advantage do you expect to get from this detention. Do you expect reformation or cure?—In a certain proportion you get recovery.

12,697. How much?—10 to 15 per cent.

12,698. We have had it put at 30?—I think that is over-stating it, judging from my own experience.

12,699. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Is there sufficient experience in Scotland to warrant any percentage being given regarding the cure of inebriety?—There are no public figures.

12,700. (By Dr. Farquharson.) But, after you have got your 10, 15, or 30 per cent. cured, what are you going to do with the others?—That is the difficulty in the whole question.

12,701. Have you any suggestions?—Supposing a man has gone through his two years' seclusion and breaks down badly again, and is going back to his old habits, you can always make it possible for him to be recommitted on the sentence of any magistrate. It would be unnecessary to go through the courts again.

12,702. Recommitted from time to time?—Yes.

12,703. How do you deal with the person who is shut up. Would you have curators?—Having been found a habitual drunkard, I should then place him immediately under a curator, and I would not allow the curatory to cease and determine with the period of incarceration.

12,704. Would you approve of making any use of lunatic asylums for the detention of drunkards, such as setting apart a wing for the treatment of these people?—My own experience is that they are not a class to be dealt with together. I doubt about the propriety of herding them together.

12,705. You think they would be better in small groups?—I would not prevent an asylum taking them in. I would leave that very much to the feeling of the friends of the patient.

12,706. We have had the opinion that the disadvantage of the large institution is that the patients conspire as to how to get drink?—That is not my experience. I have known a man make a bolt once or twice. I have known a man out walking to make a bolt into a public-house, but what you have said is not within my experience.

12,707. Have you an opinion as to how these institutions should be maintained—I mean in the case of those people who cannot maintain themselves. Would you put it on the State or the locality?—You are speaking of the pauper. That would have to go upon the State.

12,708. Without any local contribution at all?—It is a matter I really have not considered. As I say, I have been mainly taking into consideration drunkards of the better class of society.

12,709. Have you any faith in drug treatment for inebriety? I won't ask you about those quack cures. I probably know your opinion in advance?—No.

12,710. Have you any faith in any sort of drug cure?—No. In the case of a man who has allowed a sufficient time to get the poison out of his system, and who has regained his general health, there is nothing more to treat. It is a mere matter of time for him to regain his general health.

12,711. And that is by eliminating the liquor from the tissues?—It wears out, and the tissues recover their tone in the absence of the liquor.

12,712. Do you think you could cure a large number of these cases if you got them before the tissues began to suffer?—Yes, no doubt.

12,713. But would not the public consider it rather a drastic step to deal with a man before there was sufficient evidence?—You will never get that.

12,714. And that makes the treatment much more hopeless, the fact that they have often got beyond the curative stage before you can lay hold of them?—That is so. There is nothing so hereditary as drinking. Dr. Batty Tuke. There is no form of insanity or disease that is so thoroughly hereditary as drinking. Ebri gignunt ebrios is the old proverb, and it is true.

12,715. Do you find hereditary cases very difficult to treat?—No, not at all.

12,716. You think not?—No; not more so than others.

12,717. Have you any experience of morphia, chloral, and other such cases?—Yes. They are more difficult to deal with.

12,718. Would you give them the same mode of treatment?—Yes, but they are more difficult because they are not such a nuisance to society as the others are. They kill themselves in time.

12,719. They are not violent?—They are not such public nuisances as the others.

12,720. Is there any other point upon which you wish to give information?—One reason why I desired to come here, was to urge the necessity for a strong Act to prevent what occurs now very frequently, and that is the sailing far too close to the law in connection with the liberty of the subject. I mean this, that a large number of people are detained in various establishments nominally, voluntarily who are not voluntary. Take, for instance, a woman who is sent up from the South of England. I know a case now. She is placed in one of these establishments as a voluntary patient. She gets wearied, and tired, and sick of the thing in a week, or a fortnight, or three months, and she says: 'I want to go away.' The answer, is 'Well, go away.' 'But I can't get home, I have no money to go home with.' She writes for money and does not get it. She is there, and there is no power to enable her to get out, except by money being provided for her. Now, I say that is a state of matters that should not exist.

12,721. Assuming we are not able to go so far as you want in the way of compulsion, would you be in favour of putting these institutions under inspection?—Certainly.

12,722. That would meet your point?—Certainly. I would have no objection to their being detained. It is good for them that this irregular thing should be done. It is necessary, I have done it myself, but it is interfering with the liberty of the subject in a way that is not proper.

12,723. It is good done in a wrong way?—Yes. That I hold is one of the strongest reasons for the compulsory power.

12,724. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you find many victims of the paraldehyde, cocaine, morphia, ether, &c. habit among your patients?—Not paraldehyde; morphia frequently, and cocaine.

12,725. Not paraldehyde. I think Dr. Norman Kerr speaks of that habit?—I do not remember.

12,726. Do you not think that the definition of a drunkard in the Act of 1879 is an admirable one. It says:—'Habitual drunkard means a person who, not being amenable to any jurisdiction in lunacy, is, notwithstanding, by reason of habitual intemperate drinking of intoxicating liquor, at times dangerous to himself or herself or to others, or incapable of managing himself or herself and his or her affairs?—It includes a large number of people whom you do not wish to shut up.

12,727. You would shut up nobody who was not dangerous to himself, or herself, or others, or incapable of managing his or her affairs. If the court you suggest were established, would not that prevent any injustice being inflicted upon any individual?—Yes.

12,728. With a definition such as this, would not a court, such as you suggest, be sufficient to protect the liberty of any individual?—Undoubtedly.

12,729. In speaking of the court, do you refer to the procedure adopted in regard to the ordinary lunatic, in regard to whom two certificates are produced to the sheriff, and he signs a warrant for his committal to an asylum, or that followed in regard to dangerous and offensive lunatics?—The ordinary procedure.

12,730. You think there would be danger in the mere production of two medical certificates and a

Tuke.*

- Dr. Batty Tuke.*
21 Dec. 1894.
- committal thereupon to a retreat or reformatory?—Yes, possibly.
- 12,731. And you would approve of the procedure where the lunatic himself is present—and may speak for himself or cross-examine the witness?—That would protect the individual.
- 12,732. In answer to Dr. Farquharson, you stated that the absence of licensed homes had led to the existence in Scotland of these irregular homes where people nominally went voluntarily, but were really detained against their will?—Yes.
- 12,733. You are of opinion that, if licensed homes were established, this kind of quasi-asylum institution would be unnecessary?—No. I say that the people would be detained in a legal manner instead of now in an irregular manner.
- 12,734. You spoke about the homes in America. I suppose you are quite satisfied as to the American law as regards the definition of inebriety?—I have not looked it up for some time.
- 12,735. Have you visited any of the homes?—No.
- 12,736. The ways and means of maintaining drunkards of the poorer class is very important, and perhaps the most difficult phase of this inebriety question; because, it is hardly possible to get class legislation which would provide for the rich and leave the poor still to go on unchecked. Would not the same rules as in lunacy apply to them as regards their maintenance. Would that meet your view?—Yes.
- 12,737. You suggested two years as the period of detention. If satisfactory proof were given you that an inebriate might be liberated sooner, you would have no objection, on proper information being furnished, to his being allowed to go?—If the information were trustworthy, no.
- 12,738. You would allow them to go out on parole, and be liable to recommittal on violation of the conditions?—Yes.
- 12,739. But, suppose an inebriate behaved himself for five or more years, would not that necessitate a new trial?—Yes. If a man kept well for three years, I would give him a clean bill of health. I would not say he would never relapse, but I think it would not be a just and proper thing to keep him for more than three years.
- 12,740. (By Dr. Farquharson.) You would not say for two years after he got out? I would say three years altogether.—A year on parole.
- 12,741. If you had the means, you would be inclined to treat drunkards in a separate institution from lunatics?—Yes, certainly, in the great majority of cases.
- 12,742. We have been told by experts like yourself that the drunkard has an unsettling effect on the lunatic, in so far as the drunkard, not being an insane man, is apt to disturb the quiet of the asylum?—I have never had difficulty in managing the inebriate. If a man does not behave himself I threaten to send him away; it is the easiest way to manage him, as he generally submits.
- 12,743. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Would you interfere with the power of a committed person to make a will?—Not if he is sane between bouts.
- 12,744. (By Dr. Sutherland.) As a matter of fact and experience, the same civil and social disabilities do not attach to a drunkard that attach to a lunatic?—There are no civil disabilities attaching to a lunatic, except loss of personal liberty.
- 12,745. He cannot manage his affairs, and requires a curator. Can he make a valid will?—Yes, he can.
- 12,746. In a lucid interval?—No, he can make a will if he likes. It is only liable to be called in question. Many so made have been upheld. There is nothing except his personal liberty interfered with. The lunatic does not suffer from any social or civil disability. It is a fact that at last general election several of the lunatic asylums were scraped for electors to go and vote for members of Parliament.
- 12,747. The public do not attach the same stigma to an inebriate as to a lunatic—I mean to say that people have less objection to marry a drunkard than a lunatic, or associate with them?—I suppose that is so.
- 12,748. Have you any experience in those cases of inebriety, perfectly well known to the friends and neighbours which is allowed to go on unchecked, even in the upper circles, until a fatal assault is committed?—Yes; at least until a serious assault is committed.
- 12,749. In such cases, would it not be desirable that someone should take the initiative, so as to prevent the inebriate arriving at that point when he is liable to commit a fatal assault?—No doubt, but who is to do it?
- 12,750. Supposing the neighbours or the police did so, or the doctor along with others?—Anybody should be able to ask the Sheriff to take up an inquiry.
- 12,751. On the information that the man, like a lunatic, was dangerous?—Yes.
- 12,752. We have heard about incipient lunatics who were removed to private houses on a single certificate?—Yes.
- 12,753. These lunatics are only amenable to jurisdiction after six months?—Yes—after six months.
- 12,754. Would you approve of those lunatics being supervised by someone responsible to the Board of Lunacy?—It works very well as it is.
- 12,755. You have no experience that would tell against it?—I have known one or two cases that were not exactly as they might be, but I do not know that they would have been improved by inspection by the Lunacy Board.
- 12,756. You mentioned to Dr. Farquharson that you did not believe in herding a large number of drunkards together. In that connection, have you heard of the asile that is about to be established in Paris to hold 600?—Yes.
- 12,757. For inebriates and lunatics whose insanity is directly traceable to alcohol?—Yes.
- 12,758. I suppose you are willing to admit that the French specialists have hitherto had very sound views on lunacy?—Yes, Dr. Magnan is undoubtedly a very good man.
- 12,759. The Asile Alcoolique is not yet constructed, but things are maturing in that direction?—It is very difficult to arrive at a just conception of the results of putting a lot of these dipsomaniacs to live together.
- 12,760. I suppose the danger of large numbers might be lessened by the adoption of a proper classification, according to temperament and the physical and moral condition of the individual?—The moral classification, I am afraid, would not be easy.
- 12,761. They are all bad?—They are all liars.
- 12,762. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Do you think that, in the case of the individuals of the upper classes, among whom your practice has mainly been, that there would be much difficulty in getting a conviction. Do you think their relatives would readily come forward to start the inquiry?—The force of circumstances would do it. I know many cases at present. Four or five suggest themselves to me, who are simply ruining themselves and their families, making life unbearable, who would be dealt with, were it possible in law. I suppose it happens about once a week that I am asked, 'What are we to do in such a case' and I answer 'Nothing.'
- 12,763. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Would you recommend that medical men should be protected if they gave certificates which might lead to the committal of an inebriate?—A medical man must just take the risks of that work.
- 12,764. Evidence, documentary or oral, before a legal tribunal is privileged, I understand?—A certificate in lunacy is.
- 12,765. But you suggest that the medical man should make his statement merely as evidence?—Yes, and that is privileged.
- 12,766. In terms of sec. 6 of the Dangerous and Criminal Lunacy Act of 1871?—Yes. [The witness then withdrew.]

TWENTY-FOURTH DAY.

DUNDEE, Thursday, December 27th, 1894.

PRESENT :—

SIR CHARLES CAMERON, Bart., M.P. (Chairman.)
Col. A. B. M'HARDY, R.E.
Dr. FARQUHARSON, M.P.

Dr. J. F. SUTHERLAND.
Miss FLORA C. STEVENSON.

MR. DAVID DEWAR, Chief Constable of Dundee, called in and examined.

Chief-Constable Dewar.

27 Dec. 1894.

Chief-Constable Dewar.

27 Dec. 1894.

12,767. (By the Chairman.) You are Chief Constable of Dundee?—Yes.

12,768. How long have you occupied that position?—Eighteen years.

12,769. And what was your police experience prior to that?—I joined the Glasgow police force in 1858—that is 36 years ago. I was there for 18 months as lieutenant. From Glasgow I moved to Lanarkshire as Deputy Chief Constable. I was there for two and a half years. I then went to Greenock, where I was nearly 14 years as Chief Constable.

12,770. Would you please explain to us your system of pledges here? Take the case of 'drunk and incapables'?—Well, we have five lock-ups here, and there is an officer on duty in charge of each. The officer has no absolute order as to the amount of pledge that he is to take from a person who is in custody on a charge of being drunk and incapable. It is left very much to his own discretion. The penalty for being drunk, according to our Police Act is 40s. or one month, and the pledge never exceeds 10s.

12,771. This introduction of the 40s. penalty is of recent date?—1892.

12,772. Prior to that what were your powers?—Prior to that a person drunk and incapable was liable to a fine of 5s. or 24 hours imprisonment under the Public-Houses Act.

12,773. How did you treat them then—a small pledge?—The pledge was as a rule 5s. then.

12,774. When did the higher penalty come into force?—In 1892.

12,775. In what part of the year?—It was in the autumn.

12,776. Could you give us the figures of 1891, when you had the 5s. system, and those of 1893?—I have prepared a return here showing the figures for each year from 1844 down to the present year.

12,776A. Is that of all crimes?—I have special columns for different offences.

12,777. Give us two or three years before 1892—1890 and 1891, if these were not exceptional years.—In 1890 the number taken into custody for being drunk and incapable was 1138; in 1891, 1131; in 1892 (the transition year) 1110; and in 1893, when the penalties had increased, 1615.

12,778. Could you supplement that by giving us the figures of 1864?—The number of persons dealt with for being drunk and incapable in 1864 was 989, but the population has since then increased to the extent of between sixty and seventy thousand.

12,779. These are rather remarkable figures, because they show, that when you had the heavier penalty you had the greater number of arrests, and 1893 was a very good year in point of trade depression?—Well in 1893 we had a large increase for all offences over the previous year, and in my annual report I endeavoured to explain that away by referring to the climatic conditions. It was a very open season, and the labouring classes had much less broken time during that year.

12,780. Therefore, practically, Dundee trade was better?—Well, amongst the labouring classes, from which drunk and incapables are largely recruited; but I do not think that our staple trade—viz., jute manufacturing—was better. I may remark that during the year 1892, there were 5504 arrests and citations for all crimes and offences, while the number for 1893 was 6989. Perhaps you will allow me to read a paragraph from my annual report for 1893 in regard to the difference in numbers in these two years. It is as follows:—'It is somewhat remarkable that such a large increase in the number of offenders should have taken place during the year when the staple industry was in a somewhat languishing condition. As a rule, drunkenness and kindred offences increase when trade is prosperous, and decrease when it is dull. During 1893, the climatic conditions were such as to cause out-door workers to have very little broken time. On this account they would lose less wages than is usual in an ordinary year.' There is another reason which I think may account for it to some extent. Under the Police (Scotland) Act, 1890, which provides for aged and infirm constables being superannuated, a number of officers have been retiring. Their places have been taken by young and active men, and I believe there has been more activity on the part of the police, although there was no special order given in order to bring about any change.

12,781. Can you give us some figures for breach of the peace and petty assaults?—Yes. I can give you these from 1844 down to the present year.

12,782. Give us them for the same years as you did for drunkenness.—Assaults, breach of the peace, and disorderly conduct for 1890 numbered 3291; for 1891, 2803; for 1892, 2388; for 1893, 2896.

12,783. There has been a rise of some 500 on the breaches of peace, and drunk and disorderly cases, and there has been a rise of about the same number in the drunk and incapables?—Yes.

12,784. My point in asking you this is to endeavour to obtain, by any evidence or statistics, whether the increased severity of the power of dealing with drunkenness has diminished the amount of drunkenness or not.—Well, I may explain, that though the magistrates got these increased powers, they did not change their system of dealing with drunk and incapables to any great extent. The penalty was slightly increased, but although the powers were obtained, it was left entirely to the discretion of the magistrates what punishment should be imposed.

12,785. You materially increased the penalty by putting the pledge up to 10s. instead of 5s.?—Yes.

12,786. I presume the magistrates would put on an extra 2s. 6d. or 5s.?—They did increase the penalties slightly.

12,787. But the deterrent effect was not sufficient to counteract any meteorological and superannuation causes?—It had very little effect in that direction. While on this subject I might say that I got a note made out of the sentences imposed during last month upon drunk and incapables. There were in all 75 persons arrested for being drunk and incapable whose cases were brought before the court—47 males and 28 females. Of that number, 22 forfeited pledges of 10s.; six were admonished; 14 fined 5s. or 24 hours; 14 7s. 6d. or five days; nine 10s. 6d. or seven days; five

15s. or ten days; four 20s. or 14 days; and one 40s. or one month.

12,788. Would you please tell us how many were dealt with up to the old maximum, and how many more severely than they could have been dealt with under the Public Houses Act?—Twenty up to the old maximum, keeping out forfeited pledges.

12,789. Thirty-three above the old maximum, and 22 pledges double the old maximum?—That is so; that is for the current year.

12,790. I suppose that is very much the system that was pursued in 1893?—Yes.

12,791. (By Col. McHardy.) It would make that very much more complete if you could put in results of the alternatives?—8 paid their fines before going to prison, 4 after going to prison, and the remaining 35 served their terms of imprisonment.

12,792. (By the Chairman.) Do you think that this return for 1894 would fairly represent the system pursued in 1893?—Oh yes, it does.

12,793. I suppose it may be taken as representing very roughly since the new powers came into operation?—Yes.

12,794. And therefore there has been a material increase of punishment in 55 out of 75 cases, and notwithstanding that—possibly for the reason you have mentioned—the amount of drunkenness has increased?—That is so.

12,795. I show you this return that you have handed in 'The number of persons accused of drunkenness 'breach of the peace, and disorderly conduct since 1844, 'with number apprehended or cited for all crimes or 'offences each year.' I see that 1893 has been higher than in 1883. In 1883 you had 2027 drunks?—Yes. And, in the following years, it was 1573, 1182, 1176, 1202, 1061, 1241, 1133, 1131, 1110, and then 1615. Was there anything exceptional in 1883 that gave it such a rise?—Not that I can point to.

12,796. I notice that the number of persons apprehended and cited in 1877 and 1878, given in your 'annual return from the years 1844 to 1893, both 'inclusive,' is very much higher than at any other time, being 7772 in 1877, and 7674 in 1878, as against 5504 last year, and 6989 this year. What was the explanation of the very great rise in these two years?—Trade was in a fairly prosperous state at that time, but I don't know that there was anything exceptional about it.

12,797. It looks as if trade were remarkably good then, although you have pretty well come up to it in point of arrests for drunkenness since.—There is one fact to which, when looking at this return, I might direct attention. The Forbes-Mackenzie Act came into operation in 1854, and you will observe that there was a remarkable decrease immediately thereafter for a good many years.

12,798. In 1853 the number apprehended was 1625 for being drunk, and in 1854, 1352?—The Forbes-Mackenzie Act came into full operation in 1855 when there were 952 arrests for drunkenness; in 1856, 1130; in 1857, 876; in 1858, 696; and in 1859, 598.

12,799. The number in 1859 is a great fall down from 1856—598 as against 1130. Can you account for that?—I cannot; I had no knowledge of Dundee at that time.

12,800. There does not appear to have been any transfer from the breach of peace and petty assaults to the drunk and disorderly this last year in consequence of your being enabled to inflict a bigger penalty on the drunk and disorderly?—None whatever.

12,801. Take the other class we have to deal with—begging and vagrancy.—Well I have got returns of these also—the census of vagrancy. The returns commenced in 1888.

12,802. Will you give us the results generally? Take the last census, we have all the others.—The census was taken on Sunday last, and there was a remarkable decrease. There were 91 vagrants found—against 153 in June last.

12,803. But there is generally a great decrease in the winter months?—There is generally an increase in the winter months, but that is not the case in Dundee. Chief-Constable Dundee.

12,804. Last year you had 126 in December, against 124 in June?—That is so.

12,805. Now tell us how you would divide these vagrants—how you find them?—There were 12 in prisons or police cells; 27 in houses of refuge, hospitals, and poorhouses; and 52 in common and other lodging houses.

12,806. And of the total you had 74 males, 14 females, and 3 children? That is surely a small percentage of children?—Remarkably small.

12,807. What were the nationalities of the vagrants?—60 were Scotch, 11 Irish, 19 English, and one foreign.

12,808. Then give us the classification by sex and age of the total.—74 were males, 14 females, and three children—total 91.

12,809. So that in Dundee, apparently, the difficulty about children in custody or in care of parents does not crop up? You appear to have very few children in charge of your vagrants?—Very few.

12,810. How do you deal with vagrants?—I have got a return here of the number of cases of begging and vagrancy brought before the Police Court from 1844 down.

12,811. Has it increased of late years?—It has not materially increased of late years.

12,812. In fact it appears to have been very much greater before your time?—It was. In 1844 there were 90.

12,813. In 1875 there appear to have been only three vagrants here?—Only three were apprehended and brought before the magistrates.

12,814. In 1881 you mounted up to 107; and in 1893 you had 57?—Yes.

12,815. What are your powers of dealing with them? Are they under a special Police Act?—Under the General Police Act of 1862.

12,816. Was there any change made in that vagrancy class under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Bill?—None. For begging, first offence, 30 days is the punishment which can be given; for a second offence, 60 days, under the General Police Act.

12,817. Now take prostitution. Has there been much increase in that?—There has been a very considerable increase.

12,818. According to the figures we have before us, whereas there were only 20 apprehensions in 1885, there were 335 last year?—Yes.

12,819. Have you got a return of these?—No.

12,820. Was last year exceptional as against the year before?—It was.

12,821. I have the returns here for 1893—the number is 335; for 1891, 95; and in 1885 you have 20?—Yes.

12,822. How do you account for that enormous increase?—Well, trade has been somewhat depressed, and the police have had instructions to be more vigilant in seeing that the streets are cleared.

12,823. I imagine it depends more upon police than upon trade, because I see the drunks in the two years that have been taken had a very large increase, indexing good trade?—It is mostly to be accounted for by police instructions.

12,824. What are your men's instructions with regard to prostitution? That is to say, what is the offence?—The offence is loitering and importuning passengers.

12,825. Do they arrest for simple loitering, or do they require importuning?—Importuning is not necessary under the Act, but the constables do not arrest here unless there is importuning.

12,826. You never, I suppose, require the evidence of the men importuned?—No; we do not consider that necessary if we have two officers who can speak to the fact of the importuning, although the constables are instructed to obtain the names of the parties importuned where that can be done.

12,827. Have you ever had, during the past year, any man appearing as a witness in such a case?—I do not think we have had a single case in which the party importuned gave evidence

12,828. There is another class that is not embraced in this return, and which we have added to our remit. That is the class of juvenile offenders.—I have got a return with regard to them. Here is a return showing the number sent to the Reformatory and Industrial Schools since 1869.

12,829. Read that for the last ten years:—In 1883, 76; 1884, 74; 1885, 63; 1886, 61; 1887, 81; 1888, 59; 1889, 49; 1890, 49; 1891, 22; 1892, 35; and 1893, 44.

12,830. These returns show a very great disproportion of the sexes, there being a vastly larger number of boys than girls, and in order to illustrate that, would you please read the figures since 1890?—In 1890, 47 males, 2 females; in 1891, 18 males and 4 females; in 1892, 31 males, 4 females; in 1893, 41 males, and 3 females.

12,831. That shows that in Dundee you have had only 13 girls sent to Reformatory and Industrial Schools within the past four years?—That is so.

12,832. There seems to be surely a necessity for dealing with a larger number of girl prisoners?—Well, we have comparatively few girls before our courts.

12,833. Not even for stealing?—Very very few. This return does not include cases dealt with before the sheriff.

12,834. But I mean cases dealt with before the magistrates.—Very very few girls.

12,835. I suppose the majority of the boys would be charged with petty offences?—A few of these boys were found destitute, who had committed no offence, and we sent them to Industrial Schools.

12,836. Do you happen to have any record of the ages of people sent to the prison?—Yes, we keep a note of these.

12,837. But you do not have any figures, have you?—In regard to habitual offenders, I have the age of every one of them.

12,838. It is juvenile delinquents I should like. What I want to know is, considering you have had so few girls—only some three per annum—sent to Reformatory and Industrial Schools, you must have had a certain number of very young females sent to prison?—We have had very few young girls sent to prison. Of course, this return only deals with boys and girls under 16 years of age.

12,839. You appear to be very free of juvenile delinquency?—We are very free.

12,840. Can you account for that; are they exceptionally largely employed in mills?—They are; they go to work in the mills when very young.

12,841. We are told in other towns that girls who sell newspapers, matches, and so on about the streets, are very apt to go wrong, and find themselves fit subjects for reformatory treatment of some sort or another.—That has not been our experience here.

12,842. You have not distinguished between Industrial Schools and Reformatories in this return?—No.

12,843. What Reformatory do you send to?—Rossie, near Montrose, for Protestants.

12,844. Does the town make any grant to Reformatories?—The Town Council does to that Reformatory, and to the 'Mars' also.

12,845. About your mode of procedure—would you please tell whether, in bringing a charge, you prove previous convictions before the prisoner is found guilty, or whether you withhold from the magistrate the knowledge of that fact until after the prisoner has been found guilty?—In every summary complaint, where a party is previously convicted, we require in the complaint to condescend upon the date of the convictions, and, in adducing evidence, we invariably adduce evidence to prove the conviction before the case is closed.

12,846. And I understand you follow that plan in pursuance of some decision recently pronounced in Edinburgh?—There was a decision pronounced on the matter on 3rd November 1891, in the case of Gordon v. Scott in the High Court.

12,847. Have you got a summary of that case here?—No.

12,848. Can you tell us very briefly what it is, and we would like you to put in the case in full. Tell us the effect of it briefly.—Well, this was a case where a publican was charged at Peterhead with an offence under the Public Houses Act, aggravated by the party having been twice previously convicted. It was a third offence, in fact, and the prosecutor proved the applicability of these convictions to accused previous to his case being closed. The agent for the defence objected, and contended that the proceedings were nullified in consequence of his having taken that course. He argued that the information should have been kept back till the justices gave their verdict as to the guilt or innocence of the accused on the main charge.

12,849. That is, it should be kept back under Lord Kingsburgh's Act?—Yes. Well, the Justices gave effect to the contention. The Procurator-Fiscal appealed to the High Court, which held that the justices were wrong, and that in a summary complaint the section of Lord Kingsburgh's Act did not apply.

12,850. Can you refer in the judgment to the precise point there bearing out your contention that in summary cases Lord Kingsburgh's Act does not apply?—It was contended in that appeal, before the High Court, that it was absolutely necessary for the prosecutor to condescend in his complaint upon the date of the previous conviction. Well, the magistrate trying that case is both judge and jury, and he is bound to see that complaint, because he is asked to sign a warrant for either the citation or the apprehension of the party, and he is not going to sign the warrant without knowing what the complaint is. If he reads it, he is bound to know of the previous conviction, and therefore the clause of Lord Kingsburgh's Act could not apply.

12,851. I want to know whether you agree with the Chief Constable of Glasgow that, in a case of assault, or a drunk and disorderly, where the magistrate might or might not be influenced by previous convictions, you would consider it proper to prove the previous convictions?—Yes, undoubtedly. I think the Glasgow Procurator-Fiscal takes a different view, Lord Rutherford Clerk, in the case before alluded to, stated that the question was not arguable. In the Scottish Law Times of 8th July, 1893, Lord Young is said to have dismissed with contempt a fishing poaching appeal, tried a few months previously, where an objection of the same kind was stated. In Edinburgh, I have been informed, they are going on as they did before Lord Kingsburgh's Act was passed. I took the opinion of Lord Advocate Balfour when that Act came into operation, and he advised us to keep back information in regard to convictions, and crown counsel, I understand, adopted the same view, after hearing that the Lord Advocate had expressed that opinion, and that was acted upon for a number of years, until this judgment in this particular case.

12,852. Have you got the Lord Advocate's opinion?—Yes, I have a copy of it at my office.

12,853. Can you give us the Lord Advocate's opinion and the judgment?—I may explain in regard to the report in 3 White, p. 251, that it is a brief report of the decision, and I put myself in communication with the reporter. He had taken no notice of this very important case, and it was after having written him twice that he gave a report, long after, in the official reports. I sent him a copy of the report which appeared in a Peterhead newspaper. It was the fullest I could get of the case, and I have given the report from that Peterhead newspaper in the second edition of the 'Liquor Laws' for Scotland which was issued this year, so that I think that is where the fullest report is to be got of this case. The official report in 3 White is rather meagre.

12,854. You will give us a copy of your report from your book?—Yes; I shall send it to the Chairman.

12,855. Perhaps you could also let us have along with it the Lord Advocate's opinion on the subject?—Yes; I shall do so.

12,856. Now there are some points about your police statistics regarding which I should like some explanation. I find that in Dundee, either the police are a most infallible set of men, or the magistrates appear to place an extraordinary amount of confidence in them. Last year there were 1615 persons arrested for drunkenness, being drunk and incapable, and the whole lot were disposed of by way of conviction, admonition or pledges forfeited; that is to say, not one got off as not guilty.—That is so.

12,857. I find that of the prostitutes—335—every one arrested was disposed of in the same way.—Well, only one was liberated without trial.

12,858. That does not appear in your report?—Well there is 'not tried' in regard to loitering and importuning. There were 11 not tried.

12,859. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Do you mean to say they were let off without being tried?—They were not tried.

12,860. (By the Chairman.) But they would figure among the charges all the same?—Yea.

12,861. But they don't, and I want to test the accuracy of the returns you see, there is your return.—They do figure among the charges, chiefly under the heading 'Forfeited pledges.'

12,862. Am I to understand that these 11 are included in the forfeited pledges in the return you have handed in?—8 of them are. The 11 are made up in this way. There is one against whom no proceedings were taken; eight forfeited pledges; one was otherwise disposed of; and one was not disposed of at the end of the year.

12,863. The forfeited pledges are included?—Yea.

12,864. What does 'otherwise disposed of' mean?—'No proceedings' would be a party liberated by the lieutenant without being brought before the Court; 'otherwise disposed of' would be a party perhaps brought to the bar, and I, as Procurator-Fiscal, then departed from the charge for some reason.

12,865. In cases of illness or something of that sort?—Yea.

12,866. Does 'otherwise disposed of' in your case ever mean sent to some refuge as an alternative?—Yea, it does in some cases; although we send to refuges very frequently by the magistrate admonishing the party on volunteering to go to a refuge.

12,867. You have been in the Glasgow police force—that is a considerable time ago—and the arrests in Glasgow are enormously greater in proportion to the population than here. In Glasgow, there are arrested every year for breach of the peace, petty assault, drunk and disorderly, and drunk and incapable, 60 for every 1000 of the inhabitants. In Dundee there are only 28 per 1000. The larger the city the more you have.

12,868. Not per 1000?—London, for instance has only 8 per 1000.—The system is quite different.

12,869. Take it for instance in your own case—Dundee has 28 and Edinburgh 24.—It is a different class of population we have.

12,870. You have got Paisley 21, and Greenock 23. That shows that the size is not the entire thing; but can you, from your experience, explain it?—No; I cannot account for it.

12,871. I repeat the question—May I rely upon these statistics which you handed in of 1893 as quite correct?—Undoubtedly.

12,872. Is there any other point you wish to bring before us?—Yes; there is one point in regard to a question which very often crops up. There were 171 persons brought before our Police Court in the month of November last, charged with the crimes of assault, breach of the peace, and disorderly conduct. Well, I caused very careful inquiries to be made in order to ascertain the number of those persons who were under the influence of liquor when apprehended, and the number who were sober, and I find that 87 per cent. were the worse of liquor, and 13 per cent. sober.

12,873. Did you make any similar inquiries with regard to petty thefts?—No, I did not, but I made similar inquiries with regard to begging and loitering; and I find about half were sober and half under the influence of liquor of those apprehended in the same month.

12,874. Could you do the same thing in regard to petty thefts for the month?—Yes; I could without difficulty.

12,875. (By Colonel M'Hardy.) Give us the number of those under liquor in your total apprehensions?—I fear I have not that information.

12,876. Most Chief Constables have that?—We don't take special note of that. We do it in such cases as those of disorderly conduct and breach of the peace, as it is made part of the charge, but in thefts and many other cases we don't take note of it.

12,877. (By the Chairman.) And you could not without difficulty get the information?—Not without very considerable difficulty. At our lock-ups we keep a note of the state of the persons brought to the police office, but do not tabulate the information unless it is required for the aid of justice.

12,878. Have you any other point?—Yes; I made out a special return, which I sent to the secretary, bearing upon table C of the return required by the Committee. It is an analysis showing the various crimes for which habitual offenders have been convicted. This 'abstract of' particulars re habitual offenders' shows the various crimes for which they have been arrested during 1893, and also gives a note of their total appearances before our Courts.

12,879. You seem to have very few men as compared with women?—Only three men in No. 1 return, and in the return which I call No. 3, I give particulars in regard to eight men who were convicted more than four times during the course of the year. Some of the convictions treated of in the latter return took place before the Police Court, and some of them before the Sheriff Court summarily.

12,880. But that makes only 11 men altogether as against 79 females?—That is so.

12,881. Do you think it would make much difference to you if any means could be devised to clear your hands of these 11 men?—It would certainly be a considerable improvement.

12,882. And the women even more?—Very much more.

12,883. Have you anything else?—I have a return here which I submitted to the departmental committee on inebriates, showing the number of persons in Dundee who had more than 20 convictions recorded against them. The figures are given from 1876 down to 1893.

12,884. In connection with the habitual offender or habitual drunkard, what number of convictions would you fix upon?—Well, I think three convictions during the course of the year should be sufficient, and I find that has sanction of legislation in a way already, and it has been brought before that departmental committee above referred to. It was also suggested to a similar committee in Canada in 1891, and it is in operation in Australia, where 12 months' imprisonment can be given to the habitual offender.

12,885. Have you at Dundee many men who regularly get drunk every big pay?—I am of opinion that many get drunk without falling into the hands of the police, so that if there are three convictions against a man appearing before the Police Court, you may take it that he has been often drunk without falling into the hands of the police.

12,886. Would you take it that for twice he escaped the police he would get once into their hands?—Oh, more than that. I may explain that the Greenock Police Act authorises habitual drunkards to be sentenced to 60 days' imprisonment if they have been six times previously convicted. I had something to do in getting these powers for Greenock. In the Bill, as originally drafted, we asked for 6 or 12 months' imprisonment, but we got power only to impose a fine of 40s., or send 60 days to prison persons convicted of drunkenness, aggravated by previous convictions, irrespective of time.

12,887. You say 'we got it'?—I was then Chief Constable of Greenock. The Bill was got shortly after I came to Dundee, but I assisted the authorities in Greenock to obtain these powers.

12,888. Do you know if these powers have ever been made use of?—I have no definite information on the subject.

27 Dec. 1894.

12,889. When you were Chief Constable of Greenock did you know anything about Paisley?—No. The Burgh Police Act also recognises three convictions in twelve months.

12,890. But it limits the amount of extra punishment to 14 days?—It does.

12,891. Might I ask how you deal with shebeeners? Do you deal with them under a Local Act?—No; under the Public Houses Act.

12,892. Do you issue warrants for their being searched, or how do you do?—We issue warrants for their being searched if we want to seize liquor, but we require no warrant to enter a shebeen with the view of making a detection.

12,893. Do you not require sworn information that there is reasonable grounds for believing that the place is a shebeen?—We do not require sworn information, but the officer or constable making the entry must know the place to be kept by repute as a shebeen.

12,894. Can he enter lockfast places? Can he break open a door for instance?—No; not without a warrant.

12,895. Do you give many warrants here? The Chief Constable of Greenock says that he signs 150 warrants a week, that they remain in force only about a week, and that his men go about with these?—The warrant runs for a week, but I don't find it necessary to issue many of these warrants, although I do occasionally. Shebeening is down to a very low ebb here.

12,896. It does not flourish as much here as in Greenock?—It does not.

12,897. Was it as bad in Greenock in your day as it seems to be now?—It was; shebeening was most difficult to suppress.

12,898. In your day, in Greenock, had you any reason to believe that the shebeeners paid blackmail to any of your constables?—Not the slightest; I never had the slightest suspicion or reason to believe that.

12,899. Do you think it unlikely, because a Greenock shebeener with whom I had an interview yesterday in prison said, that if he were entrusted with that department, he could show them how to put down the shebeens, but the fact was that they were carried on with impunity by men who paid?—I don't believe one word of it.

12,900. You don't think there are nearly so many in Dundee?—Not nearly.

12,901. Can you give us any reason for that?—Well, there is a very much larger male population, and a great number of iron-workers and Irishmen, and men from the Highlands, and the males are more given to drink there than they are here.

12,902. Is there anything else?—I made out a list of the nature of convictions in four sample cases of habitual offenders who have not been more than four times convicted during the course of the year.

12,903. Are there many of those?—We have in Dundee about 200 persons who have been over 20 times convicted of various crimes and offences.

12,904. So, besides having a number of convictions for a single year in your definition, you would have another number spread over a larger number of years?—I think it would be desirable; otherwise we would not be able to secure a number of the habitual offenders.

12,905. A suggestion has been made to us that it would be necessary to safeguard those men by bringing them before the sheriff, and asking him to pronounce them habitual offenders?—Yes.

12,906. It would not do to try them in the Police Court?—Either before the sheriff or the Police Court. I think it would be desirable to have a fixed period for which the magistrate or judge would require to send the parties away, because if it is left to the discretion of the magistrate—especially a citizen magistrate—the thing would not be done.

12,907. No; but do you think if you were proposing a long period of confinement in an adult reformatory of some sort, would you entrust a citizen magistrate with the power to order such confinement?—I would, but the party to be dealt with would come within the definition of an habitual drunkard who had been convicted a certain number of times, or over 20 times, of various offences within a given period.

12,908. There is no precedent for giving a magistrate the power to commit an adult to confinement for a lengthened period?—Our citizen magistrates can give sentences, under the Prevention of Crimes Act, for 12 months.

12,909. And they can send young people to a reformatory for five years?—Yes. There is a report of a committee which sat in Canada in 1891, in which there is much valuable information bearing on this matter. I have marked the parts in the report, which I hand to the secretary.

12,910. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Take the case of the four habitual offenders you mentioned—how many convictions had they?—The first one is a female aged 33 years, with 66 appearances, and only 2 in 1893.

12,911. Leaving out of account breaches of peace and disorderly offences, has she got any serious crime charged against her?—Thefts.

12,912. Are they petty thefts?—Yes. She had four or five of her heaviest sentences for theft—60 days.

12,913. Then the next one?—The next is a man with 50 appearances—three in 1893.

12,914. Are there any serious offences charged against him?—None.

12,915. Take the next case—This is a female, 75 appearances—four in 1893.

12,916. Are there any of these convictions for serious crime?—There are six charges of theft, and the highest sentence is 50 days. She is also convicted of brothel keeping.

12,917. Then the next one?—This also is a female—31 years of age, 100 appearances, 3 times in 1893; two charges of theft—14 and 7 days respectively.

12,918. The thefts must have been trifling ones?—Yes.

12,919. So that you can have persons with a very long series of charges of disorderly conduct and drunkenness without any crime allied to dishonesty?—That is so.

12,920. Do the persons you have referred to not produce around them very serious disorder, and attract drunkards about them?—They do; no doubt of it.

12,921. And if we were to remove them, it would not only stop their personal drinking, but it would probably reduce the drinking of their locus and neighbours?—It would undoubtedly.

12,922. The numbers in 1893, as shown in the tables, are excessively high in comparison with former years?—They are.

12,923. Is it not a fact that they are still continuing to be very high during the year that is just closing?—Speaking roughly, I expect we shall have 500 fewer arrests than last year. The figures are not made up, but there is a considerable decrease.

12,924. It is within my knowledge that there has been a very great increase in the movement of prisoners from Dundee to Perth, even greater than last year, so that that must arise from the magistrates of your Courts giving longer sentences, or more of them?—Well, I am speaking of the total number of persons apprehended or cited for all sorts of offences. Of course we may be up in the number of petty breaches of bye-laws, that is to say, contraventions.

12,925. But they would hardly go to prison?—Well, hardly.

12,926. (By the Chairman.) When will you have your figures for this year?—In the course of a month or so.

12,927. Will you send the secretary of the Commission an early proof?—I shall do so.

12,928. (By Col. M'Hardy.) A good many of those who are sentenced and sent to prison are for very short periods?—A great many of them.

12,929. Without the alternative of a fine?—As illustrated by the return I have given in.

12,930. Are there not a good many fines paid after the prisoners are received into prison?—There are a good many.

12,931. Do you give these prisoners sufficient time for their friends to find money to pay their fines?—Well, if they have money, or if their friends have money, they have really sufficient time. They are not sent to prison as a rule before an hour and a half or so after the Police Court is over. That is our usual practice, and I think an hour and a half would be sufficient time for a messenger to get the money.

12,932. Are there messengers at their disposal?—Their friends are very frequently inquiring for them, and if not, we send messages for them.

12,933. It is very undesirable to have more people in prison than you can help?—Undoubtedly.

12,934. I wanted to know if you made it a matter of arrangement to see that every man who had any likelihood of getting his fine paid did get the opportunity of finding the money?—They have got every facility for sending messages.

12,935. Do you ever give a man time to pay a fine?—Oh yes.

12,936. How often is that done? You said there were 6989 convictions, I think, last year—these were people sentenced was it?—That is the number of persons who were apprehended and charged before the Police Courts.

12,937. Can you say how many of them were found guilty?—4953 were convicted before Summary Courts.

12,938. Can you say how many of these who were sentenced to a fine got time to pay?—In every instance they get sufficient time to pay.

12,939. But does a magistrate ever give a man a week, or ten days, or a month, to pay his fine?—No, that has not been done by the police magistrates in a single instance.

12,940. Have those sentenced ever asked for that, or are they aware of the existence of the law?—They have not asked, and I do not think that the parties brought before the Court, as a rule, know that such a law exists. There may be a few of them that know of it, but very few.

12,941. Is it desirable that it should be utilised where the offender is a known resident of your city? Is there any reason why he should not get time to go to work, and raise his fine, rather than be locked up in prison?—There is no special reason.

12,942. Would it not be a great restraint upon a man during the time until his fine was paid?—There is no doubt it would tend in that direction.

12,943. Then is the First Offenders Act in full force here?—It is; but the powers of that Act are very seldom put in operation in our Police Courts.

12,944. Why?—Well, previous to that Act coming into operation, the magistrates in our Police Courts were in the habit in very many cases of admonishing first offenders, and imposing no punishment upon them at all, and they have continued to do that in many cases. In some cases they have exercised the powers conferred upon them by the First Offenders Act, but in very few.

12,945. The number of vagrants you had in the town, according to the last printed return, is 125?—Yes.

12,946. The number seems to vary very little in summer or winter, are they resident in the way of sleeping always somewhere in the city, or are they different people, like the bubble on the stream every day?—They are different people for the most part.

12,947. And there is just a depot of about 125 people on the march?—That is so, if you strike an average.

12,948. Are they different people every night?—Not necessarily so, because in the Night Asylum they are allowed two or three nights if they profess to be on the outlook for work, but not more than three nights in succession.

12,949. Are there a certain number of people who go out from Dundee every morning into the country to beg, and come back with the produce of their begging?—I believe there are. They beg in the surrounding towns, such as Broughty Ferry, and in the outskirts of Dundee.

12,950. Broughty Ferry would be under the Burgh Police Act?—Yes, it is.

12,951. Therefore they could not beg there?—Oh yes, and in Dundee too. There is a good deal of begging in the outskirts of Dundee where the police are somewhat more sparse, and have long beats.

12,952. From what you and your men know of these people are they actually in search of work, or are they mostly professional beggars?—For the most part they are professional beggars.

12,953. The Chairman asked you about the number of apprehensions in Dundee being very low in comparison with what it is in Glasgow; now the character of the two cities is very much the same?—It is.

12,954. Your population here is a somewhat unruly population, broadly speaking, is it not?—Yes, it is, no doubt.

12,955. In proportion, the number of the lower orders of the labouring classes are equal, in fact, I think greater than in Glasgow.—Well, the female population greatly preponderates here.

12,956. You have a large class of quay labourers, those men who wait for ships discharging and loading, and that sort of work?—Yes.

12,957. Well, the difference proportionately in the number of your apprehensions is very startling. You have been in Glasgow—I suppose you go to it from time to time, and of course you know your own city—do you see any appreciable difference between the two?—Well, of course, in Glasgow the thoroughfares are very much more crowded than in Dundee.

12,958. Is that so?—No doubt of it.

12,959. But is there not part of Dundee very crowded, even as much as any part you could find in Glasgow?—Especially on a Saturday night it is, but during other nights of the week it is not so busy as Glasgow.

12,960. And you think it is simply due to the increased numbers of the people?—There is another factor in the matter. In Glasgow they have a constable to every 522 or so of the population, and we have just one to about every 877 of the population.

12,961. How does that make a difference?—It makes a difference in this way, that a great number of persons who commit offences are not taken into custody who would be taken if there were a larger proportion of police.

12,962. Oh, no doubt 'would be,' but would you say 'ought to be'?—No doubt they commit offences.

12,963. Statutory offences?—Yes, statutory offences, and therefore they render themselves liable to apprehension.

12,964. But what advantage in your mind would accrue to the city of Dundee in doubling the number of your police, and I suppose, as you say, the number of your prisoners?—I think no great advantage would arise. Certainly there would be less disorder on the streets and fewer scenes.

12,965. Would there be more apprehensions?—Yes.

12,966. How could you say there would be less disorder, because if you had not disorder you could not have the apprehensions?—Well, the disorderly parties would be taken into custody.

12,967. But would it not be that you would have a larger proportion of the population becoming acquainted with the police, and circulating through prisons and Police Courts?—No doubt of it.

12,968. Do you think it is a good thing or a bad thing for them?—Well, I don't think that our present system of punishment for these offenders has a good effect.

12,969. Your suggestions and views, I think, lie in the way of lengthening the sentences in order to reform these people?—Well, I have been reading up a good deal on this subject, and I am very much inclined to think that a system of reform colonies would be the most appropriate method for dealing with these petty habitual offenders.

12,970. Yes; but have you departed from your own faith?—I have.

12,971. That is the most important statement we have got to-day?—I have to that extent. I have derived a lot of information from this book, The Prison and Reformatory System of Ontario, and also

Chief-
Constable
Dewar.

27 Dec. 1894.

from the Consular Reports obtained by the United States in reference to farm colonies, especially in Germany and Switzerland. I think there are no fewer than 26 of these colonies in operation in Germany, and there are places on somewhat similar lines in the United States.

12,972. You say you have considered this matter very thoroughly; I want to know why it is you have gone away from the simple augmentation of sentences?—Well, the parties to be dealt with require to be usefully employed while they are under detention, in order, among other things, to enable them, when they get their liberty, to be in a position to earn their own livelihood. I do not think prison is the place where suitable employment could well be provided for such a class.

12,973. And they would not be, when confined there, trained to ordinary kinds of life in the outside?—Well, there is far more to be got in farm work, market gardening and such like in the summer. In winter, they would require to be put to industries indoors, or in sheds.

12,974. (By Miss Stevenson.) In the figures you gave to the chairman as to the number of persons brought up during last month, I think you said there were 25 that forfeited their pledges; were any of these women?—Three.

12,975. Do you find that they, as a rule, are able to leave a sufficient amount as a pledge?—As a rule they are not.

12,976. Do you take a pledge in cases that are brought in for solicitation and loitering?—We do.

12,977. As well as for the drunk and disorderlies?—We do.

12,978. What is the longest time that anyone is kept at a police station before her case comes before the Police Court?—The longest is about 48 hours.

12,979. That would be if she was brought in on a Saturday morning?—Keeping in view Saturday night, they are, of course, kept in from Saturday forenoon till Monday morning. On other days they are not kept more than 30 hours. We had, for instance, a woman brought before the Court yesterday, who was apprehended at four o'clock the previous morning. We endeavoured to get her before the magistrate on the morning she was brought in, when the Court began at half past nine, but she was not sufficiently recovered from the liquor she had, and we had to keep her till next morning.

12,980. At your police stations have you female turnkeys or police matrons?—We have a matron on duty night and day.

12,981. Who can attend to and look after these women?—Yes; and we have got an addition made to our police office, which has only been in use since yesterday, where the females are to be kept in 12 cells specially set apart for them, and with a matron's room.

12,982. In reference to juvenile delinquents, you have stated that the girls are very small in number in proportion to the boys; is the reason of that that you have the Mars Training Ship here? Do you think that the facility for sending a boy to the Training Ship has anything to do with it?—No; very little; we find that the boys get into mischief.

12,983. Have you a Girls' Industrial School in Dundee?—We have, and it occupies a very central position in the city. A new school also is being erected in the outskirt.

12,984. How is the population provided for that school if you have so few?—They are all sent under the Industrial Schools Act.

12,985. Have you many School Board cases?—Not many, but we have a good many sent by the sheriff; there is an agent appointed for the Industrial Schools in Dundee.

12,986. Do you get them from other parts of the country?—Yes; from the surrounding districts.

12,987. Under what section of the Act are they sent?—The fourteenth as a rule. If accused of a petty crime, they are sent under the fifteenth section, under 12 years of age.

12,988. Do you find any difference from two years ago when the order came from the Crown Office that the two sections were to be kept very distinctly apart?—We were very careful in sending children to condescend upon the section, and to see that they came within the scope of the section before being sent by the magistrate. We find that the Industrial Schools will not take children under the fifteenth section.

12,989. Because of the smaller allowance?—Yes.

12,990. Many of the warrants sent to the Home Office under section 14 were returned, as the children were not without proper guardianship, being at the time in custody of a parent: have you found that difficulty here?—If it does exist it has not come under our notice in our Court.

12,991. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Your idea of an habitual is three convictions during 12 months, and six convictions irrespective of time?—Well, there is considerable warrant for that I find, in what I mentioned before—existing legislation, and the opinion of the Commissioners in Canada, who appear to have come to the conclusion that three times in one year were sufficient.

12,992. Do you think public opinion in this country would support anything of that kind after what took place just two years ago in the discussion on the Scottish Burgh Police Act?—I would be inclined to think that public opinion would, because public opinion seems to be alive to the fact that it is absolutely necessary to have some better method of dealing with habitual drunkards than we have at present, and, as I mentioned before, although an habitual drunkard only happens to be convicted three times during a year, the very fact of his having been convicted these three times indicates very clearly that the person must have been intoxicated very frequently during the year.

12,993. That, after all, is presumption, and not fact; it may be true, but it has not been proved. Don't you think that it would appear oppressive to dub any person an habitual offender who had, say, six convictions during a period of three years, more especially when you propose to remove them from society, and deprive them of their liberty for a considerable period?—Well, I think it would be a mistake to condescend upon a time rather than upon convictions. As I mentioned before, we have in Dundee about 200 persons who have been upwards of 20 times convicted. Quite a number of these have not perhaps been six times convicted of drunkenness during the last two years.

12,994. That suggests reformation and fairly good conduct?—Not necessarily; they may have been convicted of other offences.

12,995. Such as?—Well, there is loitering, importing, petty thefts, malicious mischief, committing nuisances and quite a number of other offences.

12,996. Do you make any hard and fast line of distinction between prostitution and drunkenness among women?—Certainly; we are bound to do it.

12,997. Do you not find in Dundee, as in Glasgow, that the two are very closely allied?—Not necessarily. I have looked into the statistics of November last, and I find that half of the women arrested for importuning were sober.

12,998. But you give a return of 79 women who have been over 4 times convicted, 75 per cent. of whom had almost an equal number of convictions for drunkenness and for prostitution; does not that go to show the intimate connection between the two, that is to say, that prostitution may be the result of drunkenness, or drunkenness the result of prostitution?—They go, no doubt, hand in hand.

12,999. In the consideration of any case of habitual drunkenness, would you consider that any other circumstance than the mere fact of being three times in the hands of the police should come into play?—Undoubtedly.

13,000. That is to say, if you found that a working man had been three times in the hands of the police, and convicted during the year, and yet it could be shown to a demonstration that that man maintained a home and kept his family in comfort, you would net dream of removing that man from society and making him a certified drunkard?—Not if he was not convicted before that year, but if there was a string of previous convictions before that, it would be high time that he was dealt with.

13,001. But suppose his convictions were numerous before that, and that during the last year he had only three convictions, would that not indicate an encouraging improvement in his habits?—No; it might probably indicate that he had escaped the police.

13,002. I see from your return that 551 persons would come under your definition of habitual offender, that is to say, they have been three times in your hands in the year: now, how many of these would be working-men, or fairly respectable people who occasionally go astray?—A very small proportion.

13,003. But still there are some?—There are some.

13,004. I find from your return that you have apprehended 6956 persons?—There have been that number of apprehensions or citations.

13,005. Of these only 895, or 12 per cent., came back to you again during the year?—Yes, and some of them as often as 17 times.

13,006. Only 12 per cent. came back; does not that go to prove that the police have sufficient powers now to deal with those of the population who are turbulent and noisy, and who occasionally get drunk?—We don't want any more powers so far as the apprehension is concerned, but I contend that they ought to be dealt with in a different way, reformatory treatment ought to be meted out to them.

13,007. But if you find that of your 6956, so many as 6100 never come back to you in the course of the year, does not that go a long way to show that a few hours in the police office, or a pledge, or a short period of imprisonment is enough for these?—Yes; for those that don't come back.

13,008. And now for the few, do you think the police magistrate has the time to conduct such an inquiry as would be necessary before a person is removed for a long time from society for the purpose of reformation?—Well, I do not think the police magistrates in Dundee would grudge the time for that purpose, and I think they would discharge the duties satisfactorily.

13,009. Seeing they are subject to public opinion, don't you think they might prefer that such powers were not placed in their hands?—I would not leave it to the option of the magistrates.

13,010. You would fix a time?—I would. If it is left to citizen magistrates it will not be done, neither will it be done by certain stipendiary magistrates unless it were made imperative.

13,011. Do you think a stipendiary magistrate would be a qualified or suitable person to conduct the inquiry?—Yes.

13,012. Compared with other cities Dundee makes a poor show in the matter of fines?—We have a poor population.

13,013. What is the amount of pledge money?—The amount of fines received was £784, 2s. 6d., and the amount of forfeited pledges £502, 11s., being a total of £1286, 13s. 6d.

13,014. Have you any suggestion to make in regard to drunkards who do not come into the hands of the police, but who are notoriously addicted to drunken habits, and who only find their way into the hands of the police after they have committed a dangerous assault or some serious offence?—There are a great number of drunkards who don't get into the hands of the police, who ought to be dealt with in Retreats the same as there are in England.

13,015. Who should initiate proceedings in these cases?—I would allow the same parties who can take the initiative in lunacy cases—the Procurator-Fiscal, the Inspector of Poor, or the relatives.

13,016. And the drunkard might have a public or a private inquiry, just as he wished?—I would treat them on the very same lines as lunatics.

13,017. Do you find that petty thefts, as a rule, are committed by young people or elderly people in a state of intoxication?—A great many petty thefts are committed by people who are not intoxicated at all.

13,018. They are pilferers?—Yes. We have also oldish women who go about stripping articles from greens and such like.

13,019. Do you connect petty theft with drink at all?—Oh yes.

13,020. In what respect?—The desire for means to procure drink.

13,021. Do you birch boys?—We have not done so for years.

13,022. What do you do with them?—There are some boys sent to prison, others are admonished, and others are sent to Reformatory Schools.

13,023. Do you believe that a boy of tender years, who has done some malicious act, should be sent to prison?—No; I am not in favour of boys being sent to prison for first offences, and they never are sent here.

13,024. But for second offences, if birching would succeed, why not give them it?—Our magistrates never order it.

13,025. What is your own opinion?—I am not in favour of whipping boys publicly; I would leave that with the parents. I would be more inclined to whip a man who beats his wife.

13,026. You are not a disciple of Solomon's with regard to the rod?—I do not want the rod spared, but I want it administered by the proper parties.

13,027. If a magistrate ordered a boy to be whipped in his presence by the parent, would you approve of that?—I do not think a magistrate would do that. A magistrate has no power to order a parent to do that.

13,028. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Is it in consequence of general instructions that you give your policemen here that evidence of importuning as well as loitering is required before the apprehension of prostitutes?—It is.

13,029. But you say that, according to the law, loitering of itself is denounced?—Yes, loitering or importuning passengers to the annoyance of residents or passengers.

13,030. It is purely a female offence?—Yes.

13,031. It is not an offence for a male to loiter?—Not under the Local Police Act, but it is under the Burgh Police Act.

13,032. (By the Chairman.) You say that it is 'loitering to the annoyance of the residents and passengers'?—Yes.

13,033-34. Is that the phraseology of all the other Scottish Acts?—I don't think it is in the Burgh Police Act. [Dr. Farquharson. There is a phrase 'loitering for immoral purposes'.]

13,035. It is an important addition?—Unfortunately I have not got the words here, but I have the number of the clause.

13,036. How do you prove annoyance to the passengers?—By the constables seeing them.

13,037. But that depends upon the passengers, and not the constables, if you have to prove annoyance to the passengers?—We have a clause in our own Act which makes it an offence to loiter and importune.

13,038. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Your constables then have to speak to the fact of importuning; how do they find it out? Have they got to find out the words used?—Well, there are various ways of importuning. The actual words do not require to be given in evidence; our magistrates do not hold that. But there are several persons accosted as a rule, according to the evidence.

13,039. But you have not the evidence of the men who were importuned, only the evidence of the constables who cannot have heard the words used; what is the actual evidence?—The actual evidence is that a female is seen loitering about on a certain street or streets, and that in the course of half-an-hour or so, during which the officers have been watching her movements, she has gone up to two, three, or four different men, accosting them.

13,040. Has a previous conviction to be known against her, or does her character require to be known to the police?—It requires to be known to the police. Our magistrates invariably admonish a person convicted of that offence for the first time.

13,041. Suppose a strange woman came into Dundee

Chief
Constable

and addressed a man at the corner of the street, would that be held as accosting?—Oh no; we would have to prove that the person is a prostitute.

13,042. You must prove that?—Yes.

13,043. (By the Chairman.) Is there anything else you would like to bring before us?—Yes; there is a paragraph from the late Sheriff Barclay's book in reference to breach of peace, which, I think, might be of interest. It is from Barclay's Digest of the Law of Scotland, 4th edition, under heading 'Breach of the Peace,' second paragraph. It is as follows:—'Previous convictions of breach of the peace may be charged to aggravate the offence and increase the punishment. But a charge of assault cannot be aggravated by a conviction of breach of the peace, or the reverse. A woman was charged with breach of the peace, aggravated by 21 previous convictions, in the Police Court of Dundee, and received sentence of 18 months' imprisonment.—Perth Autumn Circuit, 1850, Margaret Grant or Broun (not reported). There was at the date of publication of the third edition of this work a woman in Perth County Prison for the one hundred and fortieth time, on police convictions for breach of the peace, punished, or rather rewarded, by sentences of short imprisonment. The same woman, after adding several more convictions, at length, in a fit of intoxication, drowned herself in the Tay. She had spent about 12 years in prison, where she worked at remunerative needlework, at which she was most skilful and tasteful. An institution where such persons could be detained would be merciful to themselves, and liberate the public from much annoyance and great expense. [The witness then withdrew.]

Mr. William
Doig, and
Mr. James
Campbell.

MR. WILLIAM DOIG, Bailie of Dundee, and MR. JAMES CAMPBELL, agent of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, Dundee, called in and examined by the Chairman:—

Mr. William
Doig, and
Mr. James
Campbell.

13,044. I understand that you, Bailie Doig, are connected with the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children?—I am.

13,045. Do many cases occur in connection with the Society here?—(Mr. Campbell.) We have an average of 20 cases in the month—about 240 in the year.

13,046. How are they as between boys and girls?—The majority of them are girls. Of the 240 about 140 would be girls.

13,047. We were told a minute ago by the Chief Constable here that there had only been 13 girls committed to Reformatories or Industrial Schools within the last four years, that is about an average of three each year?—We have a good many more children than that. We sent about 80 children to different institutions last year.

13,048. Including Industrial Schools?—These are all sent to institutions of detention, that is Industrial Schools.

13,049. But how do you reconcile that with the Chief Constable's statement?—(Mr. Campbell.) These would not pass through the Police Court.—(Bailie Doig.) They pass through the Sheriff Court, that is the explanation of it.

13,050. I show you the Chief Constable's last annual return, can you show me these cases here?—(Mr. Campbell.) Under the heading No 17 'Convention of Prevention of Cruelty to and Protection of Children Act,' there were 31 persons apprehended or cited within the year and committed.—(Bailie Doig.) I may explain that the operations of the society are wrought very largely through the Sheriff Court. Our Procurator-Fiscal has very kindly backed up our society in the prosecution of our cases, and a proportion of the number don't come directly under the control of the police.

13,051. It appears from this that there were 31 cases of offence against the Cruelty to Children Act made known to the Police Authorities in the year, and there were 31 convictions obtained.—(Bailie Doig.) That is perfectly correct, but the greater number of our convictions have been got in the Sheriff Court from the fact that many of the cases have not been brought under the police notice at all. Information is lodged with our agent that a case of cruelty has taken place, and he communicates directly with the Procurator-Fiscal of our Sheriff Court, and the sheriff has convicted the greater number of the parents.

13,052. Do you think there is any extension necessary of the powers for the protection of children, or the reduction of the crop of young criminals and vagrants that naturally arises from families in which you have parents guilty of offences against the Cruelty to Children Act?—(Bailie Doig.) The fact is, one has a very strong feeling that it will become almost necessary that something should be done to take these poor children altogether away from their parents. In many cases there is no parental control or supervision, and there is a great amount of ill usage.

13,053. What are the operations of the Society in Dundee?—They are in the first place to receive information from the police or from outsiders as to parents ill-using their children. These are then followed up by our officer, and reported to the Procurator-Fiscal of the Sheriff Court generally, and if he thinks there is a case that ought to be prosecuted, then a prosecution is carried through, and the prosecutions have been very successful in obtaining convictions. There are other cases where, after careful investigation, the society thinks that perhaps a warning and supervision on the part of the officers may be quite sufficient to answer the purpose, and in that way I think the society has been immensely helpful. It has been helpful in the cases that have been brought under our notice, as well as in deterring acts of cruelty to children.

13,054. You speak of 240, are these of supervision and prosecution?—That includes the whole number of children. I may say that we have a Shelter in connection with our society, and that brings a good many cases under the notice of our officer. Often children themselves, knowing that their case will be inquired into, come to the Shelter. That is the first stage often of our investigation. If we have reason to think that the child is being unkindly dealt with it is taken into the Shelter, and our officer and a constable goes and makes inquiry. Our Shelter is in Constitution Road.

13,055. How many children can it accommodate?—Fourteen or fifteen. It is both for boys and girls, and it is so divided that we can control that number of boys and girls.

13,056. In the case of a prostitute, for instance, are her children made over to your control?—Yes; and that increases the number that Mr. Campbell is able to send off to institutions. The sheriff has properly said that such a person is not a proper guardian for the child. We have sent a number to Quarrier's Homes for instance, and also Catholic children to Catholic institutions. In all cases, when we have shown the parent not to be a proper guardian, the sheriff has granted the guardianship to these institutions.

13,057. You don't take the guardianship yourselves?—No.

13,058. In the case of children sent to Industrial Schools the government pays, but is the parent practically thereby relieved of the charge of maintaining his children?—No; wherever we find there is any possibility of getting assistance for payment of the children, we follow it up, and the agent of the Industrial Schools also reports to the Government agent here.

13,059. Is it successful do you know?—Mr. Campbell. On an average, I think the parents will pay about 10s. a year. I was looking up one of our returns lately, and I saw that was about the amount.

13,060. That is practically getting the children off their hands without any expense to them?—Mr. Campbell. That is so.—Bailie Doig. There are cases, of course, where the father may be well-doing and the mother intemperate, and where the father is anxious to have his child sent away, and makes proper payment for it.

Mr. William Doig, and Mr. James Campbell.

27 Dec. 1894.

13,061. But the profligate practically gets off?—Bailie Doig. That is quite correct. On the other hand, if you can save the child from a life of sin and crime, it is a saving to the city in another direction. It is the least of two evils.

13,062. But do you see any way by which the parent could be better got at?—That is a problem I have studied hard, and it is exceedingly difficult to know how to get at these parents to punish them directly, except by imprisonment.

13,063. Is it an alimentary debt?—I do not know how the law would apply in that direction.

13,064. I suppose you know that for an alimentary debt limited imprisonment can be obtained?—I do not think we ever had any case where our agent has prosecuted for that.

13,065. How long has your society been in existence?—Since 1891.

13,066. You send the greater proportion of your children to free institutions like Mr. Quarrier's?—Well, a large number are sent to Industrial Schools, and likewise to Catholic institutions in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Aberdeen.

13,067. Does Dundee make any contributions to the Industrial Schools to which you send these children?—No; except perhaps to Rossie Reformatory.

13,068. How much?—I think they supplement the funds by £20 yearly.

13,069. Do you subscribe to the Mars?—Yes, we give £20.

13,069a. But, as a Town Council, you don't subscribe to Industrial Schools apart from the Mars?—No, I don't think so.

13,070. You say you have more girls than boys through your hands?—I think so; there is more ill-usage towards girls than to boys.

13,071. The boys, I suppose, are more venturesome, and they run off?—There may be a great deal in that, but a girl will suffer more than a boy will.

13,072. Have you come across many who are trained to thieve, or sent out to beg or steal by their parents?—We have a large number of children sent out to beg, and if they cannot get it by begging they are to steal.

13,073. They are thrashed if they do not bring it in?—(Mr. Campbell.) Yes; and that is the cause of many of them being found in the streets.

13,074. Do you go round and hunt them up?—Yes; I go round the slum districts.

13,075. From your experience of the lives of these children, I suppose prison would have no deterrent effect upon them?—I do not think it would. On the opposite, I think it would have a bad effect.

13,076. But so far as physical comfort is concerned, prison would be more comfortable?—Oh, much more so, because it is in dens of disease they live.

13,077. Have you got a copy of your report?—No; but we shall send in one. The Rev. Mr. Grant has got a copy of the report, and also what I asked Mr. Campbell to get up in reference to gipsy children. I shall see that they are sent to the secretary.

13,078. The Chief Constable handed in a return of vagrants found in Dundee at the recent half-yearly census, and one very remarkable thing about it was the very small number of children under 14 years of age found in charge of vagrants. For instance, on last Sunday, December 23rd, there were 91 vagrants found in Dundee, and there were only 2 children among them. At the June census, there were 153 vagrants found, and only 8 children. Again, on December 24, 1893, there were 126 vagrants found, and only 9 children among them; and in the June census of that year there were 124 vagrants, and only 5 children?—That is a very remarkable feature that I cannot very well explain, all the more so when I think of the return that Mr. Campbell will be able to hand in. I asked Mr. Campbell to write to the Chief Constable of Forfar to see how many vagrants had come under his supervision during the last 12 months, and there have been 1301 vagrant children.

13,079. During the last 12 months?—Yes.

13,080. Yes, but they enumerate vagrancy in two ways; they give you the number of challenges, and one vagrant may be challenged 20 times, but then they have a census which I am giving you?—It is a very remarkable feature, and it rather surprised me. There are a large number of children who come into the Curr Refuge for destitute people, of which I am a director.

13,081. This census includes persons in prisons, hospitals, refuges, poorhouses, in gardens, streets, out-houses, sheds, &c.?—It is a very remarkable feature. I should have thought it was much greater. As to gipsy children, the number is rather surprising. There are 54 gipsy children within this area of Forfarshire, the immediate Dundee district, and these children are practically growing up without any supervision of any kind.

13,082. How do you propose to deal with them?—I think it must be a drastic remedy to deal with them. The only solution would be to take them away right off from their parents as soon as possible.

13,083. Well, the evidence we have got, and we have had a great deal about it, is that the gipsies are fond of their children, and are kind to them except when they are in drink, and except in the matter of education?—Education is the great difficulty, and how to prevent them from following the wandering habits of their parents is a difficult question, unless they are got hold of at any early age. I would corroborate the statement as to their being kindly with their children. I might also say that we have had several of these children in our Industrial Schools.

13,084. With what result?—Very unsatisfactory; they have just gone back; but the question is whether we did not get them too late. I have a very strong feeling too, that if these children were to be boarded out we are more likely to benefit them, than in an institution such as we have with 100 or 200 children.

13,085. You are a bailie and you understand administrative machinery, how would you do that?—Very much in the same way as, I am glad to say, the Parochial Board in Dundee is doing. They have a large number of these children—poor children who land in their hands—boarded out. I would apply the same plan.

13,086. Would you have Parochial Boards dealing with gipsy children who are not paupers?—Well, that is a very difficult problem.

13,087. They are the only authorities that do anything in the boarding out line?—That is so.

13,088. At whose expense, then, would you have them boarded out?—At the expense of the Parochial Board.

13,089. Let us go a little bit farther: where are you to get the gipsies settled?—That is an exceedingly difficult thing, and that is where the School Boards have been unable to deal with them.

13,090. But the settlement does not matter to the School Board; because, if they were living in any parish, they would have to educate the children?—Any difficulty would be in the payment of the fees.

13,091. The difficulty would come in with the Parish Council or the Parochial Boards if you were to suggest that they should board them out?—Yes; it is an exceedingly difficult question.

13,092. If you took the children from the gipsy and assume him to be a worthless fellow, he would probably be rather obliged to you for relieving him of the expense?—I do not think, so far as my experience of gipsies goes, that we have that class among them. They have usually an intense love for their children.

13,093. You have got intense love and a good parent in every respect except as regards education, what precedent can you find for taking the child from the parent in this case?—We have none. The only feeling we have is that these children are growing up without any moral or religious teaching, or any education whatever.

13,094. But a bigotted person of one religion might apply the same argument regarding the children of people of another religion?—That is so.

13,095. Take a bigotted Presbyterian; he might say these unfortunate children of my Roman Catholic neighbour are well loved by their parents, but they are

Mr. William Doig, and Mr. James Campbell.

27 Dec. 1894.

- Mr. William Doig, and Mr. James Campbell.*
27 Dec. 1894. being brought up in a path that will land them in perdition; would you have the State interfere there?—Oh no; the State could not interfere there.
- 13,096. Well, take the gipsy children?—When I speak of moral and religious teaching, I mean without any denominational connection. I feel that the State is not doing its duty to these 54 gipsy children.
- 13,097. But there is no use making any proposition unless we can work it out to a practical issue?—Well, so far as my judgment goes, it seems to me needful, in pure self-defence, to take possession of these children in some way.
- 13,098. Try another way by means of School Boards. I take it that you are connected with School Boards?—I am not now, I was 12 years in the School Board.
- 13,099. Then how can you work it out there? I understand your compulsory officer does not interfere unless in the case of persons who have been three or four weeks resident in the district?—That is so.
- 13,100. Is that limited by law?—I think so.
- 13,101. Assuming the period to be cut down even to a fortnight, are the gipsies always on the move?—I am not sure, but perhaps you might give them a location in a city district.
- 13,102. But though they had a location in a city district what better would you be? Would you have the children live in the city district when their parents are on the tramp, and, if so, at whose expense?—That is a very difficult matter. We are shaping just now in a way that might be of use in that case, that is, in the direction of a truant school.
- 13,103. But they are not truants?—They are truants in a sense.
- 13,104. But legally they are not?—No.
- 13,105. In Perthshire we were told, that if gipsy children went to school, the children of the inhabitants would not go to the same school, and that the school-master would turn the gipsy children out of his school?—I could not believe that possible.—(Mr. Campbell.) I have been told that by the parents themselves.
- 13,106. Are the gipsies in Forfarshire a better class, and would the inhabitants of the villages allow their children to associate with the gipsy children?—(Bailie Doig.) We have some experience of that sort in our schools here. The very poorest of the children in Dundee—the half-timers—attend the ordinary schools. There may be a little classification on the part of some people choosing a school where there are no half-timers for their children.
- 13,107. But the half-time children are children engaged in work?—Yes; but they are a very poor class of children.
- 13,108. At all events you don't know about the state of feeling in Forfarshire?—No, I do not, but I can quite imagine there might be such a feeling.
- 13,109. Have you many of these gipsy children in the Curr Refuge?—I do not think so.
- 13,110. Tell us about the Curr Refuge?—A Mr. Curr left a very large sum of money to trustees to disburse in useful and philanthropic work. The necessity was very strongly felt for a resting place for these travellers at night, and the trustees gave as much as paid for the building, I think about £6000. The Refuge has no endowment, and it is supported entirely by voluntary contributions. We require about £400 annually to maintain it, and we generally manage to get about £250 or £260.
- 13,111. Where do you get the balance?—We just tide over from one year to another, and we usually, in the course of a year or two, get some legacies which help us.
- 13,112. Can you tell us how many availed themselves of the Curr Refuge in 1893?—8200 men, 3020 women, 1221 children—total, 12,441; average, 34 per night.
- 13,113. Have you ever heard any complaints, as a bailie, of the existence of that institution increasing the number of vagrants in Dundee or district?—When it was started there was a strong feeling on the part of a number of the members of the Parochial Board, that it tended to increase the number of paupers.
- 13,114. I do not mean paupers, I mean vagrants?—Mr. William Doig, and Mr. James Campbell.
27 Dec. 1894. I do not think so, because a vast number of them found their way before that to common lodging houses, and those that could not afford to pay made their way to the Police Office. So far as my judgment goes it has not increased the number.
- 13,115. You give them shelter?—They have a good plain board and covering, and they have porridge and milk for supper and breakfast.
- 13,116. Any labour test?—No labour test. We have had that before us, but have not seen our way to develop it.
- 13,117. Do you restrict the number of nights?—Yes, to two or three nights in the month, and as far as possible those not residing in Dundee have the preference.
- 13,118. Does any director attend at night?—The directors go once a week in turn, and acts along with the agent, and sees that the house is all right for the night.
- 13,119. Have you any reason to believe that any number of those who seek shelter with you have money?—I do not think so. There might be an exceptional case, but it is sheer stress that drives them there in most cases.
- 13,120. Have you visited any of the ordinary common lodging houses in Dundee?—I have not.
- 13,121. Have you been in them?—Not for some years.
- 13,122. From what you hear is your Shelter a more eligible place for sleep than a common lodging house?—Infinitely better I think.
- 13,123. Would it not be a temptation then to a person, who had a shilling in his pocket, to come to you and save the shilling?—No; I think the temptation would be the other way. They have an amount of freedom when they pay for their own bed, and food, and other things, that they cannot have in the Refuge, where they are under supervision. There is no supervision in the small common lodging houses.
- 13,124. Have you police supervision?—No. We are always in touch with the police, but we have no trouble.
- 13,125. But I mean for the purpose of detecting people they may want?—No.
- 13,126. The police bring a large number of your people to you?—They advise them in many cases to come to us, because they come across them on their beats.
- 13,127. But after a certain hour you won't admit them?—That is to say, the place is shut up. I now hand in a copy which I have procured of the Third Annual Report of the Dundee Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children.
- 13,128. Mr. Campbell, you said, could tell us something about vagrants?—(Mr. Campbell.) I inquired about vagrants in Forfarshire. I wrote to the Chief Constable of the county asking him the number of vagrant children.
- 13,129. You have not had any cases of gipsy children dealt with by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children?—Yes; quite a number of tinker children. They are sheltered by the society in their Shelter.
- 13,130. Give us an instance, the worst you can?—I have found a tinker's children begging on the street at night, and have taken them to the Children's Shelter. They are kept there till the morning, when their parents usually come for them. The parents know of the Shelter, and when they miss their children they come there for them.
- 13,131. In these cases I suppose the parents have just got drunk?—(Bailie Doig.) Yes, and the children have the good sense to find their way to our Shelter, frequently when the parents are in the Police Office.
- 13,132. But in the way of protecting them from cruelty have you had many cases?—(Mr. Campbell.) We have had only one case where a mother was tried for ill-treating her children. That was a tinker of the name of White.
- 13,133. What was the ill-treatment?—Keeping the child sleeping out in the open air on a winter night.

Mr. William
Doig, and
Mr. James
Campbell.

27 Dec. 1894.

13,134. They don't think much about sleeping out I suppose?—The sheriff would not convict on that ground, because it was the immemorial right of a gipsy to sleep in the open air, but he convicted her on the charge of drunkenness.—Bailie Doig. We had two of these children committed some years ago to an Industrial School.

13,135. What was the result?—(Bailie Doig.) As soon as their time expired, it was a boy and a girl, they were sent to employment and service. The parents came and took the girl away, and now both boy and girl have gone back to the old life, and are living in a tent.

13,136. How long were they in the Industrial School?—Four or five years.

13,137. Does not that rather point to the hopelessness of eradicating gipsy life from them?—I believe we would need them to be taken very early. The boy I speak of was incapable of taking any mental education.

13,138. (By Miss Stevenson.) As to the different forms of cruelty, you will have cases of neglect, and cases of actual violence towards the children; what class of parents do you usually find guilty of such charges?—(Mr. Campbell.) In our short experience we have had all classes. We have had the very poor, we have had the working class, and we have had those in really good position.

13,139. Is it your experience, that in the cases of neglect the parents were poor, and that in the cases of cruelty the parents were better off?—No; I would not say that. The cases of cruelty have occurred very often where the fathers or mothers have violent tempers, and who, for very little, would excessively beat their child.

13,140. Were the parents very poor?—No.

13,140A. I suppose the cases of neglect were where the parents were very poor. I mean the cases where the children were left to starve without food?—I would not say that either. We had a case of a child almost starved to death where the mother was at the time in possession of some hundreds of pounds.

13,141. In the cases of violence had you all classes of parents guilty?—Yes; we had them at any rate up to a very respectable working man holding a fairly good position in one of our public works.

13,142. Could you give the average wages of the parents convicted under the Act?—They would not exceed an average of 18s. up to £1 a week.

13,143. Your experience is different from other places, where the average has been 30s. for all the cases?—(Bailie Doig.) The major part of our cases have been among the labouring classes whose wages would be about 18s. or £1 a week. We have had exceptional cases of people in good position.

13,144. In your experience has the School Board of Dundee ever tried to get hold of the children of the vagrant class?—No; they don't come under our cognisance at all. It is not in Dundee, but in the outside parishes that they are.

13,145. But you say that these people come into Dundee, and the children find their way to your Shelter?—They come in to sell their manufactured articles.

13,146. Could the School Board Officer not give the proper warning to the parents, and threaten to take procedure?—That is a question well worth thinking over. I do not know that the School Board have ever thought that they were called upon to deal with that class. They are just birds of passage, coming into the city perhaps from a distance of six or eight miles to sell their wares, and going back again.

13,147. But should not the School Board of that place deal with them?—Well, I think that ought to be done.

13,148. You know School Boards co-operate with each other?—Yes; that is a very proper thing, and I think if the smaller boards would communicate with the larger ones, I think something might be done. I do not think there is any desire not to give them education; it is simply sheer lack of supervision.

13,149. (By the Chairman.) At page 14 of your Annual Report you have got a drawing of a gipsy family on the road; what do you put it in your report for?—(Mr. Campbell.) It is to show to our subscribers the class of children for which we wish to draw out sympathy.

13,150. But these children don't really want your sympathy—that is to say, they are not cruelly treated; they don't go to school, about which children are not likely to complain; and they live in a way that we should not like, but which their parents at all events prefer to any other?—Well, I think they are cruelly treated by having to live in these tents. You will see the photo is taken on a winter morning.

13,151. Would you render it illegal to live in tents?—Yes; I would make that mode of living illegal, and I would take the children away, and have them committed under the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act to some school farm, and taught farm work.

13,152. At whose expense?—Under the same system as the Industrial Schools Act. The new Act for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children has a clause under which these young children could be taken away.

13,153. You have no gypsies in Dundee?—Yes; we have over 50.

13,154. That is in Forfarshire?—They are constantly coming in and out of Dundee.

13,155. The Chief Constable of Dundee gave us a return of all the vagrants found at all the censuses of vagrants in Dundee since 1888. At the last census, on Sunday, there were 18 children in charge of 81 vagrants; in June, there were 8 children in charge of 153 vagrants; in December, last year, only 9 in charge of 126 vagrants; and in the June of that year, there were only 5 children in charge of 154 vagrants; so that the number of vagrant children in Dundee is a mere bagatelle?—But these gipsy children would not be counted at the censuses.

13,156. But the census takes them in prisons, hospitals, poorhouses, lodging houses, public parks, gardens, streets, sheds, &c., or about pits and other works—they would be counted?—These gipsy children go out of Dundee at night altogether. They come into Dundee only during the day.

13,157. And there were only 54 gipsy children in Forfarshire?—Perhaps.

13,158. It is not in connection with cruelty to children, but repulsion to living in tents that has caused you to put in that illustration in your report. It illustrates no particular case, and you did not take any action with regard to it?—No; we merely wanted to show how these children live.

13,159. (By Miss Stevenson.) You state that under the new Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, children can be taken and committed to Industrial Schools the same way as in the Act of 1866. I cannot find the clause, but perhaps you can tell us if there exists any provision for payment by Parochial Boards for the maintenance of children?—There is no provision for payment until they arrive at the age of six.

13,160. I don't find any clause in the Act which refers to payment by Parochial Boards; there is very stringent provision as to payment by parents?—Yes.

13,161. The chairman asked you a question in regard to what kind of liability was incurred by a parent whose child was taken away from him. Paragraph 4 of the recent Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act is as follows:—'If a person fails to pay any sum payable 'by him in pursuance of any such order he may be 'dealt with in like manner as if the same were due from 'him in pursuance of an order under the Bastardy Law 'Amendment Act, 1872, or in Scotland, were the same 'discerned for aliment, or in Ireland, were the same 'ordered to be paid by him under the Summary Jurisdiction (Ireland) Act.' That is an alimentary provision?—Yes.

13,161A. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you know anything about the Tyson cure?—(Bailie Doig.) Not personally.

13,162. You are a chemist?—Yes.

13,163. Do you know the results of the Tyson cases?—So far as my knowledge goes it has not been satisfactory

13,164. Do you know if there is mental suggestion in the cure?—I don't know.

13,165. It is not like the ordinary medicines scientifically proved to produce a physical effect, it seems to have a mental effect?—Whatever virtue there may be in it as a medicine, I understand that mental comfort and mental surroundings are a very great deal in the cure.

13,166. What is the general opinion with regard to the cure in Dundee?—So far as my knowledge goes it has been considered disappointing. [The witness then withdrew].

Mr. William

Mr. James

27 Dec. 1894.

Mr. William
Geddes.

MR. WILLIAM GEDDES, Governor of Dundee Prison, called in and examined.

Mr. William
Geddes.

13,167. (By the Chairman.)—How long have you been Governor of Dundee Prison?—Nearly seven years.

13,168. Before that where were you?—I have been 22 years a Governor altogether. I was in Glasgow about seven years as Deputy Governor, and Deputy Governor in charge for a considerable time there, and formerly Governor of the County Prison of Kirkcudbright for six years. Before that I was in Sutherlandshire for two years.

13,169. How many prisoners have you in Dundee Prison?—We average about 120.

13,170. Have you many habituals?—Yes; we have.

13,171. You have both men and women?—Principally females.

13,172. How do you employ the women?—We find it very difficult to get employment for the females. The major portion of them, as a rule, are quite unfit for any sort of work.

13,173. How?—Well, I suppose they are breaking up. They seem to be unfit for even the most ordinary domestic work.

13,174. I suppose you have not very much domestic work for them to do?—Oh yes; we have a good deal to do in the way of cleaning up, and housework of a kind, though it is plain. Then of course there is the cooking, which the females do for the prison. A few of them do sacks

13,175. Many?—Not many.

13,176. The total number of commitments to Dundee Prison for 1893 was 4422, and of these, 3462 were for drunkenness, breach of the peace and assault, begging and vagrancy, prostitution and petty thefts?—Quite so.

13,177. You have got a number of re-commitments?—Yes.

13,178. How do your re-commitments compare with the other prisons that you have been in?—I should say they are somewhat on a par with Glasgow, although one class of them, I might say, varied very much. That was for importuning.

13,179. They have run up?—Yes; it depends very much upon circumstances.

13,180. What circumstances?—Well it might depend entirely upon a change of officer of police on certain beats.

13,181. We were told that there were a number of officers who had been superannuated before a great increase occurred in all classes of offences?—Yes.

13,182. Do you ever have any talk with importuning prisoners?—I have asked them.

13,183. And what is their story—do they admit that they importune?—Their story is that certain police whom they know well enough, take them up although they have not committed the offence, simply because they do know them. That is what the women have told me.

13,184. Did you ever hear the phrase used that 'a woman who has been convicted has no chance'?—That is a common expression.

13,185. Do you believe that that is true?—I quite believe that it is quite possible. I do not think that night policemen as a rule are just exactly Solomons.

13,186. Do they ever make charges against the police of exacting blackmail?—I have not heard of that.

13,187. I suppose prisoners occasionally speak of these things in connection with other matters?—Well I have not experienced that in Dundee.

13,188. Have you ever had any shebeeners with you?—Yes.

13,189. Have they ever made that charge against the police to you?—No.

13,190. You found that the change in these police officers was accompanied by a great increase in the number of crimes. The Chief Constable of Dundee mentioned that as a probable thing, and he mentioned another thing, the open season of last year, which he said gave rise to a sort of exceptional prosperity in Dundee, and enabled people to drink more. Do you think that would account for any of it?—Quite reasonably.

13,191. What is the usual sentence in Dundee?—14 days as a rule for that offence; it used to be less.

13,192. When was that?—Speaking generally, 14 days is quite a long sentence in Dundee.

13,193. Five years ago what would it be?—Well I could not say that; I am not prepared to answer.

13,194. You have told us it used to be less?—Well the sentences were almost always very small. I think I made a mistake; I was referring to drunk and incapable.

13,195. In connection with drunk and incapables, has there been any material increase in the sentences of those who come into your hands?—On the drunk and incapables, since the Police Act, there has been.

13,196. Formerly the utmost sentence was 24 hours—Yes, 24 hours is practically abolished except in the case of first offences, and the sentences run up now to 14 days.

13,197. Have you many 14 days men for drunkenness?—Not many. We may have a few now and again.

13,198. The imprisonment sentences have been materially increased?—For the first offence of drunk and incapable it has.

13,199. Have the increased sentences cut down the numbers of drunks that come to you?—Well we have lost one or two familiar faces. I cannot say what has become of them. Perhaps they are dead. I remember one instance. An old woman who had been something like 200 times—certainly over 150 that was—and I remember she remarked on the first time she got 14 days—she had always got 24 hours previously—that she thought it was a very cruel piece of legislation to apply to her, that she should get 14 days for drinking her own money. She lay in hospital all the time, and we have not seen her since. She was removed to the poorhouse.

13,200. You don't know whether she is dead or what?—I could not say.

13,201. Do you know of any case of a person who was more or less frequently with you before, who has been deterred by the longer sentence?—I could not say so definitely at the present moment, but I could easily figure it up by search.

13,202. You cannot search, because the disappearance of a person might be by departure, and not only by death?—That is so.

13,203. In connection with your records of previous convictions, have you any means of knowing when an old offender comes, say from Edinburgh, and falls into your hands—have you any means of knowing whether it is his first or hundredth offence?—Do you mean coming in for a petty offence?

13,204. No; a person who has got many convictions in Edinburgh, and comes through to Dundee where he gets a little more liberty for a time, and then is brought up and sent to you. You put a ticket on his door stating how often he has been in prison?—Well, we generally try to find out if any prisoner has any marks upon him.

Mr. William
Geddes.

27 Dec. 1894.

13,205. But does that apply to petty offences?—No.
13,205A. I presume that every habitual offender that comes to Dundee for the first time will try to pass himself off as a first offender?—They mostly do, although we are quite satisfied from certain little traits of character that they have been in prison before.

13,206. If they are expert at oakum for instance?—Well, there are lots of little things whereby the officers know them to be old prison birds.

13,207. So that in any classification of prisoners, based on the number of convictions, there is no means of filling up the gap as to knowledge of offences committed in other places?—No; because we have instances where they cross the water to us from Cupar. We commit them as first offenders, and then discover they have been very old offenders.

13,208. Do you think of any way of getting over that?—Not unless we had time for inquiry.

13,209. It has been suggested to us that habitual offenders might be given a period of detention in an adult Reformatory, and it has been further suggested that the habitual offender should be defined as a man who has been convicted so often during a year, or more times during a longer period, but in order to carry out any such proposal it would be unjust to allow a man, who had done say 50 imprisonments in Edinburgh, to come to Dundee and pass off as a new man, it would be desirable to trace him up. Do you see any way in which that could be done?—It might be done in the manner in which prisoners are identified in regard to prisoners charged with serious offences.

13,210. Does it take a great deal of difficulty?—Considerable.

13,211. How do you identify?—Photographs, and marks on the persons. Most of their marks are indexed.

13,212. Would it be much trouble, for instance, if that system were extended to all prisoners who were with you for a certain number of times in the course of a year, say five or six times, if their photographs and marks were interchanged, would that involve much trouble?—I do not think it would involve a great deal of trouble, at least not insurmountable trouble.

13,213. But you would not register any of these petty offences, of the woman, for instance, who had been with you over 100 times?—Well, no. She was a local individual, and known thoroughly here.

13,214. Do you find that the habitual drunkard sticks to one locality?—Well, as a rule.

13,215. Have you many semi-fatuous prisoners, silly, weak-minded?—We have a few of whom we might use the expression 'they are not all there.' They cannot be classed exactly as lunatics, and they are not exactly insane, but they are on the border line, and every time they come to me they seem nearer insanity.

13,216. Or imbecility?—Yes; it may be better expressed that way.

13,217. You have seen a good deal of both long and short sentences?—Yes.

13,218. Do you think that the present system of short sentences has a good effect in cutting down crime, for instance among those petty offenders?—No. I think that a great deal of good has accrued from the First Offenders Act in giving a chance to first offenders. I think it has done an immense amount of good; but I think there has just as incalculable an amount of injury been done by the repetition ad infinitum of very short sentences.

13,219. What would you substitute for that?—Well, there is a medium. I don't care, precisely, about a man or a woman being sentenced to close confinement for 12 or 18 months for a very simple offence; but for habituels having three or four convictions, there might be a sharp sentence to let them understand, and bring them under discipline.

13,220. But don't you find that prisoners who have had very sharp sentences, even 15 months solitary, and that convict prisoners come into your hands again?—No doubt we have them occasionally. I would not claim long sentences as a cure, and I don't advocate them. I think there is a sort of happy medium that might be struck. This repeated sending of prisoners for 7 days or so, for 10 or 11 times in succession, is not a success.

13,221. Would you run them in for 60 days?—Yes.

13,222. Do you think that would have any particularly good effect?—I think at the commencement.

13,223. Have you any wife-beaters in Dundee?—That is a very common thing in Dundee.

13,224. Are those men often habituels?—Yes; drunks.

13,225. I saw a man the other day in Greenock Prison who had been 8 or 10 times in for beating his wife, who on the last occasion got 9 months for beating her, and who is in just now doing 60 days. The nine months do not appear to have had any effect upon him. Have you had any experience of similar cases at all?—Well, I could not charge my memory with anything exactly just now.

13,226. Have you ever had a chronic wife-beater like that man for beating his wife a dozen times?—Yes, I have one in my mind, who said he could not help it when he got drunk. It was the natural sequence of his having drink to thrash his wife.

13,227. Had he ever been tried with a good long sentence?—Not that I remember.

13,228. Do the Dundee Bailies deal leniently with wife-beating?—Not as a rule. The first time they are brought before them they usually deal pretty sharply with them, and in certain cases they are remitted to the sheriff, and they are treated a little more leniently there.

13,229. The sheriff treats them more leniently?—Yes; and they ask to be sent there.

13,230. The sheriff has much bigger powers than the magistrate?—Yes; and that is the reason the magistrate remits to the sheriff.

13,231. But the prisoner knows better?—Apparently he knows better.

13,232. Have you many juvenile offenders?—Not many. They don't come to prison now, at least very very few.

13,233. Have you any people in prison under 16 just now?—No.

13,234. Any under 17?—No, none just now. There were two lads lately, but they are out. They came from Fifehire, and had been previously convicted.

13,235. What for?—Theft, an ingenious sort of theft, putting a wire with a fishing hook through the bolt hole of a draper's shop, and pulling out silk handkerchiefs, and articles of that kind.

13,236. You say they had been previously convicted?—Yes.

13,237. What were their ages?—Sixteen.

13,238. What were their previous convictions?—We had one of them a few months before.

13,239. For what?—Theft also.

13,240. Had they been in Reformatories?—No.

13,241. Do you have many Reformatory boys?—No; they used to pass through the prison, but we don't have many in Dundee.

13,242. But do you have many prisoners who have been in a Reformatory?—There are a few whom we know, but very few will admit they have been in a Reformatory.

13,243. An abnormally large percentage, do you think?—No.

13,244. Do you think that the Reformatory and Industrial School lads keep well out of your hands?—As a rule I should say they do. But the Reformatories have had a very poor opportunity of dealing with their lads, because, as a rule, they are very bad before they get them.

13,245. Well, the Industrial School lads?—I think they have a much better opportunity, because they are taken in so young.

13,246. You don't think there is anything to be done in your department so far as juvenile delinquency is concerned?—I do not see anything, because there are so few coming our way, and of course they are always kept separate. They are not allowed to associate with other prisoners.

Mr. William
Geddes.

Mr. William
Geddes.
27 Dec. 1894.

13,247. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You have had a long experience in various prisons both of long and short sentence prisoners; what do you think is the physical and mental effect produced by a long period of separate confinement—is it good or bad?—I do not think it can be called good.

13,248. For this reason, that it implies in many cases an almost complete withdrawal of the normal conditions of life?—As a rule the criminal is a weak-minded subject.

13,249. But would you expect, from the general appearance of the prisoners, that being kept for 18 months or two years in separate confinement, with the slight relaxations which you know they get—that the effect of that imprisonment is detrimental to them both physically and mentally?—Both I should say.

13,250. And the amount that is given to them in the way of conversation by the governor, doctor, chaplain, or warder, is how much?—You may sum it up as nil almost in a large prison.

13,251. (By Col. M'Hardy.) I would like to ask a question about weak-minded prisoners—they turn up from time to time?—They do.

13,252. You have got, so far as prisoners are concerned, an abnormal number of insane prisoners committed to you?—Yes.

13,253. How is it that they come?—Well, the party commits an offence, possibly a breach of the peace by being noisy. The police apprehend him, and the police have found out on inquiry that this man is possibly insane. I do not know the modus operandi, but the police surgeon examines him, and if there is a doubt as to the man's sanity he is forthwith committed to prison on a charge of breach of the peace.

13,254. Convicted?—Committed, not convicted; and then remitted for inquiry to the sheriff. The case is put into the hands of the Procurator-Fiscal for the County, who in turn communicates with the Parochial Board, who send up their medical officers. Meantime, possibly for days, the prison officials are supposed to have satisfied themselves as to the sanity or insanity of the prisoner.

13,255. But they are sometimes actually convicted?—There have been rare instances.

13,256. Is it the fact that you have at the present time in custody a woman who has been something like four times in the Asylum?—That is true; and she seems as insane at the moment of admission as she was at the most critical time I ever saw her when she was remitted to the Asylum.

13,257. Does she come from the city or the county?—From the city—committed by the City Authorities.

13,258. We were talking to the Chief Constable to-day, and he thought that the number of apprehensions that had run up so very highly in 1893 had fallen. He said he thought they had fallen 500 this year—that was guessing—is it not a fact that there have been more transfers this last year of prisoners from Dundee to Perth owing to want of accommodation?—Yes.

13,259. How has that arisen—is it the increased number of prisoners, or the increase of the length of sentences?—Partly the increase of sentences, and partly also the increase of numbers.

13,260. From the city?—Yes, from the city. There has been no abnormal increase from the outlying stations.

13,261. Has this increase, not only of sentences but of numbers, been since the police had the power under the act of 1892?—The number of females have gone up considerably since that.

13,262. So that the lengthened penalty seems to have an effect, not only of increasing the length of sentence, but the number of individuals upon whom it is inflicted?—I would not go the length of saying that.

13,263. How is it that the length of sentences has increased as well as the numbers?—There is no accounting for the fluctuations at times. I have made them a speciality at times without being able to find out the solution of the mystery. It has been attributed sometimes to the effect of increased trade, and we have had increase in numbers when there was no increase in trade at all.

13,264. There has been no extraordinary development in trade this year?—It is very difficult to find out from what people in business say. One party says 'Yes,' and another says, 'No.' It depends entirely upon the circumstances.

13,265. (By the Chairman.) Have you many fines paid after people are sent to you?—A good many.

13,266. They are sent to you right off?—They sometimes stay in prison till Saturday, which is a day for paying a number of the fines. Unfortunately, a great number of these loafers whom we get in are dependent upon those poor women who work in the mills; and they pay their fines for them often. That is a class I should like to see punished to a greater extent than they are.

13,267. How many would you have dismissed that way last Saturday?—Not many as a number; we don't deal with such large numbers that I could give the number discharged on one particular Saturday night.

13,268. Could you give us the number of discharges through payment of fines for one month and three months?—Yes, on reference to the books. Another thing in reference to the payment of fines is that I know I am frequently applied to to give out a woman's shawl, or other garment, in order that it may be taken to a certain relative of the peoples in order to eke out the fine.

13,269. But you can have no moral objection to that?—None at all: I was only referring to what they would do to pay the fine for those worthless people. It would be better they were not fined at all.

13,270. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Are many paid on the day of conviction?—Oh, yes. Frequently we have had them paid just when they were in the baths.

13,271. (By the Chairman.) You say you have been asked for a garment of the prisoner—that would belong to the prisoner?—Yes.

13,272. So that they are paying their own fine?—Well, it was asked to eke out the fine that someone else was getting for them.

13,273. When you spoke of being dependent upon those who are working in the mills for them, do you mean their wife, or daughter, or some less legitimate connection?—The woman they cohabit with.

13,274. Do you mean to say that they exercise as much control over the earnings of women with whom they cohabit as they would over the earnings of their wives?—I am afraid they do, in many instances possibly more so.

13,275. Then they must surely treat these women otherwise well, or they would not have them devoted to them?—I do not know; but I know personally a number of these fellows who never work a stroke from one year's end to the other, and who still seem to be comfortably enough clothed, and to be able to get refreshments, loafing about the streets and smoking while the women with whom they live have to work in the mill, and when the men get into trouble they manage somehow to eke out the fine for them.

13,276. Would you prefer in many cases then that fines were not allowed?—Distinctly; in all these cases there should be no fines. It is cruelty to the people who have to raise them.

13,277. I suppose the same opinion would extend to pledges?—Very much. [The witness then withdrew.]

MR. JAMES BADENOCH NICOLSON, called in and examined by the Chairman.

Mr. James
Badenoch
Nicolson.

13,278. You are counsel to the Scotch Education Department?—I am.

13,279. And you have been so for a great number of years?—That is so.

13,280. The point upon which we wanted the highest legal assistance was as to the education of vagrant children. It requires, I understand, under the Education Act a parent to be in a parish four weeks before the attendance officer can bring the compulsory machinery to bear upon him: is that so?—No; I do not think so.

13,281. What is the limit, or can you give us the clause as to that?—The Act which regulates the compelling by means of an attendance order, a parent to send his child to school, is the Education (Scotland) Act, 1883. Section 9 of that Act provides thus:—‘If the parent of any child, without reasonable excuse, neglects to provide efficient elementary education for his child, or fails to secure the regular attendance of his child at some public or inspected school, it shall be lawful for the School Board, after due warning to the parent of such child, to complain to a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, and such Court, may, if satisfied of the truth of such complaint, order that the child do attend some public or inspected school willing to receive him, and named in the order, being either such as the parent may select, or, if he do not select any, such as the Court think expedient, and the child shall attend the school every time the school is open, and during the whole time such school is open for the instruction of children of similar age, including the day fixed by Her Majesty’s Inspector for his annual visit, or in such other regular manner as is specified in the order. An order under this section is in this Act referred to as an Attendance Order.’ Then Section 10 of the Act of 1883, has been repealed by Section 4 of the Day Industrial Schools Act of 1893, which provides:—‘Section 10 of the Education (Scotland) Act 1883, is hereby repealed, and in lieu thereof it is enacted as follows:—Where such attendance order is not complied with, without any reasonable excuse, within the meaning of the Education (Scotland) Act 1883, the Court of Summary Jurisdiction, on complaint made by the School Board, may, if it think fit, order as follows:—(1) In the first case of non-compliance, if the parent of the child does not appear, or appears and fails to satisfy the Court that he has used all reasonable efforts to enforce compliance with the order, the Court may impose a penalty not exceeding 20s. with expenses, or of imprisonment not exceeding 14 days; but if the Court is satisfied that he has used all reasonable efforts as aforesaid, the Court may, without inflicting a penalty, order the child to be sent to a certified Day Industrial School, or to a certified Industrial School; and (2) in the second or subsequent cases of non-compliance with the order, the Court may order the child to be sent to a certified Day Industrial School, or to a certified Industrial School, and may further, in its discretion, inflict any such penalty as aforesaid, or it may, for each such non-compliance, inflict any such penalty as aforesaid, without ordering the child to be sent to an Industrial School; provided that a complaint under this section, with respect to a continuing non-compliance with any attendance order, shall not be repeated by the School Board at any less interval than one month.’ That, no doubt, was what was in your mind.

13,282. We shall take the machinery of the first section you read; apply it to the case of a vagrant or a gipsy—in your county have you any?—No; I think not.

13,283. Well, we have had great complaints about gipsies, one of whose most heinous crimes is that they utterly neglect the education of their children, and the question is how they can be made amenable to the Education Act?—This is quite inapplicable to them; you can’t catch them to give them due warning.

13,284. And due warning—I suppose a week would be considered as very small warning?—No; I think not. I think you might give them much shorter notice than that, but the difficulty is to get the gipsy at all.

13,285. You mean, if a tent filled with gipsies arrives in a School Board district to-day, and encamps for a week, there would be hardly time to put any of the machinery into operation?—It is quite unsuitable.

13,286. If an order were obtained before further remedies could be enforced, the tent would have decamped, possibly to a long distance off?—I have little doubt that the appearance of the School Board Officer would secure immediate disappearance of the tent, and a change into another School Board area.

13,287. It has been suggested to us that each gipsy should be given a location which should be considered to be his place of abode, and where he might be ordered to send his children to school, but that could not be worked, because if he went off, some one would have to maintain the children.—You mean, what we call in the law a Commune forum, such as there is in the Court of Session for purposes of litigation.

13,288. That was broached, the idea being, that given a locality, the School Board should look after the children.—Mr. Smith, of Coalville, in his Bill, if I remember aright, endeavoured to meet that case. I have a recollection that a Bill of this kind came under our consideration in the Education Office, and that we revised it with a view of securing some means to deal with this matter. As far as I can remember I think it was proposed that the children should be sent to the school in each new district they entered. I forget the provisions now, but I think it might be worth while to look up Mr. Smith’s Bill.

13,289. There was another point in connection with that. We were told by a deputation who represented the case to us at Perth, that the gipsy children should be sent to school, and that there should be some special schools for them, because the ordinary inhabitant would not send his child to mingle with gipsy children, and a schoolmaster in the deputation said that if the gipsy children were sent to his school, he would turn them out as unclean, the reason being that they were dirty, and swarming with vermin and so on; would the schoolmaster have any power to do that?—Oh, I think he would have power to turn them out if they were in insanitary circumstances.—[Dr. Sutherland. They do that in Glasgow.]

13,290. They may turn the children out in Glasgow, but they can compel them to keep them clean in Glasgow, and that can’t very well be done with the gipsy children?—In dealing with an ordinary child you would send him back to the parent, and tell him that he must keep the child clean, and if he does not do that, then you would proceed against him under the compulsory provisions. In the case of a vagrant child, if you sent him back, his parents would probably walk off with him into the next parish.

13,291. Then as to the difficulty about children not being sent to the school where gipsies attended; I suppose that would not be taken as an excuse; they would be compelled to go?—If there were no sanitary objections they would be compelled to receive the gipsy children.

13,292. We were told that in one or two cases, in Perthshire, I think, where children were found begging and it was proposed to send them to an Industrial School, the magistrates refused to do so in consequence of the expense of putting the Act into operation?—The expense of the Industrial School or of the prosecution.

13,293. Of both I suppose?—That is quite true.

13,294. Would the parish have to maintain those children committed for begging for instance, or would the Government?—If the child was a pauper the parish would be bound to provide for him. In an Industrial School I imagine it is the Government that would do so.

13,295. In the Industrial Schools the Government do so in the first instance, and recover from the parent if they can?—That is so.

13,296. Then is the child of a gipsy or a tinker a pauper?—No; I do not think so. Under our law a person is only entitled to relief when he is not able-bodied. An able-bodied gipsy would not be entitled to get relief, or to have his child kept as a pauper.

13,297. And if the child were left behind it is not any more a pauper?—Well, if a child were detained from its parents by any Government Authority, I imagine Government would immediately become responsible for its maintenance.

13,298. Government would?—By that I mean the Treasury.

Mr. James
Badcock
Nicolson

27 Dec. 1894.

13,299. We find that in any recommendations made to us the parties are all very willing that the Government should bear the expense?—All parties agree in that.

13,300. Each party is more or less willing that some other party should bear the expense; but no party is willing that they should bear the expense?—Yes. I saw lately that some one had observed that, as education generally was free, why should not this particular kind of education also be free.

13,301. We have had recommended to us sundry modes of taking these children from their parents, and sending them to Industrial Schools, to rescue them from the state of vagabondage that lies before them; is there any precedent which you would consider applicable to such proceedings?—Certainly no modern one. I am not sure if one were to look back in regard to the history of salters and colliers, that under that old system one might find a precedent. I am not prepared to say off-hand if there is; but certainly there has not been since that time.

13,302. Would it not be difficult to make the gipsy adversus gleba?—Yes; I think rather.

13,303. We had not exhausted the subject of gipsies?—In regard to the reasons which are sustained as excusing from attendance at school. Section 11 of the Act of 1883 provides that 'any of the following reasons shall be a reasonable excuse within the meaning of sections 70 and 72 of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, and the two foregoing sections, viz:—(a) That the child has been prevented from attending school by sickness, or any other unavoidable cause; (b) That there is no public or inspected school which the child can attend within three miles, measured according to the nearest road from the residence of such child.' These are substantially all the provisions in regard to the compulsory powers for obliging attendance at schools.

13,304. It has been suggested that by intercommunication and co-operation between School Boards in a county area, something might be done to get hold of vagrant children and educate them; can you see how it would work out?—I doubt the feasibility of that. If it were possible to put the duty upon a County Authority, such as the district committee, or the County Council, or anything of that kind, you could probably accomplish the object in view, but that is putting upon them an educational duty which has hitherto been confined to the School Board.

13,305. But how would that work out? The tinker families encamp in A parish, or a county, for two or three days, and the child may be got to school there. Then it goes on to B district, and a little time is lost. It might possibly get two or three days in B district school, and so on round the county. You who are thoroughly versed in the working of the Education Acts, can you conceive that that would work out anything like an education?—Not without a power of detention in an Industrial School or something of that kind, and then the county or district authority working out their duties by the aid of the police. I do not think that it could be carried out without the aid of the police, who have got authority over the whole county or district.

13,306. But then the police tell us that the people won't put the police machinery in motion. They don't complain of begging. They don't cause gipsies to be apprehended for begging. They give them money possibly under the influence of the fear of something worse happening. They give them money and food, and they never complain about them?—I think our police now sufficiently patrol the whole county to act without needing to wait for information.

13,307. But why would they interfere?—Statute law would require to put it upon them, but it is a question whether the remedy would not be worse than the disease. The question would be whether you were not putting a quasi-criminal character upon these children, in order to save them from a worse hereafter.

13,308. You know what Parliament would be likely to do; do you think Parliament would for one moment entertain the idea of any wholesale seizure of children of persons who are pursuing a lawful occupation, ostensibly at all events, and who are not said to be criminal, although offenders in the matters of begging and getting drunk?—I do not think Parliament would do so. I am only suggesting, if Parliament were willing to do it, what would be a practicable method of procedure.

13,309. How would you work out this practicable method you speak of?—What could be done would be this—I am not in the least saying I would recommend it—that the Chief Constable should instruct all his officers, wherever they come upon children begging, or the children of gipsy or vagrant parents, to report immediately to him that there were such children, and that he should at once go to the sheriff, or two magistrates, or a burgh magistrate, and get a warrant for the child or children being sent to an Industrial School. It would point, of course, to the large multiplication of Industrial Schools over the country, for which Parliament would probably be very unwilling to provide the necessary money.

13,310. That would bring upon the Treasury the duty of maintaining the children of all the gipsies, of all the tinkers, and of all the vagrants in Scotland?—Substantially it would do so; yet I don't believe that anything short of what I have indicated would be effective, and I quite agree that Parliament, neither on financial grounds nor on grounds of interference with the liberty of the subject, is at all likely to give such powers.

13,311. We have some 1200 children under 14 years of age who would have to be dealt with, and that would involve very large expense?—Yes; that is more than one third, I think, of those who are in the whole of the Industrial Schools in Scotland at this moment.

13,312. The Treasury does pay the expenses, or at any rate the greater proportion of the expenses of some of the Industrial Schools?—Yes.

13,313. Of the Mars we are told it pays a very large proportion?—Both of the Reformatories and the Industrial and Day Industrial Schools. You will find that in the last report of the inspector. The sum paid is a large one.

13,314. Do you know what grant they give the Day Industrial Schools?—I do not. (Miss Stevenson.) One shilling.

13,315. Short of that you don't see how, under the existing machinery, it is possible to compel the attendance of these children?—Certainly not in the country districts; in large towns it might be done.

13,316. But the gipsy is not in large towns?—Well no, but the vagrant is.

13,317. There are very few in Dundee. For instance, at the census taken last Sunday there were 91 adult vagrants, and only 2 children, and at the summer census there were only 8 children?—I should have thought it would have been much more; I am glad to hear that.

13,318. You have no tinkers in Kincardineshire?—I would not say that; I thought you meant gipsies.

13,319. Well, take tinkers?—Well, we have tinkers.

13,320. Are you much bothered with vagrancy?—We have been troubled.

13,321. (By Col. M'Hardy.) You have got 70?—They are all wanderers over the county; they are not natives of the county.

13,322. (By the Chairman.) Have you heard any complaints about them begging or stealing?—Occasionally what look like incendiary fires are attributed to them sleeping out at night.

13,323. Not attributed to malice?—Sometimes, but chiefly to carelessness.

13,324. I suppose they beg as they do in other counties?—Oh yes, they do.

13,325. Is there much complaint as to that?—No; I do not think there is.

13,326. Do they poach?—Not very much; I do not think so. Since the Ground Game Act came into force the inducements to poaching have greatly diminished.

13,327. I suppose that the same thing exists in your county as elsewhere, that the people encourage them, and that if the people would stop giving them alms and assistance, and would complain to the police, they would soon be put down?—I suppose they would.

18,328. You are a member of the County Council in Kincardineshire?—I am Chairman.

18,329. Have you got any bye-law about vagrancy?—No.

18,330. Why was that?—There was no need for it.

18,331. So that you have all the powers you want?—Yes.

18,332. You are aware that a number of the counties tried to adopt bye-laws?—Yes.

18,333. And there was some decision of the Court of Session?—I am not a great believer in bye-laws.

18,334. Do you think it would be a good thing to extend the vagrancy clause of the Burgh Police Act to counties?—Well, I can imagine that it would be in an area round the large towns. It must be a disadvantage to have a different law just over the border from the towns.

18,335. Would not the simplest thing be to extend it all over?—Generally.

18,336. If the police did not care to work it, and if the County Council did not care to work it, it would not be worked, and that would be all?—It would be a dead letter. I think there should be the same law for town and country in a matter of that kind.

18,337. Don't you think it would be a good thing in the matter of drunkenness? The law, for instance, as to drunk and incapable, under the Burgh Police Act gives pretty severe penalties—40s. or 30 days, and in the counties, drunkenness is only an offence against the Public Houses Act, punishable by 6s. or 24 hours. Have you ever considered about that?—No; I have not thought about that, but in the same way I think the law should be uniform. I see no reason for the more severe punishment of the town drunkard than of the country drunkard.

18,338. It would much simplify matters in having the laws relating to this universal offence assimilated?—Yes. We know that people who really do mean to get drunk, leave the town and go to the country, in the belief that there is a less severe law there.

18,339. Is that so?—Undoubtedly, in the neighbourhood of large towns.

18,340. Well, excursionists very often get drunk when they go to the country, but I did not think it was on any such provident grounds?—Well, I do not think it is absent from their minds at all.

18,341. (By Miss Stevenson.) Would there be any possibility of making the complaint of one School Board transferable to another? In an amendment on the Act of 1872, the compulsory clause was changed, the words 'where a parent has failed and omitted, and is failing and omitting,' were left out for the reason that some sheriffs would not convict if the children had been sent to school after a notice had been served upon the parent?—That is true.

18,342. Would it not be possible that this compulsory could be made retrospective in the case of those vagrant parents, and that by some means the complaint of one School Board could refer to the fact that the proceedings had been originated by another; for instance, in Perthshire, where the vagrants are going about in small areas with a great many School Boards?—I see no great difficulty in that being accomplished by legislation.

18,343. It would not be an unpracticable thing?—Not at all, you could quite well provide that such failure within a limited period, say three months, or something of that kind, could be prosecuted for by a subsequent School Board into whose area the parent had gone. It would be a perfectly easy matter to draft a clause, but it is another matter whether you would get Parliament to pass it.

18,344. (By the Chairman.) But how would it work; how would you punish the man? Suppose you say you must send your children to this school, or go to prison—a man is on the tramp; how are the children to be kept within reach of that School Board?—I am afraid it would almost be impossible to work such a power even if it were given, and the great difficulty would be to get one School Board to take it up even although it had the power.

18,345. (By Miss Stevenson.) If the one School Board could produce the complaint of another School Board, and the alternative given to the parent of settling down in that place and sending his children to school, or going to prison, would that not have a tendency to make him settle?—As a matter of practice, I am afraid it would not work.

18,346. Would the provisions of Section 14 of the Industrial Schools Act not apply in the case of those children. Would they not be covered by the words, 'Any child found wandering about and not having any home, or settled place of abode'?—That provides for their going to an Industrial School.

18,347. A difficulty we have been told is that, while in one sense they come under this section of the Act, they really have a certain kind of guardianship, and a certain kind of a home 'or settled place of abode'?—It looks as if that would enable a magistrate to send a child, whose parents had no settled place of abode, and who himself therefore had no settled place of abode, to an Industrial School, but then is that a method by which it is practicable to reach them? Would that not require such a great enlargement of Industrial Schools that the method would fail?

18,348. The people in Perthshire spoke as if they would be quite willing to undertake the responsibility of providing school for these children?—Yes.

18,349. But they have got all the requisite power already if the school were there?—Yes.

18,350. I suppose such a school could be adapted on the principles of the 1863 Act, where the children are not detained for such a lengthened period of time, only till they reach the age of 14?—I think so.

18,351. (By the Chairman.) That is a very important point. You might look into that and see whether that gives them power?—As far as I can form an opinion, under Section 14 of the Act of 1866, any child found wandering, and not having any home, or settled place of abode, or proper guardianship, or visible means of subsistence, can be sent by a magistrate to an Industrial School. A point of difficulty, of course, is whether these various attributes require to concur, whether they are alternatives or accumulations, and that is a point of very considerable difficulty from the manner in which the Section is expressed. In the first place, he must be found wandering. I am rather afraid that if any of those attributes could not be predicated of the child, you would not be able to send him to an Industrial School under this section, that is to say, although he was wandering, if he had a home or a settled place of abode, or proper guardianship, that you would not be able to send him under this section. I am afraid that would be the construction a court of law would put upon it.

18,352. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You would have more power under that Act than the Education Act?—Yes; it is for a special purpose.

18,353. Who would be responsible for the erection and maintenance of an Industrial School in a County?—The School Board may if they like.

18,354. An Industrial School?—They may under Section 41, the Act of 1872.

18,355. Do you think it desirable, having regard to the life, surroundings, and ideas of cleanliness among the tinker race, to ask that the children of respectable ratepayers should be compelled to mingle with them?—I do not know if there are many in Scotland, but in England there are what are called truant schools, and where the population is dense I am not sure that it might not be quite possible to have schools for children of parents who are in what might be called disadvantageous circumstances, but one is very unwilling to advocate any suggestion of that kind. One of the advantages of our system of common schools is that different classes of children mingle together, and that the children of inferior parents, and from inferior homes, mingling with the children of better homes, get an education there which is as valuable as the teacher's education.

13,356. It is not the matter of social distinction, but of cleanliness that I am concerned about?—You could not let him in with all his animalculæ on him.

13,357. And he can't be kept free from pediculi so long as the parents live as they do at present?—The position is an exceedingly difficult one. It is a question whether it would not be possible to reach them through the Public Health Act, but it is just as difficult to get hold of them for the purposes of the Public Health Act as for the purposes of the Education Act.

13,358. Would the Public Health Act cover filth in this sense?—I am doubtful if it would.

13,359. (By Dr. Farquharson.) If they were sufficiently settled down to come under the Industrial Schools Act, they would be sufficiently settled down for supervision by the medical officer of health?—Yes.

13,360. And he would naturally have power to see that these children were sent to school in a fairly sanitary condition?—Yes, but probably in neither case would they be sufficiently settled down to be under the supervision of either of the two officers.

13,361. Would not the school discipline very soon tame down the savage nature of the tramps' children?—I think it would soon bring them into line with the other children.

13,362. I suppose these children are not worse than the ordinary street arab of the city?—They are restless, and I think that is the chief difficulty with them.

13,363. Is your wish to have the begging clauses of the Burgh Police Act applied to the counties for the sake of symmetry only?—I cannot say much about grievances, but I think the proper course for legislation is to have substantially the same provisions for burghs and counties.

13,364. On symmetrical grounds purely?—Yes.

13,365. But do you think these regulations would do as much good in the counties with the scanty police forces they have?—No; but in these places where you have got scanty population, and scanty police force, you don't require these powers at all. It is on the confines of large towns, on the burgh boundaries that these difficulties arise, for which it is better that you should have uniform powers.

Dr. J. W.
Miller.

J. W. MILLER, M.D., Medical Officer to the Prison of Dundee, called in, and examined by the Chairman.

Mr. James
Badenoch
Nicolson.

27 Dec. 1894.

13,366. If you had these uniform powers could a Justice of the Peace act and commit him on the road?—No; I do not think so.

13,367. Do you think the justices should have that summary power?—I am not desirous of putting much power into the hands of the Justices of the Peace to exercise on the spur of the moment.

13,368. Have you not heard complaints from farmers and others about the way they are bullied by tramps?—No; I have not heard much.

13,369. Do you think that the argument of expense, or the argument of liberty of the subject, would be most operative on the parliamentary mind in inducing them to throw out any Bill?—I think it would differently affect different sides of the House of Commons. The liberty of the subject would probably affect the side upon which you, Sir Charles, sit, and the question of expense might affect the other.

13,370. But the liberty of the subject has been already largely interfered with, has it not, in the operations of the Industrial Schools and Reformatories?—No doubt.

13,371. Then as regards the expense, do you think that, following out Miss Stevenson's remarks, the counties would be willing to do something? Aberdeen already pays to the Reformatories; do you think the counties would be willing to meet Government half way with the expense of supporting these Industrial Schools?—Well, there is never a great disposition on the part of the counties to make voluntary assessments. I am aware that Aberdeenshire has acted handsomely in the matter you mention, but I am not aware of the other counties being willing.

13,372. But would the vagrant class not die out, and the expense would therefore be temporary?—I expect we shall have the poor, and the vagrant poor, always with us.

13,373. So that, on the whole, you don't think there is much demand for exceptional legislation for that class of children?—I doubt very much whether you would get exceptional legislation, and I doubt if you got it whether you would be able to make much use of it.

13,374. At all events we would have to make out a very strong case?—Yes. [The witness then withdrew.]

Dr. J. W.
Miller.

13,375. You are medical officer of the prison of Dundee?—Yes. I also practice in Dundee, and am President of the Dundee Branch of the British Medical Association.

13,376. In the prison do you come across many cases of weak-minded persons?—Oh, yes—not quite insane, but on the borderland of insanity.

13,377. Verging on imbecility?—Yes; weak-minded, and with no power of self-control or guidance.

13,378. Do you come across many of them?—Yes.

13,379. Give us some of them?—The cases I have in my mind are those not certifiable as lunatics, but whose deficiency in mental power or in power of self-control is such as to render hopeless any expectation that they can keep out of crime.

13,380. Have you got any typical case in prison just now?—One came in to-day—a woman, aged thirty-eight, who has been twice in the asylum. She has been arrested on a charge of theft on this occasion.

13,381. She has been with you before?—Yes; mostly for theft.

13,382. But she has been in an asylum?—Yes; twice. She is presumed not to be insane now, seeing she has been liberated, but my opinion is that she will be found to be insane again now.

13,383. Is she convicted?—No; she is untried. We have another woman now who has been in prison twelve times. Whenever she comes in she goes to bed. If she is not allowed to go to bed she lies on the floor. Neither persuasion nor threats can get her off the floor, and we are compelled to let her go to bed to prevent her contracting illness. She lies the whole time she is in prison.

13,384. What is her crime?—Drunkenness or theft, I think.

13,385. What is her object in lying on the floor?—She won't work, and says she is ill. I have examined her repeatedly, but she has no organic disease about her. She is, of course, weak, because she has been drinking for weeks. When the drink is stopped she is in a state of collapse.

13,386. When she first came under your notice she would be punished a good deal for this obstinacy?—No; she was too weak, because of want of food and excessive drinking.

13,387. I suppose you look upon it now as a sort of insanity?—She is not perhaps wholly insane, but of very weak mind.

13,388. You would not allow her to be punished, and punishment has not been tried on her even at the first?—Not to my knowledge. Of course, punishment is simply bread and water, or lower diet than her sentence implies.

13,389. You cannot give the plank bed to a woman?—No; that is never done. The extreme punishment is a dark cell, and I would not put this woman away to a dark cell. Then there is another woman, about twenty-seven years of age, who has been forty-nine times in prison. She is a poor, miserable, weak-minded creature, and, when she is not in one of her tantrums, she is fairly gentle and amenable to reason. When she has come out of one of her violent attacks I have tried to show her how

Dr. J. W.
Miller.

27 Dec. 1894.

foolish she was on her own account, but to no purpose.

13,390. What do you call her tantrums—rage?—Yes; just rage.

13,391. Does she ever attack people?—I believe she has struck the warder.

13,392. And has punishment been tried on her?—Yes; but it is useless. She has been put into a dark cell, but the only gain has been that the prison has been quiet. She has come to my house begging, and has received help.

13,393. You encouraged begging?—Yes; after she had promised to behave herself.

13,394. What is her crime?—Drunk and disorderly. There is another miserable, weak-minded woman. She is forty-six years of age, and she usually gets short sentences. She can scarcely answer the simplest questions rationally. She just stands and smiles. But it would be difficult to certify her insane.

13,395. What is her chief crime?—Drunkenness. 'Maundering and silly' is the note I have about her. Then there is a man who came in about ten days ago after a heavy bout of drunkenness. He was not ten minutes in the prison when he fell into an epileptic fit, followed by delirium tremens to the danger of his life. His sentence was only five days, and when it was up he was not in a condition to take care of himself.

13,396. Was he fit to be turned out?—No, we sent him to the Parochial Board.

13,397. You mentioned that he had an epileptic fit: the medical officer of Ayr prison classes epileptic cases, combined with drunkenness, as a very bad class of cases, and holds that epileptics are hardly to be considered responsible for their actions?—I agree with that as regards many cases.

13,398. He called it epileptic drunkenness?—Alcoholic epilepsy. Long-continued drunkenness sometimes culminates in epilepsy.

13,399. Have you had cases of the converse—of epileptic depression or the weakness of mind that is so frequently caused by or accompanies epilepsy, leading to drink, and that reacting upon the epilepsy, and the one upon the other?—Such a combination is quite likely, but I have not observed such a case.

13,400. Have you had many cases of epileptics in prison?—No; and I have no particulars of the cases we have had, as we do not put them on the sick list.

13,401. How do you treat them?—We put them in an ordinary cell, but generally associate them. It is a risk to have an epileptic patient by himself, as he might turn or fall on his face. This leads to some trouble in the prison, because a prisoner will allege that when he comes in he takes fits, in order to be associated.

13,402. How do you deal with that?—Our method is to associate him the first time, and make a memorandum as to whether he had a fit or not. Of course, that is not absolutely reliable, as a long interval might pass without a fit. But it is the state of physical illness from drink in short sentenced prisoners that gives much trouble, because frequently the whole time they are in they are not fit for prison treatment. What they need and get is something more like hospital treatment. They are discharged at the end of perhaps five days, and in a few days they are back as bad as ever. A typical case was that of a woman on a five days' sentence suffering from diseased heart. She was in a state of danger to life, and she was not expected to live to the end of her sentence. We got a cab to take her to the poorhouse at the expiry of her sentence, but she refused to go. In six or seven days she was back with us again as bad as ever, and she nearly died during another short sentence of five days. Again, at the close of her sentence, she refused to go to the poorhouse.

13,403. Where did she go?—She went to a village about five miles down the railway.

13,404. To friends?—I think so. The sentence which reaches the climax of absurdity is the twenty-four hours' sentence given on a Saturday morning. The prisoners in these cases are liberated in four or five hours. They are then probably in the paroxysm of depression after drink, and their most likely course is straight to the publichouse.

13,405. We saw in the Glasgow police cells the other night a woman who had been liberated on pledge, and was arrested later on the same night again dead drunk; you cannot deal with that under the present system of pledges and fines?—No.

13,406. How would you propose to remedy that?—I have long thought that after a number of short sentences without remedial effect, the sentence should be made a long one.

13,407. That presupposes a certain number of convictions; but, in the case of these imbeciles or weak-minded people, you say you sent them to the poorhouse, and they would not stay?—No, and there is no power to detain them. I was going to suggest that a new power should be created of compulsory detention in a poorhouse on a long or an indefinite sentence, the prisoner not to be discharged except with the approval of a board.

13,408. That might work out in the case of paupers having a settlement in a parish, or even a Scottish settlement; but you are aware that there has been a cry raised against the deportation of Irish paupers, and that machinery would not work out in regard to them; the Parochial Board in Dundee would not keep them?—But the law might be made so, that the Parochial Board, for example in Dundee, must keep such cases till the parish is found which should keep them. Such law would operate throughout the whole country. I have here another typical case which goes back nearly forty years, and I got my friends in the police, in the prison, and in the asylum, to look up the record for me. He is an Irishman. He gave his age as twenty-two in 1861, as twenty-nine in 1863, and as forty-nine in 1879, and he is now a man, I should say, between sixty and sixty-five years of age. He ran his career for nearly twenty years in the hands of the police, having been some forty times in prison for being drunk and disorderly, and offences of that sort. When not in the hands of the police, he was mostly in the poorhouse. All the time he was more or less insane, although not perhaps certifiable. At length, in 1876, he became insane, and, being in prison, he was committed to the asylum. At the expiration of his two months' sentence, he was reported to the Parochial Board. The medical officer of the Parochial Board not being satisfied that he was insane, he was discharged. In 1877 he again fell into the hands of the police, and was placed in the prison asylum. Then his following record was poorhouse; prison, four times; poorhouse; police, four times; insane; poorhouse for various periods; and in 1886 again in the hands of the police, and insane.

13,409. (By Col. McHardy.) When you say police, do you mean police and prison?—Yes. To my judgment, during the whole of these ten years there existed a state of great danger with regard to that man. He was extremely violent, and had homicidal tendencies when he got the least drink; and the last charge against him was an alleged attempt to ravish a girl in the Barrack Park in daylight. It seems ridiculous that such a man should be at liberty.

13,410. (By the Chairman.) What became of him?—He escaped from the poorhouse, and made a rush for the country. He went some twenty or thirty miles away to a farm; and he kept, as he said afterwards, clear of wires, lest they would know in Dundee where he was. That was in 1888. He was in that country place for a year or two, and then he appeared in the hands of the police in Dundee for drunkenness and assault. His last appearance was in 1894, when he got seven days. He had not been in prison for two years. When I saw him he produced a handful of silver, and said he only wanted a shilling in order to be able to pay his fine, and he said that if he could get the shilling he would go off back to where he had been, and where he had work. His fine was paid, and he went off by the first train, and he has been doing well now for the last eight months.

Dr. J. W.
Miller.

Dr. J. W.
Miller.

27 Dec. 1894.

13,411. When did he escape from the poorhouse?—That was from the lunatic wards of the poorhouse—it was, I think, at the end of 1887. He was well behaved when off whisky.

13,412. (By Dr Sutherland.) You recommend farm work for all such inebriates and weak-minded people?—Yes. But I think a great deal more could be done with our present institutions without going into a very expensive scheme, and a large new staff. The worst cases, dangerous lunatics, might be kept in the lunatic departments of the prisons; those who are undoubtedly insane but not violent or dangerous might be placed in asylums; while the harmless and weak-minded might be committed to the poorhouse for an indefinite time, and liberated only when, in the judgment of a board, they were fit to be discharged on parole.

13,413. Do you mean the lunatic asylum in Perth Prison when you speak of the worst being kept in the prison lunatic department?—Yes.

13,414. But, if you have a lunatic prisoner, don't you send him to it?—Yes; but they get out at the end of their sentence. I would send them for an indefinite period, until their condition seemed such as to admit of their being set at liberty with safety. That is the alteration which, it appears to me, ought to be made.

13,415. But you would have to alter the whole law of the land?—Yes; I am anticipating some alteration of the law as the result of this committee.

13,416. You propose to take these cases which are now dealt with—these which are discharged from prison, sent into a lunatic asylum, and put under treatment, and are discharged by the medical officer when he thinks they are recovered?—That is the very point. I do not think the discharging should be left to the discretion of any one medical officer. The discharging ought to be in the hands of a board.

13,417. What board—the Parochial Board?—No; a board of perhaps half a dozen, specially applied to deal with these cases.

13,418. That would be putting a person who had become a lunatic through drink, or who might have the misfortune to become a lunatic in prison without any drink, on a different footing from the ordinary lunatic?—I am speaking of habitual offenders and weak-minded people. Each case must be judged by itself.

13,419. You have got an exceptional number of lunatics in Dundee prison?—Yes; but I see the police deal with many others without sending them to the prison. We had ten cases in prison last year, but the police dealt with other fourteen cases.

13,420. How do they come to you?—Some of them are sent in to us as insane, merely for detention till they can be taken charge of. Others come to us waiting trial, and others come in sentenced. We had one case—a woman—on a three days' sentence. She came from a town in Fife, and she said that the people there were all conspiring against her and her children, and that a great Christian war was going on.

13,421. Why didn't the police surgeon certify her?—I don't know that the police surgeon necessarily sees these cases before they are tried.

13,422. But that woman did not think she was insane?—I was told that her neighbours knew well enough about her eccentric behaviour.

13,423. But, until you alter the legal definition of insane, you cannot send these people to an asylum?—That is so.

13,424. (By the Chairman.)—If that woman had been brought up for an offence as insane, would she not have undergone a much worse fate?—She would have had a chance of recovery by asylum treatment.

13,425. But if the offence had been a little more serious, she might have been sent to a criminal lunatic asylum to be detained during Her Majesty's pleasure?—Yes.

13,426. And her detention might have been longer than any sentence she was likely to get?—Yes; but if she had been found to be insane when she committed this assault, she might have been taken charge of by her friends or Parochial Board, and sent to an asylum for curative treatment.

Dr. J. W.
Miller.

27 Dec. 1894.

13,427. Do you find that Parochial Boards and officers are particularly anxious to charge themselves with the maintenance of lunatics that they can pass on to the Prison Commissioners?—Certainly not. If a person is certified insane by myself as Prison Medical Officer, the Parochial Board does not act on that. Their own medical officers see the person for themselves, but, as a rule, we generally agree.

13,428. Therefore you have no reason to complain of the action of the Parochial Board medical officers here?—No. Occasionally we do differ, but that is to be expected.

13,429. (By Dr Farquharson.)—Would you go as far as to hold that a man who has been in prison a certain number of times for offences, and is called a habitual offender, is of unsound mind?—No.

13,430. In the case of a man who has entirely lost his self-control in regard to drink, would you call him of unsound mind?—Well, that is a difficult question. I do not think he is without responsibility. I think he is still responsible.

13,431. You propose to shut the weak-minded people into lunatic asylums?—I would shut them up in the poorhouse, not the lunatic asylums, and I would suggest a new power to detain them in the poorhouse until some board, to be created, was satisfied that they were fit to be discharged.

13,432. These weak-minded people are very near the border-line of insanity?—Yes.

13,433. Suppose one of these weak-minded people committed a murder, would they be held fully responsible?—No, I think not. Medical men, at any rate, would go in that direction whether the judges accepted it or not.

13,434. At all events, there would be a claim set up for inclusion in the lunatic class?—Certainly; but the lawyers very often take a different view from the doctors. Some years ago a man was brought in to prison for an attempt to ravish. Another medical man and I certified him insane. When he was asked to plead, he did not understand the question. There was no malingering in the case. The plea of insanity was put aside. He had been able to go about hawking some dishes, and could give change of a shilling, and was in consequence not regarded as insane. He got five years, and was sent to Perth, where he was soon placed in the lunatic department, and afterwards to England.

13,435. Is it your experience that the habitual criminal class in Dundee is a small class?—A great many of them undergo repeated and frequent imprisonment.

13,436. You concur with Chief-Constable Dewart in that?—Yes.

13,437. If you had power to shut up these people more or less permanently, would you relieve the criminal reputation of Dundee or any other large town?—Yes. To my mind the expense of keeping these people shut up would be more than compensated for, because, as things go on at present, they are a constant cancer in society. They are contaminating the people round about them, and, if they are young, they are procreating their kind, and the children have little chance of growing up different from their parents.

13,438. Like contagious disease, you would stamp it out?—Yes.

13,439. (By Dr Sutherland.)—Do you believe in eighteen months in a separate cell in prison as a method of curing a habitual offender or a habitual drunkard?—Not very much. To a certain extent it is in the direction of cure, because he cannot get the stimulant.

13,440. But what is the physical or mental effect, or both, produced by such a lengthened period of separate confinement?—We do not have prisoners long enough in Dundee to enable me to speak to the effect, but my impression is that it would be bad.

13,441. It is a complete departure from the normal condition of life?—Certainly.

Dr. J. W.
Miller.

27 Dec. 1894.

13,442. And, when they leave this confinement, they are suddenly thrown among their associates?—Quite so.

13,443. You propose to classify these—some for the poorhouses, some for the asylums, and some for the farmhouses?—Yes, and some for lunatic departments of prisons.

13,444. That is to say, you are of opinion that outdoor, healthy work and exercise is much more likely to cure the mental and physical infirmities caused by a long course of drunkenness?—Yes.

13,445. (By Col. M^r Hardy.)—I would like to hear your general scheme. You were to utilise some portion of the criminal lunatic asylums of prisons—you would have the semi-lunatic drinkers put in there?—I was referring to the habitual offenders.

13,446. But they are not all insane, are they?—Oh, no.

13,447. They are not all weak-minded?—No.

13,448. Then you would put some of them—those who were weak-minded—into some special department or lunatic asylum?—Also to the poorhouse.

13,449. Would you go on to fill up your general scheme of treating the habitual offender?—A very large number of them would be consigned to the poorhouse for an indefinite period, to be liberated, as I suggested before, on the judgment of a board.

13,450. Medical men?—No; certainly not. One or two might be medical men. Others, again, would be in the asylum as persons of unsound mind. Dangerous or violent insane persons I would have in the lunatic department of a prison.

13,451. (By Dr Sutherland.) That, of course, would involve a new definition of insanity. These people don't fulfil the requirements of the lunacy certificate at present?—Oh, no; the latter do fulfil the requirements of the existing form of certificate.

13,452. (By Col. M^r Hardy.) The great bulk of them, I understand, you would send to the poorhouse?—Yes.

13,453. How long would you propose to keep them there?—I could not answer that right off—a year or two years, or an indefinite period, such as is practised in America.

13,454. There is no precedent in this country for an indeterminate sentence?—No; but there is in Germany and in America.

13,455. What would be your minimum?—A year at least.

13,456. Have you seen any cases of habitual drunkards cured as the result of continued deprivation of liquor?—Yes, I have; one or two complete cures.

13,457. And you think there might be a considerable portion of these people recovered under some system of treatment?—Yes.

13,458. Work would be an important feature?—Yes; and especially outdoor work.

13,459. Both for men and women?—Yes.

13,460. What outdoor work could women do?—Farm work, dairy work. On this subject I shall give you the opinion of the Dundee Branch of the British Medical Association. In view of this inquiry, we held a meeting, and drew up the following:—

6th December 1894.

'To the Honourable the Members of the Commission on Habitual Offenders, the Council of the Dundee and District Branch of the British Medical Association desire to submit the following resolutions, which they have unanimously agreed to:—

'1. That the present procedure for the detention of Habitual Drunkards is ineffectual, inasmuch as it requires the consent of the patient; and there is urgent need for amendment of the law, so that this consent shall not be necessary.

'2. That, considering the failure of repeated short sentences, either as punitive or reformatory, for habitual offenders, the advisability of imposing a long term of detention, after a certain number of convictions, should be considered; and also the system of the indefinite sentence as adopted in several of the American States.

'We desire to convey these resolutions to you by J. W. Miller, M.D., the President of this Branch of the British Medical Association.

'I am, your obedient servant,

'R. C. BURST, M.D.,
'Hon. Sec.'

Rev. D. M. ROSS, M.A., Dundee, called in and examined.

Rev. D. M.
Ross.

13,461. (By the Chairman.) You represent the Free Church Presbytery of Dundee, and, I believe, you have got some facts about the number of habitual drunkards at present known to ministers in their pastoral work?—Yes.

13,462. Please state the result?—Returns were sent in by, I think, 28 ministers in the presbytery; that is, the whole of the ministers, with the exception of one—and the number of habitual drunkards returned is 87.

13,463. And the class to which they belong?—Of these 87, nine belong to the middle class, or at least a class above the working class; 78 belong to the poorer class, those who would not be able to provide for the maintenance of inebriates on their own part.

13,464. These, I suppose, are non-criminal; they are not the drunks of the Police Court?—I imagine they are almost entirely non-criminal.

13,465. Seldom coming within the cognisance of the police?—Yes.

13,466. Would you state the population represented by this return?—It is somewhat indefinite, but I think, perhaps, 40,000 might represent the population. But that is very much a matter of guess work.

13,467. And what is your calculation as to the proportion of the non-criminal population?—The calculation is that in Dundee there may be 320 such persons. Then for the burgh population of Scotland, on the same basis, there would be 4000.

13,468. For the burgh population?—This is, a population of two millions.

13,469. Why do you take the burgh separate from the county? Is it that you can only extend the comparison of Dundee to the burgh population?—Yes; and on the understanding that there are perhaps fewer habitual drunkards in the county.

13,470. And you could not argue from the case of Dundee to the case of the counties?—No.

13,471. Now, the majority of these people are of a class too poor to avail themselves of the present remedies; do you think they could pay for the maintenance of their friends in retreats however cheap?—In regard to 90 per cent., I think not.

13,472. How would you arrange about the finances?—It seems to me that the only way in which a retreat would be of any use to 90 per cent. of these persons would be if they were maintained by the State.

13,473. Of course, the State—the Chancellor of the Exchequer is always very hard-hearted, and he has got a great number of appeals to him for money; but, if you were to ask him to maintain three or four dozen habitual drunkards at the cost of the State, he would probably turn you away with a very short answer?—Yes.

13,474. Then you are aware of retreats in Scotland that are very cheap. There is one at Peebles, I think, 7s. a week—1s. a day; that would be greatly beyond the means of the people you have referred to?—Well, I have a case here where even a small sum like that would probably be beyond the power of the persons.

13,475. Of course, you are in favour of compulsory powers in consigning to retreats?—Yes; every answer returned has signified approval of compulsory detention.

Rev. D. M.
Ross.
27 Dec. 1894.

13,476. I suppose you do not go into the details of the process in connection with the answers?—No; we considered that was rather for lawyers and medical men than for ministers.

13,477. Well, could you now tell us about the case of the maintenance?—Well, this is a case which came under my own observation quite lately. The wife of a mechanic came to me after a drinking bout, during which she had left her husband's house for ten days. She wanted to know if there was any home to which she could go to get over the drinking habit. I made inquiries, and tried to get her into Paton's Lane Home, Dundee. Her husband was willing that she should go, but the charge of 10s was too much for him. Last time I was in the house, the woman had got drunk, and stripped the house. That was a case of a woman who would have gone into a retreat voluntarily had the difficulty of maintenance been got over.

13,478. But we have come across habitual drunkards in retreats—one a case in the Magdalene Asylum in Glasgow, a woman sent there by her husband; but, are you aware that in Edinburgh Queensberry House is much smaller than 10s. a week—I think it is 4s. 6d. a week?—That might be within the power of a considerable number of the habitual drunkards given in this return.

13,479. But, of course, there are no powers of compulsorily detaining them if they were in this retreat?—In Paton's Lane Home?

13,480. In Paton's or Queensberry House; do you think she would have stayed in if she had got in?—Yes.

13,481. Had you known her?—Yes. I had known her for two or three years before.

13,482. Was she a respectable sort of woman when not drunk?—Yes, but she had bouts of two or three months' drunkenness.

13,483. Do you think philanthropic effort should be brought about to assist poor people in that condition?—If a new philanthropic society were started I should think there might be sufficient support, but there does not seem to be any philanthropic society in existence at present which could undertake such cases. It would mean the starting of a new society, I should think.

13,484. Well, there is a society in England got up for the purpose of running a home on partly philanthropic lines?—Yes. The answers given by my co-Presbyters say this, that if the State undertook the responsibility of committing persons against their will to such a retreat, that the State ought to bear the maintenance.

13,485. Well, that would not hold in the case of lunatics?—The State commits lunatics to an asylum, but the friends, so far as they are able, bear the cost?—Well, of course, when I speak of maintenance by the State, that applies only to cases where the friends could not help. The returns have all contemplated that the friends should bear as much of the cost as they are able.

13,486. Did you elicit any view from your brethren as to how the initiative was to be taken in these compulsory committals?—Yes. They suggested that it might be on the initiative of the relatives or friends, and that in either case an outside opinion should be got lest there should be any malice. Probably the answers were based upon the recommendation of the Commission of 1892, in which the words are given there—'On the application of their relatives or friends, or other persons interested in their welfare.'

13,487. (By Dr Sutherland.) Would that include neighbours?—Oh, yes; 'other persons.'

13,488. (By the Chairman.) There are a number of points I do not ask you, because we have had them so frequently before us from others?—I quite understand.

13,489. From the schedule you sent out, I see the first matter is that, 'power of detention might have a wholesome effect in deterring drunkards from reaching the state of habitual drunkenness'?—That is evident.

13,490. The next to adopt measures whereby drink should not be supplied; did that refer to inhibited drunkards being supplied by publicans, or did it refer to temperance legislation?—Both. That the present law should be more strictly applied, and that any future legislation on this point should be more particularly noticed. A most notorious drunkard in Dundee, who was once in my own congregation, stated to me that he had never been refused drink.

13,491. There never has been any attempt on the part of any section of public, either in connection with churches or temperance societies, to put into effect the existing law against supplying liquor to drunken persons?—It so happens that within the last two or three years individuals have spoken on the subject, but no special action has been taken.

13,492. Temperance societies have never sent men to watch places and get convictions?—No.

13,493. (By Dr Farquharson.) Did the man mean he never was refused drink when in a state of drunkenness?—That was what he meant; but, of course, I cannot vouch for the veracity of the man.

13,494. (By the Chairman.) Then the necessity of stricter legislation to prevent persons from reaching a state of habitual drunkenness?—That, I believe, refers to temperance legislation.

13,495. In the individual statements of points not sent up in the schedule, is there anything noteworthy beyond what the letter mentioned?—No.

13,496. (By Col. M'Hardy.) I did not gather if you referred to the criminal classes?—No. The notice that was sent to me by Dr Sutherland was to the effect that the information wanted from the Presbyteries was information regarding the habitual drunkards of the poorer class not coming under the cognisance of the police.

13,497. You have thought a good deal about the subject? Have you thought about these habitual offenders who come under the cognisance of the police?—Well, I have had several conversations with the Chief Constable of Dundee and others interested in the question, and I very much sympathise with the desire of several of our citizens in Dundee that something should be done to keep them in detention longer than is at present the case.

13,498. You think that society, so far as you have learned, is prepared for some more stringent measures being used in order to try the effect of reformation on these people?—Every person who is acquainted with the statistics of the police-court, I have come across, has expressed the opinion that the present method of short sentences has little effect in reforming the people.

13,499. And they are prepared for stronger measures?—I think so.

13,500. (By Miss Stevenson.) Of the numbers you gave us as returned by the ministers to whom these schedules were sent out, can you tell us what proportion were women and what proportion were men?—I did not ask in the returns that ministers should state the sex. In some cases they have stated that, but the figures do not supply that information over all the returns.

13,501. In your own experience of those with whom you have come in contact, have the greater number been men or women?—I should think they are pretty equally divided.

13,502. You do not think there is a preponderance?—There is not a preponderance of men; there may be of women.

13,503. On the whole, you think they are more given to habitual drunkenness?—Yes, but I have no figures.

13,504. Have you ever considered what could be done in the case of respectable workmen who only get drunk periodically, say on pay nights, and yet manage to keep their family in comfort?—That refers to a very large class of persons in Dundee, but these persons have not been under our review in this schedule. The number of working men who are in the habit of getting drunk on Saturday, and especially on Trade

- Rev. D. M. Ross.*
27 Dec. 1894. Holidays, is very great. I was going to say that I have taken occasion, within the last few years, to ask the men who have been in the habit of going to the public-house regularly, who have given over the habit, I have been in the habit of asking their experience, and, from what they told me, we have got thousands of working men in Dundee who are in the habit of getting the worse of drink occasionally on Saturday.
- 13,505. Then, is it within your experience at all that the class of habitual drunkards to which your return refers is recruited from this source of what you might term respectable inebriates?—I think they must begin in that way.
- 13,506. You have no information to show that a man could go on very long with this being habitually drunk every fortnight without becoming deteriorated, and becoming habitually intemperate?—I think there is a very large number of men in Dundee who get the worse of drink periodically, and never become habitual drunkards.
- 13,507. (By Dr Farquharson.) Do you think it would do a man's circumstances very much harm to get drunk once a fortnight, if he restricted it to that period?—Well, I happen to know a good many cases where people do get drunk once a fortnight, or once a week, and who do not go further. Many of them do, but many do not.
- 13,508. Do they go to the public-house, and get drunk there, and go home afterwards?—Yes.
- 13,509. Do many of these men lay in a bottle of whisky, and drink it quietly at home?—As far as my experience goes, the most of it is purchased in the public-house.
- 13,510. Is it a temptation in the public-house?—In the first place, they go to the public-house, not for the sake of the drink, but for the sake of the social attractions, and the habit which I suppose exists in every large town to stand a glass all round. Six or eight men stand a glass all round. From what men have told me, that is the beginning of a great deal of drunkenness.
- 13,511. Do many of these men have the faculty, which many old soldiers have, of pulling themselves together to get home without attracting notice, and tumble into bed drunk?—I am afraid I cannot answer that. Saturday night is the night when most of the drunkenness is produced in Dundee, and I am very seldom abroad on that night.
- 13,512. (By Dr Sutherland.) You suggest that philanthropy might do something towards maintaining these people in Dundee, now studded with charities and hospitals? Are the funds of these institutions languishing?—I think not.
- 13,513. That is more than can be said with regard to Glasgow, and Edinburgh, and English cities?—Well, in regard to the hospital, there has always been plenty of money. Of course, there are many other institutions which we should like to see better provided for.
- 13,514. Would you not have to charge the church with the maintenance of such people?—The difficulty with regard to the church taking up any duty of this kind is, that those who are habitual drunkards are for the most part away from church influence. They are looked after by the church, but they often have been for years, perhaps, separated from the fellowship of the church and membership of the congregation, and, in consequence, the members know little about them. The ministers know them, but the people who might do something for them are out of touch with them. The church would perhaps see it done rather than it should not be done at all.
- 13,515. Supposing the drunkard is to be confined, who would be the best party to decide? Do you think the Sheriff is the proper authority?—I am afraid that is a question on which I have no special information, and I would rather not express my opinion, as not being worth anything on such a point.
- 13,516. (By the Chairman.) One point I omitted. As the result of your correspondence with the Presbytery, you mentioned among the conditions of detention that there is a general agreement that patients should have some employment, and that there should be legal safeguards included. Do you mean employment should be in the retreats?—Yes.
- 13,517. Can you give us any hint as to the employment that could be found for males, for instance, confined to such places?—I have not thought of that.
- [The witness then withdrew.]

[ADJOURNED.]

TWENTY-FIFTH DAY.

Dundee, Friday 28th December 1894.

Present:

Sir CHARLES CAMERON, Bart., M.P., Chairman.
Col. A. B. McHARDY, R.E.
Dr FARQUHARSON, M.P.

Dr J. F. SUTHERLAND.
Miss FLORA C. STEVENSON.

ALEXANDER GUTHRIE, of Horsewater Wynd, off Guthrie Street, Dundee, called in and examined by the Chairman.

Alexander Guthrie.

Alexander Guthrie.

28 Dec. 1894.

28 Dec. 1894.

13,518. You are at present on ticket-of-leave?—It is twelve years since I was liberated, and I have been in employment, with various employers, for periods ranging from three years downwards, and I have had occasion lately to make application to the Charity Organisation Society, but it appears to me that that body is indifferent, more especially as far as the welfare of any individual is concerned.

13,519. The Charity Organisation Society is a perfectly voluntary body, without any Government aid, or any status, and, therefore, I do not think we can deal with any complaint against that society; but there is the Prisoners' Aid Society—it is assisted by Government?—Well, I made application to that society also. I have a wife and family dependent upon me, and I got a donation of 1s. 3d. from the society.

13,520. What were you in for?—It was for going into a bank office at Ellon in Aberdeenshire. I was in financial difficulties at the time.

13,521. What were you?—Simply a labourer.

13,522. And you went into this bank. What was the charge against you?—A charge of theft.

13,523. And your sentence was?—Five years.

Alexander Guthrie.

28 Dec. 1894.

13,524. And the date of your sentence?—1880.
 13,525. What establishments were you in?—First in Wormwood Scrubbs, and then in Chatham.
 13,526. When did you get out on license?—31st July 1884, I was dismissed from Chatham.
 13,527. And the license extended for how long?—It expired, I think, in April 1885.
 13,528. What was your experience when on license? Had you any complaint against the police?—When I was liberated the first employment I had was by the Charity Organisation Society in Aberdeen. I got employment afterwards at the making of a new reservoir, and the first week I was in that employment the Cults policeman made his appearance in the works, and suggested to the manager that I was an ex-convict. 'Well,' said the manager, 'have you got anything to say against him? You have no right to state this. Unless there is anything against him, he will be here as long as the job lasts.' I was there one year and nine months. I don't think that was fair of the policeman.
 13,529. The authorities do their best to prevent anything of that sort; so let us pass on to the next. You did not lose the job; you worked on there for a year and nine months?—Yes.
 13,530. After that job, what did you do?—I was employed in the shipbuilding trade three years in Aberdeen. The first two years I was disturbed all along the line. If anything occurred in the district—such as a house-breaking—the police were on my track. I had a great deal of difficulty to contend against, owing to policemen coming to my house at night, and other disturbances—which I don't think was fair.
 13,531. After your license was over, had they any right to do that?—Yes.
 13,532. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Was there any police supervision in your sentence?—Yes, seven years.
 13,533. (By the Chairman.) Of course, you were sentenced to police supervision, and were liable to it; I don't see how you could get out of it?—Well, it is a hardship.
 13,534. You are still under police supervision?—No; I am clear of that.
 13,535. You had three years' work in a ship-yard—that brings you down to 1889. You had still three years' police supervision. What did you do after the shipbuilding?—I have various credentials here from various employers by whom I have been employed. Since 1892, in fact, I cannot say I have been in steady employment. I have been working only a few months now and again. The last employment I have had at the present time was at the harvest. Work now is so dull that it is impossible to get it.
 13,536. How have you been living?—Well, the wife got work the other day; but it is not fair that the wife should be working for the man. I believe that the majority of working men here are kept by their wives working in the factories. I made application to the Charity Organisation Society; but, as we had 6s. or 8s. a week coming into the family, they said that was sufficient.
 13,537. The Charity Organisation Society is a philanthropic society of voluntary persons, and it is out of their own pockets that they give help. We have nothing to do with them. They could say to us simply, 'We won't contribute.' You say you got assistance from the Prisoners' Aid Society?—Yes, I got at the rate of 1s. 3d. a week to keep three of us.
 13,538. But they had no right to give you that. Any help that they give you is outside any connection they have with Government?—Then what would be the best steps for an individual who happened to be out of employment, and destitute, and could not see his way to get the necessities of life?
 13,539. I am very glad to have your advice on the subject, and we have not had it. Therefore we would like you to tell us what you would wish to be done?—There are various proposals. As far as I see, the only way is for the Government to take steps to give work to people on the land. I am a farm labourer, not with Chamberlain's three acres and a cow, but even if I could get work on a farm. I was brought up on a farm, and my parents came to the town.

13,540. How old are you?—I am 35.
 13,541. Were you ever in the hands of the police before?—No.

13,542. Not even for drunkenness?—No; I am a total abstainer.

13,543. Have you ever been in the hands of the police since?—No.

13,544. Not for anything whatever?—No.

13,545. (By Col. M'Hardy.) I don't know why you got police supervision for stealing from the bank, if you had no crime before that?—I could give an explanation of it. When we were living in Peterhead there were four or five of us, young boys, who got into trouble about pigeons, and that was the matter that was brought against me.

13,546. (By the Chairman.) You did not tell us that?—It was a mistake that I did not tell you. That was the reason I got police supervision.

13,547. Then you cannot complain of police supervision. That was part of your sentence, and the judge awarded it in consequence of this state of things disclosed to him. So you have been doing nothing but odd jobs for how long?—Since I left the harvest I have not been employed more than four weeks, or thereabout. I have had to depend upon my relations for support; but they are all poor, and cannot support me continuously.

13,548. What are they?—Just working people. It is more especially the wife's relations I have had to depend upon.

13,549. Talking about the Charity Organisation Society—in Glasgow they have a place where they will take any man and give him work either at wood-chopping or stone-breaking, and so on. Would you be willing to take that employment, for instance?—Yes, that was what I was working at in Aberdeen.

13,550. What?—Wood-chopping. I see the wood-chopping is stopped now; but that would be better than doling out a man perhaps 2s. a week.

13,551. But you cannot go to people and say, 'You must give money for this particular object.' You must allow them to help you in their own way?—Well, of course, when it is voluntary subscription they have a right to do as they like; but it is not necessary. In a thoroughly just state of society every individual ought to be employed.

13,552. That is true, and what I would like to see. Would you like if we could say to you—'Well, you want employment; we can give you employment at hard work for a couple of years.' Would you take that?—In reference to hard work—I was working at the extension of the Esplanade before harvest, in all the bad weather.

13,553. How many holidays did you take?—There were no holidays during that time.

13,554. Did you do all the work you could do?—Yes, for three months.

13,555. You have nothing to complain of in the way of police supervision now, and you seem to have been worse off since the police supervision ceased?—Well, that depended greatly on the amount of work that has been going. If it had been the reverse, I very likely would have been worse.

13,556. We were told there was extra work here in Dundee this year; that trade, or in certain branches of labour, work was exceptionally brisk. That was given to us as an explanation of the extraordinary increase in the number of drunks. You say you are a teetotaler—do you belong to any of their societies?—Not any local organisation, because I can see my way to keep myself clear without joining any body so far as pledging is concerned. But I advocate it on every opportunity I have.

13,557. But you are aware that the Good Templars have lodges, and that they assist their fellows, try to keep them straight, and get them into work, and so on. Why have you never tried that?—It is quite obvious that no influence of individuals could be of use. I have been at different persons of influence, and they have failed to get me work, simply because an employer will not take on a man unless he has work for him.

13,558. Have you any church connection?—Well, no; I belonged to the Established Church, but not now.

13,559. In that way you have out yourself adrift from another organisation that might have helped you?—Well, it would have been hypocrisy on my part to have connected myself with them.

13,560. How many children have you?—Three altogether. One up to maturity is away to farming this last half-year.

13,561. How old is he?—16; the other is 13 and the other 11.

13,562. We cannot alter the state of society, but, if you could give us any practical suggestion, we should be happy to have it, and consider it?—I do not know that I could suggest anything. I know that the Government of this country should take active means to provide employment for those who are out of work. We know that private employers are not doing anything for the benefit of the labourers. The more unemployed there are going about, the better it is for them, as they can take better advantage of them. I do not believe they will try to do anything.

13,563. Have you not tried any of them?—Well, I am a hammerman.

13,564. Have you never gone among smiths to get work?—There are about 70 or 80 idle among 222 in Dundee already.

13,565. Have you been working at your trade since you came out of prison?—I was not a hammerman before that. It is only within the last two or three years that I have become a hammerman.

13,566. Are you a member of the Society?—I was a member, but, owing to my being out of employment, I am out of membership.

13,567. Have you not got any assistance from them?—No; they have only a strike fund. They have no idle benefit.

13,568. I see from your credentials—Aberdeen, 'May 30. From James M'Hardy, two years in his 'employment. Steady, honest, and sober'?—I started work here two days after I came from Aberdeen. I was five years in steady employment; only these two days out of work between Aberdeen and Dundee.

13,569. What wages are you earning in the shipyard?—16s. a week. I was also six months at Craigie Quarry.

13,570. (By Dr Sutherland.)—How many months had you of separate confinement?—Nine months.

13,571. How did you like that?—I would rather have been in a public work, working outside.

13,572. Were you allowed to speak much in separate confinement?—The rules are, that you are not to speak, but generally you cannot keep people's tongues quiet altogether, and we spoke when we got the opportunity.

13,573. How would you have liked a second nine months' separate confinement?—I would have been indifferent to it, but I believe there are others who might not settle themselves in separate confinement, and they would be miserable.

13,574. You don't think it would affect your health?—Yes, I think the close confinement would.

13,575. How?—In the matter of exercise. When a person cannot get enough exercise, I know it is injurious to him.

13,576. (By the Chairman.) What wage is your wife making?—She started only to-day. Her wage will be about 8s. 6d. per week. [The witness then withdrew.]

Dr. Rorie.

JAMES RORIE, M.D., Physician Superintendent Royal Lunatic Asylum, Dundee, called in and examined.

Dr. Rorie.

13,577. (By the Chairman.) You are the Physician Superintendent of Dundee Royal Lunatic Asylum?—Yes.

13,578. And you have occupied that position for many years?—35 years.

13,579. And, during that time, you have had to deal with private as well as pauper cases, and have had a good deal to do with cases arising from inebriety?—Yes. The asylum just now has about 420 patients altogether, and between 80 and 90 are private patients, paying various rates of board.

13,580. What percentage of the total would you say was due to drink?—The cases of insanity actually resulting from drink will be about 16 to 18 per cent. That is, insanity as the result of drink in one way or other. Of course, I do not mean cases of dipsomania.

13,581. Have you received many voluntary cases?—Not many, but we have had several cases.

13,582. I suppose many of these have been drink cases?—Several of these have been cases of pure dipsomania—persons who, beyond the loss of ability to control themselves, have shown no other evidence of insanity.

13,583. We have had a good number of gentlemen connected with asylums, and they have all told us that they consider the asylums, or most of them, to be very unsuitable for these cases?—All my experience is that ordinary lunatic asylums are not good places for these cases. We get individuals sometimes as voluntary patients, unable to restrain their desire for alcohol, and sometimes they come at the earnest solicitation of their friends under certificate as morbid cases.

13,584. Do you draw the line of dipsomania at a case where the craving for drink is an insanity, or the drink habit amounts to an insanity; that is, where the person cannot see drink but he or she will get at it by hook or crook?—I consider dipsomania is a form of moral insanity, where the desire for intoxicants is the only symptom—I mean the only mental symptom—because, in all cases of dipsomania, during the paroxysm, there are other physical symptoms present.

13,585. Do you think that restriction from drink for, say, twelve or eighteen months, would cure many of these cases?—Every case would require to be judged very much on its own merits. In well-developed cases of dipsomania, detention would require to be at least for twelve months.

13,586. I see you would like some committal on the application of friends, and under safeguard from the sheriff?—My opinion is that the arrangements for the detention of inebriates should be very much the same as exists in regard to the ordinary insane. That there should be public institutions, and that there might be private houses as well, and also houses for the admission of single patients under special license.

13,587. Who would pay for the public institutions?—They would require to be provided for by the public rates. That is the great difficulty.

13,587A. Do you think that Dundee would entertain or acquiesce in the proposition of rates for the maintenance of an inebriate asylum?—It is just a question how far it might be shown that there would be a saving in these cases which otherwise would be lodged in prison.

13,588. The cases that come into your hand are not the quasi-criminal kind?—No, they are private patients, chiefly paying from £40 to £80 a year.

13,589. Have you ever sent cases to other places, such as, for instance, to Peeblesshire?—I have been applied to for information by medical practitioners in regard to such places, and clergymen sometimes offer to take charge of inebriates, but I never have had occasion to send them there.

13,590. Among your pauper lunatics, have you many who have been in prison?—A good many have been taken charge of by the police and placed in the police office previous to admission, and I find that about one-tenth of the pauper patients recently admitted have been sent at the instance of the Fiscal,

- Dr. Rorie.*
28 Dec. 1894.
- but these are, many of them, cases which should have been taken charge of by their friends.
- 13,591. We find in the prisons certain people who have been in and out of lunatic asylums. Their course has been, perhaps, poorhouse, lunatic asylum, prison, and so on. Have you had many of these?—Yes, and several of these I might mention in particular. There is one very prominent case to my mind—a man who was admitted seven times. He was just one of these cases. He was a sort of half imbecile. His name was W. H. From 1857 to 1871 he was admitted seven times—for housebreaking, was dangerous and troublesome, frequently made his escape and suffered from maniacal excitement. Another case was P. S., who had been admitted five times between the years 1876 and 1887. This is a case that has already, I presume, been brought under your notice by Dr Miller. He was harmless so long as he was in the asylum, was discharged as harmless, and then he appeared to get dangerous when he was at liberty. He generally landed in the hands of the police, and gravitated between the prison and the asylum. Then there are a number of others, who belong to what may be termed the vicious criminal classes, and they are extremely troublesome cases.
- 13,592. I want to ask you this point. Would you suggest very long detention; and, if so, would the detention be in a lunatic asylum or in the prisons?—My opinion is, that the class of habitual offenders, and also the vicious class of insane—those who are known to the police—should be in a special institution.
- 13,593. Take the vicious insane, and the insane offenders, would you have them in a criminal lunatic asylum, or would you have them dealt with by prolonged detention in the pauper lunatic asylums?—I would rather have them in a special lunatic asylum, the same as Broadmoor.
- 13,594. To Perth Prison?—The lunatic wards of Perth Penitentiary are only for those who have been sentenced by the Court.
- 13,595. The complaint against your pauper lunatic asylums by the prison authorities is that they get a prisoner insane, then he is sent to the lunatic asylum, and is discharged, and he goes out and re-commits the offence, and the same process is gone through, and that you don't exercise your powers of detention, and that the Parochial Board, not wishing to be at the expense of keeping him, dismisses him when he is really a lunatic pauper?—Well, as to the discharge of patients, we are obliged to discharge them as soon as they have recovered their reason.
- 13,596. But you are obliged to be satisfied that he has really recovered, and that there is no danger of immediate relapse?—Yes; that he has ceased to be dangerous to himself or to the public in ordinary cases.
- 13,597. Take this case you have mentioned—that is, harmless in confinement and dangerous when he gets out?—He was sent in for assault, then put into the lunatic asylum wards, and afterwards transferred to the lunatic wards of the poorhouse. My opinion has always been that there is too great a proneness on the part of the parochial authorities to discharge persons from the lunatic wards of poorhouses.
- 13,598. Exactly. Here is a man who is liberated, and has committed the same offence again. Could you not have kept this case in the asylum, instead of putting him to the lunatic wards?—No; any such lunatics for the poorhouse are selected by the poorhouse officials, of course with our approval. There was nothing against this man while with us to show that he was a dangerous patient and required special detention in the asylum.
- 13,599. You, then, who are a neutral party, have told us a very important point, namely, that you think there is too great a laxity, or too great a proneness, on the part of the parochial authorities to allow these cases to leave the lunatic wards?—Yes.
- 13,600. Do you think that that would extend to cases of parochial boards that have asylums of their own, such as, for instance, Woodilee Asylum?—I pre-
- sume it would extend in the same way to that class of cases. In the parochial asylums for the reception of the insane poor there is a tendency to discharge the patients earlier than from the ordinary county asylums.
- 13,601. Do you think any method could be devised requiring the intervention of the sheriff before the discharge, the same as in the case of the committal of a lunatic?—I think that is a question more for the General Board of Lunacy. They encourage the discharge of these patients from the lunatic wards of poorhouses, to be boarded out; and they encourage these patients being looked after as unrecovered lunatics.
- 13,602. But those are silly patients, boarded out by the Lunacy Board?—Yes; and still on the Lunacy Board registers.
- 13,603. (By Dr Farquharson.) Are you sanguine that the prolonged detention of dipsomaniacs in institutions would be curative?—I think the benefit to be obtained from long detention is rather over-estimated. No doubt there are cases where it would have a beneficial effect, but I believe it will be found that the number of cases will not be so great as expected. Prolonged detention might cure in some cases for a time, but not permanently.
- 13,604. (By the Chairman.) Supposing this man, who was harmless when he was in the asylum, but dangerous when out, had been a paying patient, paying forty or fifty pounds a year, so that any monetary inducement to get rid of him would be out of the question, would you have discharged him when the parochial boards did so?—It would have made no difference.
- 13,605. But, if he had been in your hands, paying for his support, would you have thought him a fit case to discharge, or would you say, 'I have discharged you before, and you have been dangerous, and I cannot certify that you will not be dangerous again, and I cannot discharge you now?'—The probability is, that if he had been sent in by his friends, and then paying, he would have been sent out on probation, and then the question of his return to the asylum, or his discharge, would have depended on how he would have conducted himself during the twenty-eight days of probation.
- 13,606. Is there any system of probation in the case of pauper lunatics?—Yes; it extends to them also.
- 13,607. When this man was discharged from the pauper wards of the lunatic asylum, was he discharged on probation or right off?—I could not say with certainty. My impression is that he had been boarded out—taken from the asylum to the lunatic wards of the poorhouse, and from that had been boarded out; that is to say, as a silly patient.
- 13,608. And that is practically probation?—Not exactly probation. He is still a lunatic boarded out.
- 13,609. But he must be cured?—Or struck off the register in some way.
- 13,610. How can he be struck off the register?—He might be discharged, allowed to leave the poorhouse on probation, and then fall off the register.
- 13,611. But you cannot tell us, as a matter of fact, whether his friends had taken him out?—No.
- 13,612. (By Dr Farquharson.) Have you any faith in drink cures?—I find administration of bitter tonics very beneficial.
- 13,613. They diminish the crave?—They appear to take the place of alcohol, and satisfy the craving. In one private case, in particular, of dipsomania, I gave tincture of calumba with marked benefit. The patient came backwards and forwards for eighteen months to get his bottle of medicine replenished, and he kept quite well.
- 13,614. (By Dr Sutherland.) In speaking of dipsomania as moral insanity, do you come across cases where to that is super-added other phases of insanity directly traceable to alcohol?—In true cases of dipsomania you very seldom find the simple craving for drink alone.
- 13,615. You seem to have received a considerable number of prisoners of this drunken class; do you consider them in greater number as suffering from moral insanity?—Well, I should say sixteen or eighteen per cent. of the insanity admitted from the pauper class where the drink may be traced is that class of insanity, but it is not dipsomania, but one of the ordinary forms of insanity, such as acute mania.

Dr. Roric.
28 Dec. 1894.

13,616. What percentage of insanity in your asylum is directly traceable to alcohol?—About sixteen or eighteen per cent. perhaps, but it is difficult to say, because you sometimes find that the tendency to intemperance is the result of insanity.

13,617. Have you any experience of the results obtained in inebriate homes in America and other countries?—Not beyond what I have read of them.

13,618. Are you hopeful of the effects of long detention?—I think that detention for twelve months would possibly be the shortest period in a confirmed case from which benefit might be expected; but I think that, although prolonged detention might cure a certain proportion of these cases, there is more expected from it than would be found to result from actual experience.

13,619. I understand you are opposed to mixing habitual drunkards with the insane?—Yes; I think the lunatic asylum is not a suitable place for the treatment of inebriates.

13,620. Do you know anything about the Tyson cure?—I have read about it but have had no actual experience of it.

13,621. Have you any opinion about it?—No; I have no opinion to give on it. I have found the administration of ordinary bitter tonics very useful, and I have never found the slightest bad results from complete stoppage of the drink at once, even in very bad cases.

13,622. The only thing approaching a cure that you know about is simply a tonic?—Simply a bitter tonic.

13,623. (By Miss Stevenson.) What is your reason for saying that there should be a special institution for the people you describe as making the round between the prison, the asylum, and the poorhouse?—When I speak of a special institution I refer to special forms of establishments for the treatment of inebriates, apart altogether from the asylums.

13,624. Then the insanity of these people, I take it, you attribute to inebriety?—They are insane in this sense of the term, that their moral faculties are perverted—what we call a form of moral insanity—and the perversion assumes the form of a strong desire for alcoholic liquors.

13,625. Would you be against their being detained in the lunatic wards in the poorhouse if the authorities had the powers?—There would be the same objection as in the ordinary asylum.

13,626. What are the objections?—In the first place, they are too sane to be detained in an institution for the insane. They feel out of place and out of keeping with the institution. Then, as a rule, they are very restless and discontented during the time they are confined, and they very often, by insubordination, give rise to a deal of trouble in the administration and management of the place.

13,627. Then, do you think that that class of inebriates who are really insane, and can be certified as insane, could be put into an institution along with those who are not insane? Would there not be the same objection to having these insane patients in an institution among other people who could not be certified as insane?—If there were an institution established for the treatment of inebriates, I would have that institution very much on the same principle as the asylums—that there should be provision made for the admission of patients voluntarily, and for patients requiring to be sent on the certificate of two medical gentlemen and the sheriff's order. There could be no objection to them being associated. My reason for suggesting the continuance of the voluntary provision would be that a larger number of inebriates might take advantage of it, when they knew that there was a considerable danger of being sent to the institution at the instance of the sheriff. Dr. Roric.

13,628. (By Col. M'Hardy.) To create a special institution is not a very desirable thing to do, if we can get along with what we have; why should not those persons who move between the poorhouse and the prison not remain in the particular part of the poorhouse in which they usually are at present?—That is a question I have never been exactly able to understand.

13,629. I am not talking about the lunatic wards. The class I am speaking about is the inebriate or disorderly. These people are not lunatics, and they are not treated as lunatics. There are a great number of them who are not able-bodied, and are simply disorderly people who go in and out of the poorhouse; why should they not be simply kept where they are?—In the ordinary wards of the poorhouse?

13,630. Or, in a particular ward; it might be more convenient to set apart a special ward?—I see no objections that could be urged against that. If a certain portion of the house was set apart for them, with the authority of the sheriff for their detention, I think that would be a very good arrangement.

13,631. (By the Chairman.) In the course of your experience, have you come across any opium or chloral, or bromide, or any other form of drug drunkards?—I have had these sometimes as ordinary cases of insanity, but never as patients sent in specially for the cure of the habit.

13,632. In ordinary cases of insanity, what sort of intoxicants have you seen used by the insane?—Laudanum frequently, but no case resulting from that alone. Of course, the abuse of chloral and laudanum is, I believe, common.

13,633. How much laudanum would your most remarkable case of laudanum drinking take per day?—Not much; perhaps two drachms at the outside per dose.

13,634. There is a point you might explain to us. There is quite a different procedure in the case of lunatics committed as dangerous at the instance of the Procurator-Fiscal from what takes place in regard to other lunatics?—There is a difference in the Lunacy Act between the admission of patients at the instance of the Fiscal, and those from the prisons whose sentences are not expired.

13,635. But, in the case of lunatics sent to you at the instance of the Fiscal, the proceedings are public, and the Sheriff has to be satisfied, by evidence, that the man is a dangerous lunatic?—Provided that the parochial authorities, or the friends of the patient, do not at once take over the case. Take the case, for instance, of an ordinary pauper patient found wandering about the streets in a state dangerous to the public. He is taken up by the police, and the Fiscal obtains a warrant for his detention, till an inquiry is made into his condition of mind. It is only when the Parochial Board fails to take charge of the case that evidence is led in open court as to the condition of the patient.

13,636. And then he is sent to you?—Yes.

13,637. It is only when the Parochial Board refuses to take him up?—Yes; or his friends.

13,638. (By Dr Sutherland.) Suppose you were to apply either to inebriates—which is the more satisfactory form of procedure—the open inquiry or the private system of committal, accompanied by two medical certificates?—In the case of a private patient, it would be more agreeable to the feelings of the relatives that the examination should be made by two medical men, and the Sheriff grant the warrant.

13,639. But, suppose an inebriate wished a public inquiry to protect himself against oppressive seclusion, would it not be better to have the examination before the Sheriff?—If the patient preferred an open examination, I do not see why he should not have it.

13,640. You mean that, as regards the dangerous lunatic, there is very little possibility of his being sent unfairly to an asylum, but that, as regards those

28 Dec. 1894.

Roric.
Dec. 1894.
 sent upon certificate, there might be a possibility of his being unjustly confined?—Well, even if a patient were sent in unjustifiably, with the amount of supervision there is in the asylums, and the free access that the Lunacy Board have to the patients, he could not be long detained. During all my thirty-five years' experience, I have had one or two cases of patients sent to the asylum who on admission were not insane, and in these there was ample evidence that, at the time they were examined, they had been suffering from temporary excitement or something of that kind. [The witness then withdrew.]

Dr. Roric.
28 Dec. 1894.

MR. DAVID H. SAUNDERS, Merchant, Dundee, called in and examined by the Chairman.

Mr. D. H. Saunders.

13,641. You have long taken an interest in the question of the treatment of habitual offenders, and you have got some practical suggestions?—Yes.

13,642. Please give us them?—It may be convenient and save time if I may be allowed to make a short statement. For five and twenty years I was the managing partner of spinning mills in the neighbourhood of Dundee. During the past fourteen years I have resided in Dundee, and have taken a deep interest in those questions regarding the condition of those with whom this Royal Commission is now concerned. Allow me, as one of the public, to express my horror of the working of the present system of repeated imprisonment, its utter futility, and, after a long experience of mission work, of its utterly detestable results upon whole circles of the neighbours and the children, who see shame, womanly modesty, human feeling outraged from day to day, and who are brought by their poverty into constant touch with the poison and the debasement of this pollution. Now, the question really is what is to be put in the place of the present system. Before venturing to suggest what I propose, will you permit me to look at the causes in which this degradation originates. Conversing a few days ago with Mr Robbie, the School Board Officer, he confirmed what I have seen from my own observation. He says the records of his work are now long enough to assure him that this evil is hereditary, that the children are born with this terrible inheritance, and, in this debasing environment, criminals and sluggards breed criminals and sluggards. Now, the practical suggestions I venture to make therefore include that treatment which would prevent these evils, and, in the second place, the modes of dealing with those who are already men and women, and habitual criminals. Regarding the habitual criminals, I believe that by far the most successful experiment with them has been made by the Municipality of Berlin. Permit me to quote one or two sentences from Mr Pollard's book on the Berlin experiment. 'The first-class consists of persons who have either actually been, or were in danger of becoming, the subjects of police correction; the latter are invalids, for the most part worn out and helpless. In so far as they are able-bodied, the first-class are put to work on the fields in the neighbourhood of the workhouse, and are treated as if they might yet become respectable members of society. They are kept to steady employment, get sound, plain food, are obliged to lead a regular life, and, when it appears that they are safe to be trusted once more to maintain themselves in an honourable way, they are permitted to return to whatever decent employment they can obtain. Many men, and not a few women, are thus detained in the workhouse for years, not because they cannot work, but because they have not moral stamina enough to prevent them from becoming pests to the community if they were at large. In short, at Rummelsburg you shall see fully at work the Berliners' method of treating their police court criminals, their habitual drunkards, wife-beaters, and street brawlers. Such persons are not allowed to go at large after enduring the short term of imprisonment which is the immediate punishment of their offences. They are looked upon as hinderers of decent industry, and as likely to make other people like themselves if they are left at liberty. If permitted to drift about, they would only be a source of mischief, and would sorn on the community. The community simply refuse to be sorned upon by them, and pack them off to 'Rummelsburg, where they may have a chance of mending their ways, and where they are meanwhile compelled to do at least some work for the bread they eat. All such persons are subject to a longer or shorter period of police supervision; and it is, after all, a merciful arrangement that during that period they should be under such reformatory treatment as may perchance result in their ultimate restoration to respectable life.' I feel satisfied that, at any cost, it would pay Dundee to deal in the same way with some seventy or eighty habitual offenders. Their will is gone, their power to resist temptation has been eaten out of their hearts. Their present environment is fatal to a new start in life; and, miserable themselves, like persons suffering from small-pox, they are a danger to all they touch with their contaminating influence. Furthermore, I would be disposed to make cruelty to, and neglect of, children a much more serious offence. I would visit this with a year or two years' hard, real work on a farm. At any cost I would do this, and I would break the parental authority of the parent over the child which suffers such wrong. Here I touch on the second series of suggestions. In Dundee, after all that has been done—and much good work has been done—we have still over 1000 habitual truants, and we have close upon 1000 children in public institutions. In 1879, the Dundee Default List showed 3305, or 12 per cent. defaulters. Since free education and compulsory attendance, this has been reduced to 1752, or only 5½ per cent. Of this 1752, about 1000 children are neglected, and are in great peril of becoming associated with this habitual criminal class. Now, I would deal with these children in this way. Many of these children suffer wrongs of a kind so terrible that only personal observation enables me to believe such unnatural cruelty is possible. The poorhouse is their refuge when their parents, the habituals criminals, are in prison. Now, you have always 100 to 150 children there, and they, from the very nature of the case, must injure each other. To the deserving poor I would show all consideration, and give them their children with them. But I should, by law, at once break the parental control when it is grossly abused, and so enable the Parochial Board to send the children out in respectable families; nor would I give back the children to the parents. I would make the recovery of parental rights the prize and reward of well-doing. Permit me to again quote from the experience of Berlin. I have seen the children there in the common school, a very different and a much more pleasing sight than even the best conducted school here, where only these outcast children are congregated, and where, from week to week, a steady stream of degraded children flow in to contaminate the rest. The law at present does not allow the Parochial Board to separate the children from the most cruel parents, nor, more important still, can the parents, however degraded, be prevented from having the custody of their children restored to them after the public has washed and educated and brought them up for years. I would not propose to relieve drunken and criminal parents of all their children without any inconvenience to them. They should find it to involve permanent and severe hard work, if their children are taken from them, and the restoration of parental rights should be one of the chief inducements to their reformation. Permit me to quote one or two lines, from Mr Pollard's book, on this vital point:—'There are over 5000 orphans under the charge of the municipality, and of these more

Mr. D. H.
Saunders.

28 Dec. 1894.

'than four-fifths are boarded out in families which have been carefully selected by the district committees. The children are sent to the common schools of the town where they mingle with the children of ordinary citizens, and, as far as possible, any stigma attaching to the fact that they are maintained at the public cost is sought to be removed. After leaving school they are put to various occupations, the boys to handicrafts, and the girls for the most part to domestic service. Their future career is carefully watched until they grow up to maturity. It is claimed by the administration, from the reports which they annually receive of the conduct of the children after they have begun life for themselves, that these orphans turn out, on the whole, better than other children, and that of the girls 98 per cent. do well.' There are, as the officer of the Dundee School Board truly observes, 10 to 12 per cent. of the city population living in what may be termed a state of chronic destitution through enforced or voluntary idleness and loose living. I submit that the dumb, suffering masses demand much more thorough and efficient government. Their houses, for I see them often, are deplorable, and there is no sharp, efficient dealing with their abodes. Berlin is greatly in advance of us here, and her example should strengthen our government mightily. When our Lord Provost and other public spirited men propose to handle this subject with decision, they are paralysed by local interests and half-hearted support. Twenty-five years ago Berlin was worse than Dundee. With a population of 800,000, the death-rate was 30 per thousand, and of these 11,136 were children under one year. To-day, in that low-lying great city of 1,635,000, the death-rate is now under 20 per thousand, and is steadily falling. A criminal population cannot but result from the demoralisation of the one-roomed house in Dundee. For 28,000 of our people still live in abodes of one room. My suggestions, then, are six in number:—(1) At all costs isolate habitual offenders for a long period, and insist on honest hard work being done, if possible in the open air. (2) Break the parental tie where it has been abused, and make cruelty to children a crime, with the penalty of hard work for all the period the public has to maintain the child, and make the restoration of parental rights the prize and inducement for well-doing. (3) The boarding out, into families, of the children with special and careful supervision, and I do not see that, with sufficient care and with strict supervision, after a time farmers, gardeners, and others should not be encouraged to take as a boarder one of the parents to encourage habits of industry, and make a bridge back to honest respectability. (4) A much more drastic mode of dealing with one-roomed and insanitary abodes by central authority and paid inspection outside local influence. (5) I would have school boards to be induced by large grants to bestow special care, and to give the very highest salaries in those schools where half-timers and the neglected children are trained. This is the class which concerns the public most. The destruction of the stores from which habitual criminals spring depends largely on the successful handling of these children. The very best men and women, the most competent and most highly paid, should be selected for this the most difficult, the most valuable of all service to the public. (6) Lastly, and above all, the public must have the law changed so that they can resist the intrusion of the public-house against their will and interest among these abodes of the weak, defenceless poor; for, in all my experience, I never knew a case of a neglected child or habitual offender that did not have its evil root in drunkenness.

13,643. You speak of 70 or 80 habitual criminals in Dundee—the Chief Constable spoke of 200?—There are 200; but there are between 70 and 80 notorious, dreadful, fearful criminals.

13,644. You will find that, by Custody of Children Act, 1891, powers of taking away children from parents have been already given, and that the authorities won't exercise them?—I don't think the authorities are aware of them, else they would use them. [The witness then withdrew.]

Miss Walker.

MISS WALKER, Dairywoman, Oldmill Reformatory, Aberdeen, called in and examined by the Chairman. Miss Walker

13,645. You have got charge of the dairy department at Oldmill Reformatory, and you have been nine years there; and I understand you left it a year ago in order to inform yourself about poultry, and you have had a year's experience at poultry farming?—Yes.

13,646. When we saw you at Aberdeen, you said, in answer to questions, that you thought poultry farming would be a suitable thing for the employment of women or girls?—Yes; I think it would be.

13,647. In reformatory institutions?—Yes; in reformatory institutions, so be that there were land allowed for a run for the poultry.

13,648. Where were you gaining your experience about poultry?—I was just at a gentleman's private house to see the working of incubators. I was not on a poultry farm, as we have no poultry farms in our district. My object was chiefly to learn about the working of the incubators—the heating of the chambers, &c.

13,649. What was the size of the establishment?—It was only a gentleman's private area, with one incubator and 200 chickens. At a place like Oldmill there could be a great many more raised, as there could be a larger run. It was at Murtle, and there the poultry did not thrive very well, as it was too much surrounded by trees, and there was so much fallen leaves.

13,650. Supposing you aimed at Oldmill at 500 poultry to commence with, how much land would you think necessary for that?—Two acres, with coops, would be quite enough for that number.

13,651. If you have too many poultry on a run, are they not very apt to get diseased?—But that would not be too many if they were kept clean.

13,652. How many girls could you employ in connection with 500 poultry?—With dairy, I would say about 20 to 30 girls.

13,653. What would they do?—There would be a lot of work in connection with the preparing of food, over and above the keeping of the place clean.

13,654. But you could not employ 20 or 30?—It would depend on the size of the girls, and if they were required to be in school so many hours a day. It is only the system of working with boys that I know; I have never had anything to do with girls.

13,655. You are calculating on half-timers?—Yes.

13,656. And you would take probably three shifts of girls a day?—No; two would do.

13,657. That is to say, you would take about 10 girls for a two-acre poultry farm?—Yes.

13,658. You would prefer to work them in with the dairy?—Yes; that would work far better.

13,659. With your present dairy, for instance, and 500 poultry added to it, how do you think you would manage that? If you had girls, how many would you need for your dairy?—I do not know how girls would do. They would not do at all among the cows, as they would not have strength for the milking.

13,660. But supposing you had big girls, say about the same age as the boys?—15, 16, and 17 years of age would do. For 36 cows, which is the number we have under milk just now, we would require eight girls for milking in the time that it is necessary to be done in, and to do the churning and butter-making and all combined.

13,661. But you don't mean to say eight girls could do all the work?—Yes; in connection with the dairy.

13,662. Do you mean half-timers?—Yes; to allow the one set to stop when the other comes.

- Miss Walker.* 13,663. That is two shifts of four girls?—Yes; two shifts a day.
- 28 Dec. 1894. 13,664. There does not appear to be very much employment for women even about a dairy farm?—Well, I just work it with three women.
- 13,665. Supposing you were working the dairy with women, and added poultry farming on to it, how many would you require?—Taking 500 hens, another woman and a girl would do quite well.
- 13,666. What is your idea about the monetary results of poultry-farming? You make a good thing out of the dairy, don't you?—Yes; dairies pay well.
- 13,667. You get a good price for your butter?—Yes; a large price for both butter and eggs just now.
- 13,668. The poultry you have, do they pay?—No; the small number of poultry we have do not pay. It is only for the convenience of customers we keep them. They do not pay, unless you study them carefully for market. Home-bred poultry don't pay, because you can buy them at these sales at half the price you could sell them at.
- 13,669. Is that so?—Yes; unless you rear them and send them to the London market direct for yourself, they won't pay.
- 13,670. Take the eggs, they would surely pay?—They would pay just now, but not in the summer, unless you use them for hatching. In the summer they will get the very best eggs for 9d. and 10d. the dozen. Both eggs and home-bred poultry will pay if you send them off to London; but they won't do it to consume them at home. Of course, we have private customers for ours, and they pay well enough.
- 13,671. What do you get for your eggs in the summer?—We never sell them below a shilling per dozen.
- 13,672. And in the winter?—2s., 2s. 3d., and 2s. 6d.
- 13,673. You have never been connected with a girls' reformatory?—No; I have been very well acquainted with the matron of the one in Aberdeen, but I have never had anything to do with it. It is laundry-work they do there.
- 13,674. It has been suggested to us that, for certain classes of people, habitual offenders, there should be adult reformatories. Supposing that we were to recommend an adult reformatory for women, do you think many of them could be employed either in dairy or poultry work?—If the two were combined I think they might do, but they would not do separately.
- 13,675. And you could not employ a great number of women?—Not unless it were on a large scale, and you were to make the women do everything. If we were to put away all the men, we could employ a great many women, but it is almost necessary that you should have so many men.
- 13,676. How many men have you got in your establishment?—We have four men, and we have only a man principal in each department. The boys do everything else. There are eleven boys on the farm but they are not all employed about the dairy. The number of boys employed varies according to the seasons.
- 13,677. You have in the dairy three women and eleven boys?—The boys are not in the dairy, they are only for keeping the place tidy.
- 13,678. The byre?—No; but there is a concreted square before the dairy door which has to be washed, and the road from the byre down to the dairy has also to be washed.
- 13,679. And who attends to the byre?—The cattle-man and two boys. Then there are two boys to keep the stable tidy, and the man who has charge of the farm has from six to eight boys, and, in the harvest or a busy season, he may have twelve or fourteen or even twenty boys.
- 13,680. How many acres have you on the farm?—150 acres, but there are 100 acres rented. Only 50 belong to the institution.
- 13,681. You see that, even in the summer time, the number of boys employed in the dairy and at agricultural work is very small?—About 30 over all. We could easily employ more, but we cannot get more without reducing the number at the schools, and at shoemaking, carpentering, and tailoring.
- Miss Walker.* 13,682. How many could you employ on the farm 28 Dec. 1894. if you could get them?—We could easily do without two of the men. I have seen a boy at Old Mill Reformatory working the second pair. We have a man now doing that. When the Act came into operation we could not get boys.
- 13,683. Explain that?—When the reformatory at Inverness was shut we got their boys, but they were too small to manage a pair of horses; they could only manage one horse.
- 13,684. Could you get good work out of the boys?—Oh, yes.
- 13,685. Could you get a man's work out of them?—Yes, some boys would work as well as any man, although not so heavy work.
- 13,686. Willing workers?—Yes.
- 13,687. You must have had a lot of boys through your hands?—Yes; I have seen the reformatory cleared twice.
- 13,688. Have you watched them?—Yes; there is an annual return.
- 13,689. But that runs for only three years?—Well, a great many of the boys come back when they are grown-up men—in fact, the first boy that ever was discharged from the reformatory was on a visit to the farm manager perhaps about eighteen months or two years ago.
- 13,690. What was he?—He was a shipbuilder in some shipbuilding yard in Aberdeen, where he served his time after leaving. He has wrought himself up to be a foreman in some shipbuilding yard in Glasgow.
- 13,691. I met in Greenock the other day, in prison, a man who had been at Oldmill Reformatory, and he said that when he was there there were seven boys from Greenock in the institution?—Yes, I believe that.
- 13,692. He said that of these seven boys only two were doing well?—These south country boys are very difficult to keep in view. Mr Graham kept them better in view than anyone else, because he comes from the south; but there were two or three boys from Greenock, and I don't know if any of them did well.
- 13,693. Have you any from Edinburgh?—We have a few from Leith, but I don't know about Edinburgh.
- 13,694. Do they do well, as a rule?—I like the Leith boys better than the Greenock boys, because there are a good few Greenock boys Irish. There are also a good few boys from Glasgow, and one from Rothesay, and there is a number of Lochee and Perth boys.
- 13,695. If you were told now that half the boys that come out of Oldmill do well, do you think that would be below or above the mark?—I think that would be very near the average, so far as I can learn about them; but, of course, there is a change just now in the institution, and I think, if everything is right settled up, the boys will do better, because they have never been treated with kindness.
- 13,696. There is a change of governor?—Yes; the old governor was very harsh and cruel to the boys. I thought all along that, if the boys had been shown more kindness, they would have done better.
- 13,697. Then, do you think Oldmill boys turned out worse than those from other institutions?—I do not think that. I do not think they turned out so bad as the industrial school boys at Oakbank, but, of course, they are much younger than the Oldmill boys. We get many of the boys after they have served their time in Oakbank.
- 13,698. Do you know of any of these industrial school boys from Oakbank now?—There is on the farm just now a boy who was, I think, five years in Oakbank. We will be through with him in February.
- 13,699. Do you know why he was sent to you?—For getting out on a Saturday night, and going in at a window and stealing. Mr Smith would not take him back, and so he was sent to us.
- 13,700. Do many of the other cases find their way to you under similar circumstances?—Mostly for the same, but sometimes for running away. When they Miss Walker. run away three times from Oakbank, Mr Smith goes to the court, and says he cannot take them back. Then they are sent to us.

28 Dec. 1894.

13,701. That is, of course, bad conduct, but it is not criminal?—They have nowhere else to go. They must either take them to the industrial school, or let them go to the bad, if they don't come to us.

13,702. You know about the girls' place in Aberdeen?—I know the place; it is splendidly fitted up.

13,702A. You don't know, I suppose, much about girls?—No.

13,703. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Tell us what equipment you would want in a poultry yard. You would want a house?—Oh, yes.

13,704. What else?—Then, if you were to rear the poultry, you would need coops for hatching them in.

13,705. A lot of them?—A good few, whether they were hatched with hens or incubators, because you would require coops to put the chickens in after they were hatched.

13,706. What would it cost to put up a house, and coops, and all the rest of it for 100 fowls, suppose you got all the plant ready?—I could not say what the expense would be. If they were wooden they would not cost much.

13,707. £5?—Oh, yes; more.

13,708. £10?—I think that would be plenty.

13,709. You think £10 would house 100 fowls?—Perfectly.

13,710. Then, as to runs. I suppose you would give them two or three runs, and move them from one to the other from time to time?—Yes; that is best.

13,711. I think you say an acre for 200?—That would be plenty.

13,712. Breaking it up into runs?—That would be better.

13,713. (By Dr Farquharson.) Did you not say two acres for 500?—That would be too much.

13,714. (By Col. M'Hardy.) What was it you did say?—It was 500 that was spoken of.

13,715. What would you do with your ground?—It would have to be ploughed up, turned over, covered with sand, and cleaned every now and again.

13,716. Yes; but about dividing it for 500?—It would be divided into five in that way.

13,717. What would you put round it?—Wire fencing four or five feet high.

13,718. No more?—That would do.

13,719. Would they not fly over that if they were not fat?—Oh, no, they would not fly over; they won't seek to fly if they are kept in.

13,720. Don't they sometimes fly over?—Oh, yes, often, but not unless there is something enticing them.

13,721. There might be people outside enticing them?—I don't think they would fly for that at any rate.

13,722. How many would you kill for use every month, suppose you had 500?—Just at the season they were most required.

13,723. But there would not be very many women occupied in really managing this thing after all? How would you fill up the time if you had somewhat elderly girls? Could they do any kind of gardening?—Perfectly well.

13,724. But, what about digging; they could not do that? Did you ever see women digging?—Not very often. I have dug potatoes, but that is all.

13,725. But they could not prepare the ground for potatoes, for instance?—No, they would not have strength for that.

13,726. That would be reducing the amount of labour immensely, if you did only the reaping and the cropping?—But they would have all the feeding to do, and there would also be the killing, and plucking, and so on. The food is all to wash and boil, and mash up.

13,727. That would not take more than three girls at the outside?—Three girls could do it perfectly.

13,728. Can you suggest anything else you could have to fill up the time if you had—we will call them women?—There is little else you could keep them going at, unless laundry or household work. It would be losing their time to let them work outside. They must be trained to inside work as well. I train my boys so that they can do anything out or in.

13,729. Can they mend their own clothes?—Yes, and knit their stockings.

13,730. I thought they had knitting machines?—So they have; but they are taught to do the knitting by hand as well.

13,731. Cannot they get a sufficient number of boys to knit that they have to get a machine. I thought a machine would make for the whole lot?—Yes; but they get the chance of learning to knit, so that they could do it if it had to be done; there are always so many boys that can knit.

13,732. (By Miss Stevenson.) If it were a mere matter of filling up the women's time, you could, both in the dairy and in the poultry farm, I suppose, make a good deal of work by keeping up a very high state of cleanliness, and that kind of thing, although it would not pay?—Yes; it is just at that they are kept mostly.

13,733. What I mean is—you could do more than is actually necessary for carrying on the business?—Yes, certainly.

13,734. In model dairies, for instance, there is a great deal of particular cleaning to do?—There is a great deal of that with us.

13,735. Then, in regard to the employment of women outside, you think that none of them would be able to do the digging?—Plenty of that class of women can dig perfectly well, but I have had nothing to do with that class. I have seen women on large farms away in the north who just wrought alongside men, and could do everything. That class of women you talk about, I believe, a great many of them can turn their hand to the spade and graip as well as a great many of the men can do.

13,736. (By Dr Farquharson.) Is it not the case that in the Highlands a great many of the women do a great deal of the agricultural work—digging and such like?—I understand so.

13,737. Without any detriment to their health?—It will not touch their health. The women who work outside are very healthy.

13,738. How do you think that poultry farming, which is not successful with you on a small scale, would pay on a large scale?—It would pay on a large scale to send on to the London markets.

13,739. You think you could get a good opening in the London markets?—Yes; Scottish poultry, and butter, and eggs are very much sought after in London.

13,740. Where does the foreign competition come from—France, or where?—The poultry mostly come from Ireland and France.

13,741. Is that from large dairy farms?—Just poultry farming.

13,742. On a large scale?—On a very large scale.

[The witness then withdrew.]

MR. JAMES F. BREMNER, Chief Constable of Fifeshire, recalled and examined by Col. M'Hardy.

13,743. You have got some supplementary information in regard to tramps since I saw you?—Yes, I have got the Sunday evening census.

13,744. Please tell us what it is?—The census in the County of Fife on the evening of Sunday last, exclusive of Kirkcaldy and Dunfermline, which have separate police forces, has been very carefully taken by the police in the various districts, and the total number of vagrants found, adults and children, is 294, of which number 26 are children and 268 adults, male and female. By the instructions I gave to the police we have separated these, as far as we could, into two classes—what we would term real vagrants, persons who don't want to work, and those who, if we are to believe their story, are really in search of work, or would work if they could get it. The number of real vagrants out of the 294 is 137, of whom 15 are children and 122 adults. These we call regular tramps. Those in search of work, whom we believe from what is told by the persons themselves, and what the police have been able to gather from their circumstances, are 146 adults and 11 children—total, 157. I should say, however, that of these latter 27 are pedlars; that is to say, have pedlars' certificates; but I have classed them with those who are seeking to work.

13,745. Have you got any account of how many of these are foreign to the county altogether, and how many are known to the police by headmark?—Well, they know very few. They know some, but not many. Those of Scottish nationality are 176 adults and 25 children.

13,746. How many are Fife men?—It is very hard to say. We have tested their place of birth, but they are seen in Fife now and again wandering over the counties, to the best of my knowledge, of Stirling, Perth, and Forfar.

13,747. In a group round Fife?—Not in a group exactly, but individually.

13,748. I mean in the counties as a group?—Yes.

13,749. Have you got how many come before the police in Fifeshire?—Do you mean convictions?

13,750. No; I mean where the police are acquainted with them—what has been called ocal vagrants, as distinguished from strangers?—I could not give you exact figures of them from the Sunday night census.

13,751. Could you give me approximate figures?—I should be inclined to estimate them at 20 to 25 per cent. that we see every now and again.

13,752. So that the great mass of them are apparently a continuous stream of strangers?—A very large proportion of strangers at all events passing through.

13,753. Have you got any special information about their housing when you took that census?—Yes, I have. There are very few who have any fixed place of abode; but six told us that they had families left at Edinburgh, Lanark, Dumfries, Dundee, Glasgow, and Stirling.

13,754. These were males, I suppose?—These are females. I don't know what they are.

13,755. But it was men who told you?—And women as well. For example, there was one of these five a woman who was found in Cupar burgh—one child in London, and one in the Mars training ship. Of the 11 children found in the Cupar division, only three were found educated. But, in answer to your question, there are a few of the vagrants, whom we met with on the Sunday evening, have families left at these places.

13,756. The question was, that I supposed the man was the vagrant in these cases, and not the woman?—I am not able to tell you. The information given to the police may have been from a male or a female. I don't know, except in this case, of a female who was found in Cupar.

13,757. That was not her husband's home?—Well I could not say.

13,758. As to how they passed the night before or after the taking of the census?—Twelve were found in houses of refuge, hospitals, and poorhouses. That is the printed heading, but, in reality, there are no refuges. One of the twelve was a female child.

13,759. Then, in the common lodgings—where are they?—They are in the burghs principally.

13,760. These are private lodging-houses where they have to pay?—These are lodging-houses which are licensed by the magistrates of the burgh, and for which shelter the applicants have to pay their 3d. to 4d. per night.

13,761. How many were there in these?—In these common lodging-houses, and others of a better class where they pay 6d., there were 144 adults, male and female, and 13 children—total, 157.

13,762. That is about half of them?—That is so.

13,763. Therefore, many of them do pay for their night's lodging?—I have no doubt they do. Then, in public parks, gardens, or streets—

13,764. That is the printed heading, but what does it mean?—Principally about pits and brickworks—113 adult males and females, and 12 children.

13,765. Sleeping out actually?—In the shelter of a colliery, pit-head, shed with a boiler inside, or at a brick-work.

13,766. Are they sufficiently covered on a frosty night?—Oh, yes. I have no doubt it is quite comfortable for that class of people. There are as many as 20 of them found in a place of that kind.

13,767. In regard to these 294, excepting the 27 pedlars, how did you know that those who made pretensions to be looking for work were really in search of work?—We took the statements of those whom I have mentioned as in search of work, and, in the absence of any definite information known to the police of their knowledge, we must take their statements. There are indications which, in the opinion of the police, show that they are telling a true story.

13,768. Leaving aside the pedlars, were all these men with money in their pockets?—They would have a very small amount. They all live from hand to hand, from day to day, and even these pedlars are often in the same condition.

13,769. Can you give us anything about the education of these tramps?—Of these 294, the number that could read and write—it may be imperfectly, but they said they could—was 250.

13,770. Old and young?—Of the 26 children, there were only four that could read and write. The others were stated by the police to be without education.

13,771. Did they find out how the four were educated?—I cannot answer that.

13,772. But a large proportion of the adults were apparently educated?—A large number could read or write, but it may be in an imperfect manner—I should say in an imperfect manner, on the whole.

13,773. But that would not indicate that they were hereditary vagrants, if I may say so?—They must have had the blessings of the Education Act to a certain extent.

13,774. If they had been vagrants from their childhood, the same as these children, they apparently would not have been educated?—I believe a number of these whom we took on Sunday have drifted into vagrancy from various causes—it may be lack of occupation, and no means of earning money.

13,775. One would naturally imagine that in their youth they had been stationary rather than moving about from their earliest years?—I think the bulk of them come under the description that you are now stating to me.

13,776. You stated there were 137 real vagrants, and you imagine that a large proportion of these 137 had developed into vagrants through being the children of stationary parents?—I have no doubt that they developed into vagrancy from habit, and acquiring a liking for the roving life that these vagrants lead.

13,777. Were there any of them sick?—No, none of these.

13,778. I mean, did any of the 294 complain of illness?—No.

13,779. Or, did your constables take any notice of that?—They would have reported it, if they did. The children of these tramps seemed fairly well cared for as a rule; in good physical condition, I mean.

13,780. Your remark about health applies not only to the children, but to the adults?—To the whole.

13,781. All in good health?—To the best of my knowledge. If there were any ill it must have been a very small proportion indeed.

13,782. How many of them were under the influence of drink?—None, so far as the police could judge. It is very improbable that any would be under drink on a Sunday night, for if they got a supply on Saturday it would almost certainly be finished long before midnight on Sunday.

Chief-

28 Dec. 1894.

Chief-
Constable
Bremner.

28 Dec. 1894.

13,783. Is there any other information that you took specially that you could give to the Committee?—I do not think there is.

13,784. Can you give us any suggestion how to deal in a more satisfactory way than at present with that class of people of whom you have 127 sleeping out in the open air in Fifeshire, so as to prevent begging, and to get a hold of their children to educate them?—Well, in regard to the prevention of begging, I think I stated when I was here last that we ought to have the power that is conferred upon the police under the Burgh Police Act, 1892, but that would require to be used with discretion. As to shelter for them, if it is suggested that the state or the local authority should provide shelter for these people, that is a very big question, and I am not prepared to say what is to be done in a question of that kind.

13,785. But look at it simply from the point of view of a chief constable of a county with a lot of experience, independently of whom the expense is to fall upon. What, in your opinion, is the proper way to deal with them in regard to shelter?—It is not very easy to answer. In the first place, if we were to deal with them under compulsion we would require powers, to put it plainly, to apprehend them, and convey them to a shelter. Many of them would not thank the police for that: they would prefer to go their own way. There is a proportion that come to the police, and ask for shelter in the cells at night—a very small proportion it is, and, of course, they are refused regularly, as the cells are only for the temporary detention of persons charged with crime. Very few of the 137 real vagrants I have mentioned would come to ask shelter from the police, and, if we are to deal with them, it must be by having power to put them into the shelters against their will.

13,786. But if you applied the Burgh Police Act to the counties you would have probably, indeed almost certainly, the housing to provide not only for the 137, but for the whole 294?—Very likely, as the majority of them beg.

13,787. Then, suppose you stopped begging, the necessity for the housing would stand out more clearly?—I scarcely think you will ever stop begging.

13,788. But wouldn't you like to see shelters of some sort for those who are really in search of work?—I think it would be a good thing to have shelters of that kind here and there throughout the county. There are numbers who come in inclement weather, and ask shelter from the police, but they are refused. I decline to let them be put into the cells. These are cases where sympathy gets the better of regulations and relief is afforded by the police.

13,789. (By the Chairman.) Relief is afforded?—Well, I give them relief myself.

13,790. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Do you see how the children could be sent to school?—Yes, if you give powers to take the children away from their parents. That, however, involves the very serious question of the responsibility of the parents to the children.

13,791. Under the Industrial Schools Act, 1866, any child under 14 years of age found begging may be sent to a certified industrial school. The Act also provided that any person may bring before two justices any child apparently under the age of 14 that comes under the following description, and have committed to an industrial school, viz.:—'Found wandering and 'not having any home or settled place of abode, or 'proper guardianship, or visible means of subsistence.' That clause would seem to give sufficient power in itself, would it not?—I am not very sure of that.

13,792. It is interpreted, I understand, as if it were necessary not only to fulfil all these conditions, but to fulfil others that are enumerated in the Act; but, if that clause were to stand alone, it would cover the vagrants' children?—I am not sure that it would. I should doubt it very much. Very few of these children I have spoken about are really found wandering. They are found with persons who are their reputed parents. Perhaps it is not proper guardianship, but it is guardianship. I would have doubts whether that clause would be sufficiently strong to deal with them.

13,793. But it would have to be a clause something like that that would have to be passed in order to obtain charge of these children?—It would. You are taking these children away from their reputed parents—if it is thought desirable—and educating them. We have nearly every year cases of children sent to industrial schools under that very section, but not many.

13,794. Of these tramp children?—Yes; of parents that are really unable to maintain them.

13,795. Who are tramping?—Who are going from place to place seeking work.

13,796. (By the Chairman.) Would not this clause I already referred to cover them, viz.:—'That is found 'begging or receiving alms, or being in any public place 'for the purpose of begging or receiving alms'?—I believe it would, to a certain extent, cover a number of them, but not the class that Col. M'Hardy is pointing at.

13,797. (By Col. M'Hardy.) In regard to those of whom you spoke as having been got hold of, what are the conditions you point to?—I point to the conditions of children whose parents, to my own knowledge, are literally leading a vagrant life, wandering from place to place. The children, loitering on the streets, get into bad habits, and beyond the control of their parents. These children are in danger of lapsing into crime, and some of them may have committed petty crimes, but, rather than send them to a reformatory, we send them to an industrial school.

13,798. This Committee has found, in examining a variety of witnesses, many of them chief constables and persons connected with the administration of justice in Scotland, a very great variety in the handling of the police in regard to the offences about which we are making investigations. Do you think that something more nearly approximate to uniformity could be arrived at if the inspector of constabulary were instructed to discover the different modes in which these classes were dealt with by the chief constables, so that they might be advised to proceed more generally on the same lines?—Well, I should like to know what the lines are where the divergence occurs in the mode of treatment.

13,799. There is a very great divergence in dealing with drunks, for instance. Sometimes they are liberated when sober, and other times they are brought before the magistrate without fail. There are also, as you must be aware, great differences in dealing with prostitutes. These are the sort of differences I mean. The matter is impressed upon one's mind in looking at the various records that have been prepared for us by the immense differences in the numbers apprehended per thousand?—You spoke just now of the police dealing with them. From my point of view, in Fifeshire, it is the magistrates that deal with them, not the police.

13,800. But I am speaking of before he comes to the magistrate?—But the police in Fifeshire do not deal with them before they come before a magistrate.

13,801. I am not speaking of Fifeshire. You may take it there is a divergence; do you think there would be any objection to the inspector of constabulary inquiring into them?—Not the least.

13,802. (By the Chairman.) Here is a point in your own county. I find that the arrests for breach of the peace, petty assault, drunk and incapable, disorderly conduct, vagrancy and begging, prostitution, and petty theft in 1893 numbered 1456, of which 1389 were dealt with by conviction or admonition or pledge forfeited; but in Dunfermline, which is in your county, though not under your jurisdiction, there were 723 arrests for the same thing, and 722—that is every individual, except one—were dealt with by conviction, admonition, or pledge forfeited. That is to say, in your case there were about a hundred men either found not guilty or disposed of some way else; but in Dunfermline every one of them, with a single exception, appears to have been found guilty, taking the forfeited pledges as assuming guilt?—I quite believe it. There are 24 or 25 police or royal burghs in Fifeshire in which magistrates exercise jurisdiction, and these magistrates, although they do their duty well, they probably have not the same idea of punishment, and hence the men in one burgh may dismiss with an admonition where another would put on a penalty.

13,803. Yes, we quite understand that. A man is brought up before the magistrate, and the magistrate deals with him by an admonition. That is all right; and I have no doubt that these 722 in Dunfermline and 1389 in Fifeshire included many admonitions; but between those dealt with by the magistrate, and those arrested in Fifeshire, there is a difference of about 70, while in Dunfermline the difference between those dealt with by the magistrate and those arrested is only one?—Is there no column in which the difference is explained by 'not proven.'—(Dr Sutherland.) No; that was not asked for.

13,804. I suppose I may take it your men sometimes make mistakes, and the accused person is found not guilty?—There are occasionally breaches of the peace and such like 'not guilty.'

13,805. I shall put the matter to you in this way: If the ratio of cases disposed otherwise than by 'conviction, admonition, or forfeited pledges' was the same in Fife as it is in Dunfermline, instead of having 67 people so dealt with you would have only two; and if the ratio were the same in Dunfermline as it is in Fife, instead of there being only one there should be about 33?—Yes, I quite see that; but I observe that other counties show even greater differences.

13,806. Yes; but I simply took your own case, thinking you might explain it?—I cannot, unless these are cases found not proven or not guilty. That is the only explanation I can give without inquiring into the matter.

13,807. (By Dr Sutherland.) Would the discrepancy arise owing to the action of burghs policed by you working under the Lindsay Act or the Scottish Burgh Police Act? These prisoners might be liberated without bringing them to trial?—Perfectly.

13,808. That explains the some 70 of difference?—It might. Take Cupar as an illustration of what is done in other burghs. Many of the prisoners brought in on Saturday night for being drunk are dismissed by the bailie who comes down on the Sunday morning.

13,809. Is Cupar given in the Fife returns?—Yes; everything except the two burghs of Dunfermline and Kirkcaldy.

13,810. Are these you refer to dismissed with an admonition, or what?—Dismissed, and told to sin no more.

13,811. (By the Chairman.) They don't come before the magistrate?—Yes, they do. They come before the magistrate in the police office.

13,812. Do the magistrates come to look after the prisoners throughout all your jurisdiction?—When there are prisoners apprehended in any of the burghs on Saturday night it is the duty of the constable in charge to get a magistrate on Sunday morning to come to the police office and remand or discharge them.

13,813. Is it general in any other county?—I do not know.

13,814. You have been in other big towns?—Not in connection with the police.

13,815. Do you know about the Dundee practice?—I do not.

13,816. Kirkcaldy and Dunfermline will give you the same difference; there must be some difference of procedure between these two places?—Please state the figures.

13,817. There were 890 arrested in Kirkcaldy, and 850 brought to trial?—I have very little doubt these 40 were dismissed with a reprimand, and told not to come back again.

13,818. You can easily find out from your officers what is the difference between Kirkcaldy and Dunfermline?—I shall try.

13,819. (By Dr Sutherland.) In regard to your own figures, this Sunday method of treatment explains the difference between the two columns?—I have no doubt that is the explanation.

13,820. (By the Chairman.) How does the Sunday method work?—Oh, well. There has been a standing order in the county that no man is to be locked up longer than enables the police to take him before the magistrate. On a Saturday night, if a prisoner has committed an offence or crime which is outwith the burgh, I get a justice of the peace to come, and, in all cases where the crime has been committed within the burgh, one of the magistrates comes down regularly on the Sunday mornings.

13,821. And he either remands or dismisses?—That is so.

13,822. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Is it necessary for him to remand—the confinement would be legal enough till Monday?—Yes; but I don't want to assume the responsibility of the confinement. I want the confinement by the police to be limited to the very shortest time. It frees the police from anything like the accusation of keeping a man longer than they should do before bringing him before the magistrate.

13,823. Then, from all that has been said, you are now satisfied that there is a considerable variety in the police administration apparently, and different authorities, and that you see no objection to it being made the business of the inspector of constabulary to look into these matters, and report on them to the Secretary for Scotland?—Certainly, I would have no objections. It would, perhaps, be beyond his province to enter into the matter of the discrepancy of sentences in different courts for similar crimes.

13,824. (By the Chairman.) How could you possibly rectify that state of matters? Have you any suggestions to make?—No, I cannot say. Even sheriffs differ very much in their sentences.

13,825. And so do judiciary judges?—Quite true.

13,826. (By Miss Stevenson.) I wanted to ask you about these tramp children. You expressed the opinion, which I think is a right one, that it is a very serious thing to remove from parents the responsibility of their children, and to break the parental tie, but that is a thing which is done under the provisions of the Industrial Schools Act constantly in the case of parents who have a settled habitation, and whose children are taken from them for little petty thefts, like stealing apples, or little trivial things of that sort. These children are taken away from their parents until they are 16 years of age. Do you think it would be a greater responsibility to take away the children of parents who have no settled home and no opportunities of otherwise educating their children?—My idea is that the State would be assuming a very large fatherhood over these children if it took them away from the fathers and mothers. Many of the fathers and mothers would be very glad, I have no doubt, to get quit of them in that way. I think it would be a very undesirable thing for the State to do.

13,827. Don't you think it is possible that, if the children of these tramp families were committed to some kind of industrial school or place of detention, that it might be an inducement to the parents to make some sort of settlement in the place where their children were?—I think it would be a good thing for the children if they were removed from the sphere of evil that surrounds them, and placed in some ordinary locality where they might be clothed and looked after.

13,828. But my question was, do you think, if these children were taken away from their parents and put into an industrial school, that that would be an inducement to the parents to settle near them?—I do not know that I could answer that question. Their parents, when out of work and rightly disposed, might settle; but I do not think the tramp class would settle as a rule. They have got the wandering habit ingrained in them.

13,829. Have you any experience of the children you say have been sent to industrial schools from that tramp class as to whether they have turned out well?—Yes; the majority, so far as I know. A few have lapsed. We know about the 'Mars,' for example, pretty well, and I believe it would be a good thing for the children.

28 Dec. 1894.

13,830. Do you think it would be a very great responsibility?—I think it would if the State or the local authorities, or whatever the authority, were to take over the responsibility of feeding, clothing, and educating these children.

13,831. (By Dr Sutherland.) Supposing it were decided that temporary relief should be given to those tramping through the country, who would be the best public officials to dispense the same, and to discriminate between the worthy and the worthless?—May I ask if you point at those who are really seeking work, or to the real vagrant classes?

13,832. Suppose it is left to some public authority to afford relief to the honest tramp in search of work, who would be the best official to carry out these provisions? Never mind the source from which the money is to come?—I think the police, conjoined with the parochial authorities, would be the most suitable.

13,833. How could the parochial authorities be available, seeing that there are six policemen for every poor inspector. Inspectors of poor live miles apart, and could not, without great expense, afford timely relief. Would it not, for obvious reasons, be much better under these circumstances that it should be left to the police, who are near to each other?—It might, as far as Fife is concerned. I would have no objections.

13,834. And might not there be another benefit if the police were giving the relief, namely, that the policeman in one district might pass the man in search of work on to his neighbour, and so on through the counties, and thus the police would ultimately come to know if these men were really honestly in search of work or not?—It might, so far as the police are concerned. I would have no objections to try it.

13,835. The police are within two or three miles of each other, and in touch?—Yes, in Fife; and in other counties we have conferences every week.

13,836. That is not the case with the inspectors of poor?—It is not. I would fear, however, that you would have strong opposition from the counties.

13,837. In regard to what?—In regard to employing the police for this purpose.

13,838. On your own admission it is not a very serious matter?—Personally, I should make no objection to it.

13,839. You say you have only 290 vagrants. How many policemen have you?—92 in all.

13,840. That is, on an average, three vagrants that each constable would have to make up his mind about whether they were suitable for relief or not?—Yes.

13,841. Three a day would be the average which each policeman would have?—It would be the average; but it would by no means represent the actual number that would come to certain policemen who are on the high roads.

13,842. It would be a case of being more on the highways than in the rural districts?—That is so.

13,843. Would not a policeman with his knowledge be a better person than the poor law official to discriminate who should get relief?—Yes, I think so. I have no hesitation in saying that.

13,844. And by this process he would come to discover who was the honest and who was the dishonest tramp, and then we would be in a better position to put down what is obnoxious in vagrancy. A vagrant would be passed on from policeman to policeman, and the time would come when the police would be in a position to declare that this man was a dishonest tramp; and you would be in a better position, would you not, to deal with him?—Yes; but that is assuming the necessity of a policeman apprehending everybody who seems to be a vagrant, or looks like one.

13,845. Not till he has passed through the mill of several policemen?—I have no objection to it. I believe the police would be the proper parties for that purpose.

13,846. (By Dr Farquharson.) I think that you say the children of vagrants and tramps are fairly well looked after on the whole?—Those who come under my notice generally appear to be so; and, in other parts of the county, they seem to be fairly well nourished and fed. As to clothing and cleanliness I cannot say.

13,847. Are they rough in their manners—swearing, and so on?—I cannot say that.

13,848. Do they swell the criminal classes generally?—Well, I don't know. They continue to be vagrants, but I don't know that I have followed that up.

13,849. The want of education does not appear to do them very great harm?—It depends on what they are after 14, 15, or 16 years of age.

13,850. You don't know whether they continue vagrants or become criminals?—I am afraid they do both.

13,851. Do you consider the position of the children is so threatening as to make it desirable for us to suggest legislation to make the State take the great responsibility you have spoken of?—Well, I cannot fail to see a great difficulty in answering that question.

13,852. You admit that we would have to make out a very strong case if we were to take that course?—I do so. The vagrant and wandering class, in times of depression of trade, is largely increased. Persons who begin by being out of work, and who fail to obtain work for a time, lapse into a state of vagrancy. They become, if not chronic, at any rate temporary vagrants.

13,853. They may be beggars and not steal?—Well, the number of crimes committed by tramps is small in comparison to the number that pass through the county.

13,854. Do they drink a great deal?—They seem to get drink when they cannot get food.

13,855. They don't seem to be very much worse than the lower class of people in large towns?—No, I don't think they are, from what I see of them.

[The witness then withdrew.]

DAVID NICOLSON, M.D., Superintendent of the Government Criminal Lunatic Asylum, Broadmoor, and President-Elect of the Medico-Psychological Society of Great Britain and Ireland, called in and examined by the Chairman.

Dr. David Nicolson.

29 Jan. 1895.

13,856. You were a member of the Departmental Committee appointed by the Home Secretary to inquire into the subject of habitual drunkenness?—I was.

13,857. We have, of course, the report of that Committee before us; but, from your connection with the criminal insane, I have no doubt you have formed certain opinions on the subject of the treatment of habitual drunkards, which are probably individual to yourself. Have you anything to add, as your own opinion, to those expressed in the report?—These opinions are the outcome of my own experience, as well as an expression of the opinion of that Committee, after hearing the evidence which had been placed before them.

13,858. What number of criminal lunatics have you at Broadmoor?—About 650.

13,859. In Scotland we have found a large number of weak-minded persons in prison, who are evidently more or less inclined to lunacy. Some of these have been actually in a lunatic asylum. Are there many of that class in English prisons?—My impression is that the weak-minded class would be two or three per cent. of the whole. These are weak-minded people who are unfit to manage themselves in the world, and who are unable to be submitted to the complete discipline of prison life.

13,860. What do you do with them in England?—Until the Woking Prison was done away with they were sent there and left doing light work, without being certified to be insane, until the expiration of their sentence. They were then discharged.

13,861. Those were convicts?—Yes.

13,862. But, putting aside the case of convicts, let us take ordinary petty offenders. Do you know about them?—No. In the prison at Millbank we had military offenders; but I have never been stationed at a local prison where short sentence prisoners are kept.

13,863. What did you do with the short-sentence prisoners at Woking?—There were no short-sentence prisoners there; but the weak-minded convicts were on a relaxed form of prison discipline, with light labour out in the fields.

13,864. In the fields?—Yes. They did a little gardening, filled the water-cart, raised water in the well, and did a variety of light jobs of that sort.

13,865. What becomes of them now?—After Broadmoor was opened in 1863, all insane convicts were sent there up to 1876. It was then found that the arrangements at Broadmoor were not adapted for a large number of convicts, and an arrangement was made for one of the wings of Woking Prison to be set apart for the special treatment of lunatics. A difficulty, however, arose with the Lunacy Commissioners in regard to uncertified lunatics, and ultimately the question was solved by our building at Broadmoor special wards for the convicts, who were thereupon all transferred from Woking to Broadmoor. Now we take all convicts who become insane, both male and female, from convict prisons.

13,866. What becomes of the insane prisoners under short sentences?—They go to the county asylums.

13,867. Are they detained there during Her Majesty's pleasure?—They are detained there until the expiration of their sentence.

13,868. Take such a case as this which occurred in Scotland, where a man shot at a policeman, and a plea of insanity was put in to bar the trial. He was upon that committed to the Perth Criminal Lunatic Asylum during Her Majesty's pleasure; and, at the present time, there are similar cases in Perth, where they are detained for periods generally considerably longer than they would have been in prison, if they had been sentenced in the ordinary way for the act they had committed.—(Witness.) Was that a murder case?

13,869. (The Chairman.) No; it was a shooting case. But take the case of an ordinary man, who is not sentenced because he pleads insanity. What becomes of him in England?—He comes to Broadmoor. All the Queen's pleasure lunatics come to Broadmoor, with only few exceptions. We also have there convicts who become insane while undergoing their sentence.

13,870. In the case of a short-sentence prisoner who becomes insane; he is sent to the county local asylum until the expiration of his time?—That is so, with very few exceptions. We have three or four of the short-sentence men in Broadmoor, but these are exceptional cases, sent to us on account of their violence, or for some particular reason.

13,871. When they are sent to the local asylums, are they maintained at the expense of the parishes?—No. At the expense of the Government. Criminal lunatics are paid for by the Government.

13,872. By what authority are they detained, assuming that they become sane? Has the medical officer the same powers of liberation as in the case of an ordinary lunatic? Is he bound to keep them in the asylum, or does he hand them back to the prison authorities?—At the expiration of their time they become absolutely pauper lunatics, both convicts and ordinary prisoners. If a man becomes sane before the expiry of his sentence, he must be sent back to prison. In county asylums they cannot keep a man unless they are able to certify him as a lunatic.

13,873. At Broadmoor do you believe there is a large percentage of cases in which insanity is due to intemperance?—Not a large proportion in which insanity is due to intemperance alone.

13,874. Due to what causes?—Intemperance, in connection with other tendencies and predispositions to insanity, becomes one of a number of factors that induce insanity. My experience is that, in a number of cases where men would be ordinary lunatics, and dealt with as ordinary lunatics, the excessive indulgence in drink determines towards the committal of a criminal act. In that sense intemperance has considerable weight in a number of cases in making an ordinary lunatic into a criminal lunatic. That is the only point where a kind of discrimination and distinction between the two can be made—that, in the sense of making a lunatic into a criminal lunatic, intemperance has considerable weight. But I do not believe that intemperance of itself is largely a factor in the production of insanity.

*Dr. David
Nicolson.*

29 Jan. 1895.

13,875. In this report you recommend that the institution of retreats should be encouraged for those who can provide the funds necessary for their maintenance, and that in certain cases support should be given from the rates. Have you any ideas of your own as to the particular allocation of the expenses of such retreats?—Well, of course, that particular section is one upon which a very considerable diversity of opinion might very fairly arise. My own feeling is that, if any social legislation is to take place on these lines, the wider its scope and the wider the powers that are handed over to the State so much the better. I feel that, if the State would take up the management and control of institutions of this sort, it would relieve the public mind of the feeling of suspicion due to the shutting up of habitual drunkards in institutions maintained for the interests of private individuals.

13,876. In fact, you have similar ideas of these institutions as you have of lunatic asylums. I presume that you deprecate private lunatic asylums?—I would not say I 'deprecate' private asylums. They have been going on for a sufficient length of time to have established themselves as proper places of treatment for lunatics; but in an experiment of this sort, where the 'liberty of the subject' is the great 'bogey' that is held up to the public, I think that no step should be overlooked that would tend to give those institutions a fair and honest stand in the public mind. I am sure that, if they were under State supervision and management, the friends of the patients would have more confidence in them, and the patients would feel that, if it was a matter of sufficient importance for the State to take up, they would be willing to fall in with the requirements which the State felt necessary to provide for them.

13,877. You made a recommendation (No. 11) that reformatory institutions should be provided and aided by local funds. Did you go into the question of the incidence of expense? Then, again, have you any individual ideas on the subject?—I think myself, if the place were started on a good footing, and if some portion of the cost of it came from the State or from local funds, the work which could be got from the people who came to them would go very far towards paying their own expenses, with the help got from those inmates who were able to pay their own way.

13,878. Do you get much work out of the criminal lunatics?—Yes, we get a lot of work out of the criminal lunatics. For every 1s. the criminal lunatic earns he gets 1½d. to spend in any way he likes, or to send to his friends.

13,879. How much does he earn?—It is a pity I did not bring the report. I could have shown you how much we earn. We make all our own clothing, and the uniform for attendants, and we have carpenters, shoemakers, and others employed in garden labour. The carpenters do much of our woodwork, and all the kitchen gardening is done by the inmates. Everything is estimated, not quite at outside prices, because, in the garden, the value of work ranges from 2d. to 6d. an hour. If an old cripple goes out and potters about and does a little work, we allow him 2d. an hour. But, if another man proves to be a good workman, he gets as much as 6d. an hour, and would earn for himself 2s. or 3s. a week. They may earn for the country 15s., £1, or 25s. a week, and of that they get one-eighth.

13,880. In your report, I suppose, you have full details on the subject of the value of the work. Would you send us an abstract of it?—I shall be glad to send you the actual details.

13,881. Have you the cost of each lunatic?—That is £43 or £44 a year. That does not include the interest on the buildings. There is maintenance and clothing, and the cost of the staff. Everything except the new works and ordinary repairs on buildings.

13,882. Can you give us the average earnings of the inmates for themselves?—I think it amounts to from £400 to £500.

13,883. They get one-eighth of the value of their work?—Yes. The work is estimated at so much. Shoemaking is estimated by piecework. A man gets so much for making an upper, and the making of an upper is valued at so much.

13,884. If the inmates earn £500 for themselves, it means that they have made in all eight times that amount?—Yes. If they got £500 they would have earned £4000. I see that in 1893-94 the amount they got was £573.

13,885. And they worked for eight times that?—Yes, that is so.

13,886. What work have you for women?—They do laundry work, and they make clothing.

13,887. Have you any outdoor work for women?—Not for women.

13,888. Is it not desirable in the treatment of lunatics that they should have outdoor work?—We have no outdoor work for women. The difficulty of outdoor work with us on any large footing is the cost of supervision. Our neighbours do not fancy an escape, and I have no fancy for it myself. The large garden in which they work is surrounded by a 16-foot wall. You see, our inmates are criminals, and possibly dangerous; but, with the class of persons concerning whom the Committee is inquiring, the difficulty associated with outdoor work with us would not be so much to the front.

13,889. What has become of Woking Prison?—It is now handed over to the military authorities.

13,890. Is there any provision in the English law for the mitigation of the sentence of cases of weak-minded prisoners?—They have to go by the regulations applicable to licenses, on the mark system. They would earn one-fourth of a reduction of sentence, but nothing more than that.

13,891. But, if they are weak-minded, probably they would not earn their marks?—They do not get much for industry; but for industry and good conduct they may earn 8 marks a day, and in that way may have their sentence reduced by one-fourth.

13,892. (By Col. M'Hardy.) I thought the convict regulations of England provided for the retribution of cases such as you describe, who had not been able to earn a proper number of marks when the time came for their discharge?—I should think that they would probably give a case of that kind 7 marks, as infirm cases, for good conduct without industry.

13,893. Have you observed the effects of prolonged drinking in any of the people you have seen in prison?—I have been 28 years in prisons and asylums. I cannot say I have seen such effects in many prisoners.

13,894. Have you seen anything done to eliminate the bad effects of prolonged drinking?—The only thing you can do is to keep them from drinking in the first instance, and promote their physical tone of health by work and otherwise, and re-establish a normal condition.

13,895. Have you seen such treatment tried with success in prisons, or in your own establishment?—Undoubtedly it is successful, so long as you keep them from drinking.

13,896. Have you ever followed up any case to know whether the reformation has been permanent after any treatment you have seen applied?—I am unable to say with regard to pure drink cases; but in cases where drink has been the means of bringing them to Broadmoor, and where we have discharged them conditionally to the care of relatives who have to report to me every three months any relapses into intemperance, I am bound to say that there are a sufficient number of cases who have been able to keep well after their prolonged detention in Broadmoor to warrant me in saying that their detention had produced beneficial results.

13,897. Can you give any idea of the minimum detention that would be likely to effect a cure in a person suffering mentally from dissipation?—My own feeling is that the longer you can detach him from the liabilities of a wandering and intemperate life the better. Anything short of one year or eighteen months is practically useless. I make that as a general statement. For instance, in the case of a weak-minded woman who has come to us suffering from insanity, after confinement,—a puerperal case—even after she feels herself practically recovered from active insanity, I should not allow her to go away until eighteen months have expired. I do so from the feeling that that is necessary to recover to her her tone of mind. And so it is in drink cases.

13,898. The hopelessness of the cure, I suppose, depends on the cause which produced the particular state which induced either the drinking or the insanity? What I mean is, that if you have got an organic cause, that would be more difficult to remedy than some cause that had been the result of bad habits which had been learned?—That would be a very different case.

13,899. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Have you many persons licensed out from Broadmoor?—We have on conditional release a considerable number—forty or fifty.

13,900. Of those, are there many who have originally come to the asylum because of drinking over and above their lunacy?—I should say, without speaking of those forty or fifty, that of the cases that come to Broadmoor, where the cause could be assigned, after examination, for the lunacy, I find about 30 per cent. of them are connected one way or another with drink, directly or indirectly. I would not like it to be understood from that, that 30 per cent. come as the result of drinking alone. That is a very different thing. Intemperance is a cause of criminal lunacy, but there are other causes mixed up with it which make a different set of circumstances, which have to be weighed in each case.

13,901. Can you give me any idea of the proportion of those cases that you have conditionally released on license, that have been brought in from drinking, that are behaving well after you let them out?—I would not like to put a percentage on it.

13,902. Do the majority relapse occasionally?—The majority of those who go out do not relapse. Only a small proportion come back. If they relapse I can send for them without their committing any other offence. I keep them under supervision for years, and only a small proportion of those we let out come back.

13,903. (By Dr Sutherland.) I take it that under your care you have the largest number of sane people in any insane institution?—I don't know.

13,904. I mean of those criminals on whose behalf the plea insanity at the time of the crime was pleaded, or insanity in bar of trial, and who would be Queen's pleasure prisoners. How many have you of such at Broadmoor?—About 550.

13,905. How long are these people kept in Broadmoor on an average?—Taking one case with another of those who are discharged I should say six to eight years, or something like that.

13,906. Most of these Queen's pleasure cases, I presume, are those whose insanity might be ascribed to alcoholic excess?—No; I do not say that at all.

13,907. What is the proportion of the 500 who are sent to Broadmoor who have committed grave assaults or murder, and in whose behalf insanity was set up as a bar to trial or to sentence?—I should say, speaking roughly, in above one-third of the cases intemperance has been connected with them. As I said just now, about 30 per cent. Even that is an over-statement, because I eliminated in that calculation those cases where the cause was put down as unknown.

13,908. Is it not the fact all over England, just as we have it in Scotland, that cases of brutal assaults or murder have been committed during the transitory mania of intoxication, delirium tremens, or mania a potu?—Not in my experience.

13,909. What do you think is the proportion of insane people in ordinary asylums whose insanity is due directly to alcoholism?—That I am unable to say. My own experience leads me to form no conclusion about it. I have been connected with criminal work, and I have had no opportunity of testing it. One man's standard of the causation due to alcoholism is different from another man's. Those who ride hobbies on the subject will find out a large proportion of insanity due to intemperance, and are unwilling, or, at least, do not choose to eliminate other causes that ought to be weighed along with intemperance.

13,910. In the classification of your inmates, what proportion do you put down as due to the four different phases of alcoholic insanity?—We do not classify them in relation to intemperance at all to begin with.

13,911. I was under the impression most of asylum superintendents stated how many inmates were there from over-indulgence in alcohol?—I was looking over those where the causation was known, or was believed to be known, and in 30 per cent. the word 'intemperance' comes in either directly or indirectly as a cause, along with some pre-existent condition. Where the causation is said to be 'unknown,' it makes a considerable difference in the total.

13,912. Have you any suggestions to make in regard to those cases of drunkards sent to asylums suffering from delirium tremens, and who can discharge themselves in a few days?—(Witness.) You mean voluntary cases?—(Dr Sutherland.) Yes.—(Witness.) I think that, leaving out of account the words 'disease' and 'vice,' my own impression is that the simple act of habitual drunkenness is to be regarded as an infirmity, and ought to be treated as such; that some steps should be taken for its special treatment altogether apart from the question of lunacy.

13,913. Would you be inclined to look upon the transitory mania of intoxication as certifiable insanity, though it is not at the present time in this country legally so?—No. On the contrary, I say that cases of intemperance ought to be dealt with with a much firmer hand than they have been. They ought to be kept in hand by some stronger power than that which belongs at present to the police magistrate.

13,914. In the case of patients admitted to asylums suffering from delirium tremens or mania a potu, is it desirable that they should be able to discharge themselves after a few days' residence?—I say it is not desirable.

13,915. What do you suggest should be done with those people who can no longer be certified as insane, but who still have the craving?—My opinion is that, instead of their going to an asylum, they should be taken to some institutions that partake more of the nature of a reformatory, in the sense that those people should be dealt with by the law apart from the lunacy law.

13,916. Would you be satisfied if, after the temporary insanity had passed away, these people should be committed to inebriate retreats?—They should be kept in some place for a lengthened period, whatever you choose to call it.

13,917. You think the present system by which these dipsomaniacs get out of an asylum so readily is bad?—Yes; they are a public nuisance and a danger.

13,918. Have you any suggestion to make in regard to those cases where men have been known to be intemperate for long periods, but who have not come under the cognisance of the police until they committed some fatal assault? Have you any suggestion to make as to how these people should be dealt with before they reach that point?—I think it should be to some extent a matter that should be left for the consideration of a high public official to decide whether in this or that case of the kind the person should be allowed to go at large.

13,919. What kind of an inquiry would you set up to decide the future of this individual?—I think it ought to be before a justice of the peace or a magistrate of some sort. A public state official ought to be the individual to decide; and a recommendation might be made to the Secretary of State or other official for conditional release.

13,920. Would you have the inquiry public or private?—The risk of a public inquiry is that it tends to prevent cases coming up that would otherwise appear. I think a public investigation is not necessary; but it should be held before a magistrate or properly qualified justice.

13,921. Supposing one of our recommendations was that a person who had been convicted thrice of drunkenness during a year should be liable to be had up before such a tribunal, don't you think you would have a pretty large number to pronounce upon?—They are landed on our hands at present. They appear day after day in all our courts.

13,922. Yes; they are landed on your hands as prisoners for a few days, and then discharged; but if you are going to deal with them as inebriates, and look them up for considerable periods, would the effect of taking three convictions during the year as the standard not make the number exceedingly large?—I do not think there is any intention of making a man a habitual drunkard because he has been three times before a court. In that case such institutions would become rather overcrowded. I take it that a habitual drunkard must have been before the courts time after time, and qualified in that way for special treatment. The idea was that if such a man came three or more times before the public courts in a year, then he ought to be dealt with by a public functionary for his own good and that of the community.

13,923. In regard to sureties, do you think there is any use in enforcing these against drunkards of the poorer class?—I do not think there is any likelihood of benefit coming from it in one way or the other.

13,924. Is that because nobody would become surety for people of that class?—Well, they would be difficult to find. People in the middle class, with money, can generally get some one to ask that they should have another chance. [The witness then withdrew.]

Tallack.*

MR. WILLIAM TALLACK, Secretary to the Howard Association, London, called in and examined by the Chairman.

Tallack.*

13,925. You are Secretary to the Howard Association for the purpose of promoting prison reforms?—Yes. The association exists for the purpose of promoting the best methods of penal treatment and crime prevention.

13,926. Take the case of the habitual petty offender. You say there is need for progressive detention?—Yes. It is all but universally admitted in theory, if not in practice, that the present method of dealing with habitual offenders by constantly repeated short sentences is altogether a fallacy. When we find, for example, from documents that you, Sir Charles, and Dr. Sutherland, have issued in connection with the bringing about of better legislation for the treatment of drunkards, that large numbers of men and women are convicted as many as twenty times in one year, and that, as Dr. Sutherland shows, one thirty-third of the habitual offenders in all Scotland get one-third of the sentences there, I think it shows that some change is required. In the suburb of London where I reside we have a case of an unfortunate woman who has been up about 300 times for drink and disorderly conduct. When we have such things as these constantly happening, it proves that we ought to have some better system. The system which seems to have approved itself to those who have thought of it, is to have a progressive system of sentences. I think that is a great desideratum.

13,927. What do you suggest exactly on that point?—Well, first, there is a class of disorderly persons whom I distinguish from those who are habitual drunken offenders. For these, as a sort of compromise with public opinion, I would suggest that we should introduce a system of fortnightly cumulations—very gradual cumulations of a fortnight's increase on each sentence. Supposing such a person is brought up—say that wretched woman I have mentioned—for the first time, she should be dismissed with a warning; for a second offence the sentence should be a fortnight's imprisonment; for a third offence a month, and so on. Under such a system it would take 26 sentences to reach one year, so that no one could say such an offender was harshly treated. The thing that brought discredit on cumulative sentences in the past was the extreme harshness of the cumulations, and the great length of time for which a person was imprisoned under them. That has been relaxed latterly to some extent. Formerly, they had such a system, which was favoured even by such good men as the late Mr. Barwick Baker, J.P., and the Earl of Carnarvon, under which a man for a felony could be sentenced to six months, then to two years, and then for five or seven years' penal servitude. These rather cruel and excessive leaps tended to bring cumulation into public disfavour. In America the most recent suggestions are in the same direction—to send offenders to prison for a year or two, for five years, or for life. They desire the old cumulation by leaps and bounds in contrast to what I advocate for these disorderly offenders—a gentle system of fortnightly cumulations.

13,928. I do not know what the average sentence in England is, but in Scotland, in such cases, the sentence is often very much less than a fortnight. Five days is a favourite one, I think. It ranges from 24 hours up to 30 days—the latter being considered a severe sentence?—Yes. When I was in Dundee last summer, the Governor of the prison showed me some local statistics, and I found there was a little group of women who were in and out almost repeatedly, for merely five days at a time. It would be a mercy to such poor creatures as these to cumulate their sentences.

13,929. I see you differentiate between disorderlies and drunkards; but we have not come across a pure drunk prisoner yet. So far as I remember, the prison records of all these habitual offenders is something like this: At one time it is drunkenness, at another disorderly conduct, at another assault, at another using profane language, or being guilty of indecent conduct, and so on. They ring the changes in that way without exception. You may find one had up more frequently than another for being drunk and incapable, yet the lines, as I have said, diverge into each other without exception?—Yes; but is it not found that generally these inveterates are of drunken habits? If it were not for the drink they would not be disorderly. Drink comes first, disorderly second.

13,930. I ask you that, because I see you suggest here that the progressive detention should be a fortnightly increase for disorderlies, and a longer one for drunkards. Of course, we are dealing with police-office drunkards?—In connection with that most useful measure which you, Sir Charles, and Lord Shaftesbury brought in, The Habitual Drunkards Act, you specially attached importance to the necessity of keeping habitual drunkards, both those of the better class and those belonging to the criminal and helpless class, for sufficient periods of detention to affect a cure, and the Departmental Committee of 1893 made the same recommendation. Experience shows that one year is the minimum period of detention to affect a cure. For this class of cases I suggest that they should first get a week, then a month, then six months, then twelve months, then eighteen months, and then twenty-four months. Twenty-four months should be the maximum sentence for habitual drunkenness. That would apply not merely to criminal drunkards, but to non-criminal. The worst disorderly persons should be confined, at any rate during their first sentence, with cellular separation. Drunkards should have no cellular separation, nor when they go to the longer periods need they necessarily be detained in a prison. After a time we might adopt the principle of probation and conditional liberation, placing the persons under the care of relatives, or other responsible persons, as is now done in connection with refuges and reformatories.

13,931. In the case of pure police drunkards, would you not anticipate great difficulty in finding any one anxious to take charge of them. There is your friend with the 300 convictions, do you think you could get anyone to be responsible for her good conduct?—If there was the power of the State to fall back upon

Tallack.
29 Jan. 1895.

as a reserve, even if such unfortunate persons were placed under responsible care, there being the knowledge that the State would enforce the responsibility, I think you would get such persons as the Salvation Army, some of the discharged prisoners aid societies, or other charitable persons, to take charge of them. I do not say as a rule, but in a sufficient number of cases, to warrant giving it a trial.

13,932. You say the principle of progressive detention has been in part adopted by foreign countries?—Yes; in Germany, in Belgium, and Holland at least.

13,933. Do you know what are the results?—I have visited these countries, and I found there that they did not adopt our plan of giving constantly recurring short sentences to habitual drunkards, or to habitual vagrants. I found such people were sentenced from six months up to two years. I am now speaking of Germany and Belgium. Holland is laxer. In Germany and Belgium it is the common practice to give drunkards and vagabonds long periods of detention, though not necessarily in prison. In Germany they do send them more to prison. In Belgium they have a sort of beggars' farm at Merxplas, near Antwerp, and there you find several thousands of this class confined up to several years. At Bruges there is an establishment called the depot de mendicité for 400 women, who are confined there up to two years at least. If they are sent back again after the first time, it is for an increased period.

13,934. What are they sent there for?—Begging and vagabondage.

13,935. How do they employ them?—Some of them were washing, some knitting and sewing, and doing such work as women generally do.

13,936. We have been looking for, but cannot get, any suggestion for the employment of women, except washing?—Well, they were knitting, sewing, and so on, at Bruges.

13,937. Then, what about the men?—The men are chiefly employed in farming and carpentry. Merxplas is a very extensive place.

13,938. And the financial results?—They do not look for financial success. They are not self-supporting, and, in the nature of things, cannot well be.

13,939. How are they supported?—Partly by the State, and partly by local grants. If a municipality sends a certain number of men to Merxplas, or women to Bruges, it has to contribute a certain share of their support. The same applies to Holland.

13,940. Have you been to these places?—I have been to Bruges, and I have been over some of the agricultural colonies in Holland.

13,941. Tell us about them?—In Holland they used to have a large colony at Ommerschans, but that has been closed. There is one at Veenhuizen, which is still open. This is a large establishment, with all sorts of workshops.

13,942. Can you give us the financial results?—I can only say this, that the financial results are not a success. In Germany there has been a certain measure of success, not necessarily or merely in connection with the sending of men to prison for long terms; for in Germany a large number of what are called 'Labour Colonies' have been started during the last 50 years. The result of the two systems combined—long imprisonment and labour colonies—has been this, that for the ten years from 1880 to 1890 there was a diminution of 41 per cent. in the arrests for vagabondage in Germany. That is a partial success. That is something to place to the credit account of the systems, even if they have not shown financial success. That, at all events, is a general success.

13,942A. About these labour colonies in Germany, we have had a description, more or less satisfactory, of several of them, but they were of the voluntary sort. That is to say, places to which men went voluntarily. We have been told that there are compulsory labour colonies, to which vagabond persons and petty offenders are sent, and kept compulsorily. Are you aware of any such institutions?—That might apply to Merxplas in Belgium. Some of the German prisons are conducted on similar lines. I know they have a good deal of ground round them.

13,943. These places would be practically prisons. Whether factory or agricultural prisons?—Practically that is so.

13,944. Did you visit a number of the prisons there? Can you explain their system of prison labour?—They have a very wholesale system of prison labour. I went through a series of workshops, one after another, in which I saw almost every kind of industry that could be mentioned. And they have a large variety of industries in the women's prison.

13,945. They let out prison labour there to contractors, don't they?—Yes; I think so.

13,946. Do you know of any papers or books in which the system is described?—There are official reports of the German prisons. There is also a work which comes out once in three months, on the reports of prison officers, called Blätter für Gefängnissekunde and it contains a great deal of information about the German prisoner. There is one very important point which applies to all these establishments. They are all congregated, and it is admitted that they all fail to reform. In Germany, as I have said, it is quite true that they have reduced the arrests for vagabondage by 41 per cent., but they do not reform. Nearly all the vagrants and beggars in the three countries named have been sent again and again, and for this reason, that they are all associated together. Some years ago, the Dutch Minister of Justice informed the Howard Association that institutions of the nature of factory prisons were preferable to agricultural establishments in which the men were thrown so constantly into association. In the prisons they could be kept separate; and that element of separation was most important, both from a reformatory and deterrent point of view. I see that in the Dutch beggar farms they send the same people again and again. Of course, that is not so often after all; perhaps because they keep them there a few years. They run up to half a dozen and fifteen and twenty times.

13,947. You attach great importance to separation; how do you square that with the system adopted in this country in juvenile reformatories and industrial schools?—That is rather different, though it does apply to a certain extent. But these reformatories and industrial schools are for juveniles who are less corrupt. You have the young, fresh mind to deal with, and it is more pliant. You have not with juveniles—except, perhaps, with a few—the very vicious element to deal with that you get in men and women. Then there are certain indulgences allowed in the Dutch labour colonies, not at all conducive to discipline. They are allowed their jollifications, and they smoke together, and so on. It is a principle, both in the treatment of paupers and prisoners of all kinds, that you should not make crime and pauperism attractive.

13,948. Did you go over any Scotch prisons?—Yes; I went last summer over a large number of Scotch prisons, from Dumfries to Inverness and Aberdeen.

13,949. You have told us that prison life should not be made too comfortable. In England, we found that the treadmill is largely used for men. In Scotland, I believe there is not a treadmill in the whole country. Do you think that a desirable or undesirable state of things?—Well, I confess, since I became Secretary to the Howard Association, my views have gradually undergone a change on that point. When I first became Secretary I held, I suppose, the general popular opinion that such things as treadwheels, and so on, were very undesirable, that they were cruel and a waste of labour. But, during the last thirty years, so many improvements have been introduced into our prisons, that they are now little distinguishable from our poorhouses. In some respects there are some prisons that are more comfortable than poorhouses. Some poor people who have been in both have said that they preferred the prison. I speak of English prisons. I do not absolutely commit myself to the exact approval of the treadmill, but, I think, you must have some deterrent element to prevent prison becoming attractive.

Mr. William
Tallack.
29 Jan. 1895.

Mr. William
Tallack.
29 Jan. 1895.

As to the Scotch prisons, I was very much pleased with the Scotch officers generally; but as to the system, my impression is that in Scotland at present you are not sufficiently deterrent in your treatment of offenders.

13,950. Let us go back to the treadmill. What do you say about it?—That all prisoners coming into an English jail have so many days on the treadmill. That is all the penal labour prisoners get who are pronounced fit.

13,951. Have they the treadmill in all English prisons?—Not in some of the smaller prisons; but they have the crank or some equivalent. They are all subject to a hard and not attractive form of labour; but not in Scotch prisons.

13,952. You spoke of a waste of labour. Oakum picking is pretty much a waste of labour, is it not?—I object to it as a waste of labour, and that it does not combine the deterrent element of the treadmill.

13,953. As the result of practical experience, and after careful consideration of the question, there is neither crank or treadmill in Scottish prisons. In many Scottish prisons there is no harder labour than a certain amount of oakum picking. As an official of the Howard Association do you advocate the treadmill and crank, or the Scottish system?—I must guard myself, in the first place, by saying that in my view there are two classes of prisoners. There is what I may call the unfortunate class, such as some of those poor disorderly creatures, prostitutes, and weak drunkards.

13,954. We are talking of male prisoners?—Well, there is the unfortunate class for whom I would not give the treadmill. But there is another class—the ruffian class; the class guilty of ruffianly conduct towards women and poor beasts; for them we ought to have a strong deterrent element. I was told that in several parts of Scotland there had been a serious increase on assaults on women and upon children, and I believe that is owing to the very lax sentences that are given and the absence of a deterrent element. If such persons as these had in Scotland the treadwheel, or something of the sort, or even the whip, it would do very great good to the country. I should not advocate that for a poor unfortunate creature.

13,955. For incorrigibles you are in favour of that system?—For incorrigibles of the ruffianly class.

13,956. Ruffianism per se is not a crime that the law takes cognisance of. A person may be the mildest unmanly man that ever scuttled ship or cut a throat, but if he proceeds to scuttle a ship or cut a throat he is punished for that. I presume you would keep the treadmill for certain ruffians, and for the repetition of petty offences?—I would not give this strongly deterrent punishment for the repetition of petty offences. I think cellular imprisonment would suit that better.

13,957. Take disorderly cases, in which you recommended progressive detention?—You do not want the treadwheel there.

13,958. But if your recommendation were carried into effect, in the English prisons, up to 28 days, the disorderlies would get the treadmill?—Not necessarily. All these things must be considered on their own basis.

13,959. You mentioned whipping in certain cases. What sort of cases—wife beating?—I am not in favour of flogging by the lash; but for the brutal ruffian class I think a whipping would be a deterrent. We were speaking about the results of long sentences. In the United States there are legions of tramps. The question of the unemployed is a great one in the United States; and there they are treated generally with great leniency. But there is one State—the State of Connecticut—which, being one of the old Pilgrim States, I suppose, does things differently. The Howard Association had a letter some time ago from one of the State Commissioners of Prisons there, in which he said that in that State they treated the tramps differently from what they were treated in some of the other States. In Connecticut they sent them to prison and kept them there from four to eight months, and the result, he says, 'has been phenomenally good.'

13,960. That would be considered a very heavy sentence in this country for vagrancy, though not so heavy a punishment perhaps as the whip?—I do not recommend the whip for vagrants.

13,961. As a general rule, we have had no evidence before us yet that increased sentences diminished crime. I think I may say that we have had no evidence that shows that heavier sentences decrease petty forms of crime? I wish to ask your opinion upon that point. Have you any figures on it that you can vouch for?—I have used the word detention purposely as distinct from imprisonment for this reason: I do not believe mere punishment as punishment will put an end to these incorrigibles. But I use the word detention whether for disorderlies, or drunkards, or vagrants. I mean, it to be taken in connection with reformatory efforts. And by the word 'detention' I mean liability to detention, especially with reference to the system of probation and conditional liberation. I believe we might substitute to a large extent for our present system of imprisonment a system of liberation or probation. On the general question of vagrancy, I have had this morning a very interesting and important letter from the chief constable of Chester. The Howard Association is constantly collecting information from practical men, and this morning I have received a letter from Captain C. L. Fenwick, the chief constable of Chester, regarding this question. He writes as follows:—

'Town Hall, Chester,
January 28.

Vagrancy.

'Dear Sir,—I am very fully employed at present, yet I must just send you one line in reply to your query. 'During the Lancashire cotton famine, between 20 and 30 years ago, an unusual number of tramps were relieved in Chester, say in round numbers 13,000. 'Last year I see it was 13,807. You will see that our work has been of a Sisyphean character. We get no nearer. Our public policy, at least as far as dealing with vagrants is concerned, is of the laissez faire order. There is a lack of anything like an intelligent grasp of the problem by the powers that be. As to the magistrates and their practice: the average J.P. is the same everywhere. You get extreme men both ways. Of course, this question, like others, will be allowed to go on until something must be done, and our history tells us that in such a crisis the method chosen is not always the gentlest. I think that this matter will, for us, become a question not of dealing with the poor unemployed, but strictly one of self-defence. Then the people will wake up.'—
Yours, &c.,
C. L. FENWICK.

13,962. That letter, so far as I can see, does not throw much light upon the solution of this problem. Do you know about the facts at Chester. Why it should be worse than other places?—It is near Liverpool; and in Lancashire there is a great deal of distress at present from want of employment.

13,963. This brings us to a very important matter in connection with vagrancy, and that is the question of the granting of employment by the State or the local authority to the unemployed. That is, I presume, what the chief constable is driving at?—I don't imagine it is. He means to point to the very great importance of going to the roots of this matter.

13,964. We have been trying to go to the roots of this matter for the last three months, and we have not found the roots yet. Generalities do not bring you any nearer the roots.—(Witness.) If you go to the roots you get at the causes. Now the causes of vagrancy apparently are want of employment and intemperance. There is one other chief cause of vagrancy, and that is strikes which throw men out of employment. Then there is another great question which some hold keep men unemployed, and that is the want of a bi-metallic standard.—(The Chairman.) I do not think you need go into that.—(Witness.) The question is whether some of these things are not the causes of the evils we wish to see remedied?

13,965. (By the Chairman.) As secretary of the Howard Association do you advocate the provision of employment by the localities or by the State for the unemployed in the way it is being demanded by a certain set of persons?—Only to the same extent that Sir Robert Rawlinson gave employment during the Lancashire cotton famine—by giving aid by piece-work. That was a great success. The deserving poor were willing to work, and, by giving them piece-work as a test, it drove away the loafer-class men who would not work. You could not do better than refer to Sir Robert Rawlinson's report on the cotton famine. A most useful blue book on this subject, containing inquiries respecting the unemployed in this and other counties, was issued last year or the year before. In Birmingham they have adopted that very plan we have been speaking of. They offer employment, and, at the time I am speaking of, they had what they called a test-house. Some twelve years ago the Howard Association instituted a general inquiry on the subject of vagrancy and mendicancy, and received replies from a large number of people entitled to speak on the subject. The clerk of the Birmingham Union wrote at that time:—

'We stand almost alone in the country. All other places have a large increase of this class. We have a large reduction. Six or seven years ago our average was about 400 per week. It is now only 170 per week. This, no doubt, is attributable to the fact that we strictly enforce the bath and task of work. We prosecute all offenders. Idleness and the love of a roaming life are no doubt the principal causes of vagrancy, and its repression and prevention would be very much easier if guardians had power to detain for a much longer period than they now have. Mr Hedley, local government inspector for the metropolitan district, thinks that even a week would not be too long.—Signed, Walter Bowen, clerk to the guardians.'

13,966. This man says he attributes the falling of in the number of vagrants from 400 to 170 to the strict enforcement of the bath and task of work. Is not the bath enforced everywhere?—I suppose it is very generally enforced. They seem to have a peculiar experience. He says, 'we prosecute all offenders.' That means that they carry out the Mendicancy Act.

13,967. That is that they prosecute those men who do not do their task of work, or are disorderly?—Yes, that is so. I wrote to this same gentleman, Mr. Bowen, and I got a letter, dated the 26th inst. He says:—'Dear Sir,—In reply to your letter of the 23rd inst., I beg to say that we have had an increase of vagrancy, but not to the extent that some other places have had. With regard to the test-house proper, we closed it long ago, as we had entirely broken down able-bodied pauperism. We have since opened a test ward in the workhouse proper, and it is doing its work.'

13,968. You are aware that, under the Scotch law, no able-bodied man is entitled to parochial relief?—I understood so. The case of Sydenham throws some light upon this subject. Some years ago, at Sydenham, a number of the inhabitants took up this question of the great nuisance of vagrancy, and they got the magistrates and the police interested in it. The laws were put in force against vagrants and beggars; those convicted were remitted to prison, and, to a large extent, the neighbourhood was cleared of beggars. But after a time the magistrates relaxed their strictness, and then the old nuisance came back. Our chairman, Mr. Francis Peek, resides in Sydenham, and he asked me to mention this case as throwing light on the subject. We had a letter from the chief constable of Staffordshire some time ago, giving us the results of inquiries he had made as to what these vagrants managed to get. He says they get from 2s. to 2s. 6d. a day, besides victuals. The average vagrant would thus get 15s. a week and his victuals. That is a tremendous task upon the poorest class of the population, when you think of the many thousands of vagrants going about the country; and I believe they are as bad in Scotland, if not worse, than in England. To think that these men sweat out of the poorest labourers 15s.

a week and their victuals, shows the tremendous importance of the problem.

Mr. William
Tallack.

29 Jan. 1895.

13,969. Yes, but the difficulty is to deal with it. In the places where they make the most fuss about vagrancy there are ample powers, but the people won't make complaints against the beggars, and help the police to put the law in force.

13,970. Besides, in counties, you cannot find a policeman readily to give a beggar into custody, even if you were willing?—We had a letter from the late Sir Charles E. Trevelyan, from Wallington, Northumberland, in which he said:—'That in this pasture district of Northumberland vagrancy had become so intolerable a grievance that when the men were out of the farm the women often locked themselves up, or kept loaded guns against the intrusions of tramps.' If the people would take a greater interest in it, and combine and secure the influence of the magistrates and the police, as at Sydenham, something would be done.

13,971. If the people would do it? It is their own business, but it apparently does not trouble them sufficiently for them to put themselves about. The law is there, and if the people do not make use of the law it is their own affair?—There is one reason why people do not—and this does go to the roots. They consider that the law is too harsh to them, and they give to them because they consider them objects of pity—that is a point.

13,972. I see that in Gloucestershire they give every vagrant half a loaf of bread?—In Gloucestershire, Berkshire, and Dorsetshire there is a system very much akin, whereby the tramp in search of work can have relief. There are stations about five miles apart at which they can get a piece of bread, and at certain stations they can have lodgings for the night. These the police chiefly manage.

13,973. Have you read any recent reports on the subject?—I have not read many recently. I think the system has been of some use.

13,974. I saw in a copy of the Police News, or some organ of the police officials, a report of a meeting which had been held in Gloucestershire, in which it was said that the state of things in Gloucestershire was not so good as in another county where no such plan is in force?—It is not considered a decided success. It is admitted that it is not, and for this reason, that there is still a popular belief that vagrants are hardly used. The late Edward Denison, who resided a while in the east end of London, gave great attention to this question. It was his view that one of the chief causes of indiscriminate almsgiving is the apprehension on the part of a benevolent public that there is from time to time danger of starvation to the destitute through the difficulty experienced by them in obtaining with the necessary promptitude assistance from the relieving officers of the district. He thought arrangements should be made by the police, or some other authority, to take every beggar in hand, and relieve him; that the law should no longer make an act of begging penal, but only manifest persistency in that act—the manifesting of an intention to prey upon society—that should be penal. If the police find a beggar in want, he should get food and be sent on. Each case should be investigated on its own merits, and inveterates sent to prison. Mr Frederick Hill, who was inspector of Scotch prisons for many years, and gave great attention to the investigation of this question, writes as follows:—'The best way, in my opinion, of preventing vagrancy, is, on the one hand, to take from the public all motive for indiscriminate almsgiving, by providing numerous places at no great distance from each other, where, in exchange for work (on the part of the able-bodied), an applicant can get plain food and shelter; and, on the other hand, to strengthen and vigorously enforce the law against begging imposters.' They have a vast number of shelters in Germany that give this sort of relief, but on rather a more liberal scale than the mere bit of bread; and arrests for vagrancy have diminished 41 per cent. there in ten years.

13,975. Do you happen to know how many vagrants

Mr. William Tallack.

29 Jan. 1895.

there are in England?—I cannot answer that. I don't believe any one can.

13,976. You say that only a small proportion of them apply to the authorities and casual wards?—That is a very important thing whatever arrangements you make for these wards. And for dealing with the vagrants by the police or otherwise, a great proportion of them, it has to be remembered, keep out of the way of all authority and official arrangements.

13,977. You say the object should be by the cure of intemperance and other causes to cure vagrancy?—We must go to a root of the matter, and that is drunkenness.

13,978. And that everything should be done to prevent strikes and consequent loss of employment. That, you think, would diminish vagrancy?—By the recent coal strike in Scotland, and by the one before it in England, vast numbers of men were deprived of employment, and the effect of these strikes was this, that trade was driven to Belgium and Germany; then, when the strike was over, employment could not be found for all, some had to go to England, some to America, while others remained at home to swell the ranks of the unemployed, and go upon the rates. It is not merely our own country that is suffering from vagrancy. I was astonished to find from some statistics I looked at, of last year, in some Australian newspaper, the immense amount of vagabondage in Australia. In the United States they calculated that there were 400 000 tramps. The problem is therefore world-wide.

13,979. Now, as to juvenile offenders. Your idea is that they should be tried and treated separately from adults?—To a large extent, of late years, juvenile offenders have been separated from adults in prisons and industrial schools. I think we should go further on the same lines, and have separate courts for them; and that we should have more of this probation and conditional liberation system. I think reformatories and industrial schools are made far too much use of, and at a most unnecessary expense to the public. We should make an endeavour to enforce parental responsibility.

13,980. How are you to enforce parental responsibility?—We could do that if the magistrates would offender inflict a small fine, say of 2s. 6d. or 5s., on parents that could pay.

13,981. Let us take the case of a petty crime committed by a child, you cannot punish the parent for the child's crime?—You can make the parent pay the fine.

13,982. Take a very common form of offence, a child stealing. He is brought up, and the question is how is he to be dealt with. What are you to do; you cannot make the parent pay a fine?—You can send him to prison if he does not.

13,983. But you cannot punish crime vicariously in that way?—If the parent is able to support his children, and does not do it, he should be compelled.

13,984. But we are talking of offences committed by children?—Well, I say bring home the responsibility of these to the parent.

13,985. I think we must be talking of different subjects. Supposing a child picks a pocket, or commits a petty theft, what are you to do?—I will give you an illustration of what I mean. I spoke on probation. In the State of Massachusetts, which has been the pioneer in regard to probation for juvenile offenders, they have now for many years adopted the plan of bringing children before a separate court, where there are separate judges or justices to try them. Instead of sentencing them to a reformatory in general, or to prison, they sentence them to so many years probation. They won't send a juvenile to prison or to a reformatory if the probation officers can manage to get some of their relatives and friends to keep them out of mischief.

13,986. That is very much the principle of the First Offenders Act in this country?—It is precisely the principle of the First Offenders Act in this country, barring the probation officer. It is also adopted in Australia.

13,987. Have you any documents about this Massachusetts arrangement?—I have not here. Some years ago the Howard Association sent an account of it to the Home Office, and the Home Secretary of the day—Sir William Harcourt—printed it as a State paper. I have referred in my book "Penological and Preventive Principles," to the Massachusetts' plan. It has given such satisfaction that it has been copied in several of the Australian Colonies—Victoria and South Australia. I may mention that a system of probation has been adopted for many years in London, and is very little known.

13,988. If there is any definite and authentic information about that Massachusetts' plan, we shall be glad to have it. Can you give us any reference?—Our correspondent in Massachusetts was a Mr Savage of the police.

13,989. Have you anything more recent than the letter which has been printed? Have you anything to show whether the thing is going on, or whether it has been discontinued?—It is still going on. So it is in the Australian Colonies. They have a State Council in South Australia, which takes charge of a very large number of these cases. In their report for 1894, it appears they dealt with a total of 998 cases. Of these, 599 were boarded out, 251 licensed to service, 46 were adopted by people, 9 were placed with relatives on probation, and so on. South Australia has not gone so far in this matter as the neighbouring Colony of Victoria. But the probation is carried out in these Australian colonies more by unpaid individuals than is the case in Massachusetts, where it is managed by paid officers of the State. They adopt the voluntary element more in Australia. It is extending there, for they attach very great importance to it. In London there has been for many years, in connection with the City of London proper, a system in operation which has prevented the imprisonment of apprentices by practically placing them in probation, and which is very little known. The City Chamberlain of London, whose offices are at the Guildhall, has a certain legal control over all the apprentices in the city, who number between 1500 and 2000. These apprentices may be brought before him by their master or by their parents for any little offence, such as stealing, or disobedience, or anything of that sort, and he has authority to send them to Bridewell. There is only 1s. fee to pay for bringing them before this court. It is a private court, but the relatives are allowed to be present. But the proceedings do not get into the newspapers. The offenders can be sent to a private prison near Blackfriars Bridge for three weeks; but it is the rarest thing for the City Chamberlain to send them to prison. His method of procedure has been uniformly probation for many years past. He has, in fact, been carrying out the First Offenders Act long before that act was passed. He tells them that, if they are brought before him again, he will send them to Bridewell, and he allows them to go in the care of some one who becomes responsible for them.

13,990. Such a jurisdiction and the maintenance of such a court is a relic of barbarism. You don't advocate that?—The system of probation is a good one.

13,991. This court gives masters the power to deal criminally with their apprentices for breaches of contract, which the civil law would describe probably not altogether in accordance with their views. I don't think we need go into these.—(Witness.) It also affords protection to the apprentices as against their masters. I was in Luxembourg last summer, and there is a plan there practically of probation for young children. They are placed with friends or others practically on probation—the State retaining the power to deal with them if they offend.—(The Chairman.) We have all that in this country. There is a regular system of probation in connection both with our industrial schools and reformatories in this country. It is done every day in this country.

13,992. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Have you seen the recommendation of the Prisons' Guild of Ontario, Canada, 1891, in regard to habitual offenders?—There have been so many recommendations. I don't think I have seen that particular one.

Mr. William Tallack.

29 Jan. 1895.

Mr. William
Tallack.
29 Jan. 1895.

13,993. In regard to vagrancy—I understood you to say to the Chairman that the police are the proper authorities to deal with it, and not the poor law authorities?—No; I did not say not the poor law authorities. I meant that the police might usefully supplement the work of the poor law authorities. So many of these vagrants are dishonest, and prey upon society.

13,994. (By the Chairman.) You promised to give us your views on birching children as a means of dealing with juvenile offenders?—I do not recommend birching, except for the class of ruffians, whether juvenile or otherwise. That has been recommended by many persons of experience. For instance, in Australia, there is a class of young ruffians, called 'Larrikins.' They are not children, they are young men.

13,995. Well, but let us speak of birching. It is provided in this country as an alternative for imprisonment in the case of boys under a certain age. We have been recommended to extend that age; and, on the other hand, views have been expressed contrary to the practice. It is a thing that one does not like to do to send a juvenile offender to prison, if there can be found any alternative, such as birching. To save them being sent to prison, do you think it desirable to make that recommendation about extending the age?—I think I approve of solitary confinement as a far better punishment generally than birching, except for ruffians.

13,996. You prefer to send an ordinary child—a boy 15 or 16 years of age to prison, and give him solitary confinement rather than birch him?—Except in cases of brutality. I was reading a book the other day by Mr H. A. White, who was for 30 years one of the warders in a Victorian prison in Australia. In it he says, 'The only system which I believe has the least chance of effecting reformation must include separate treatment, not only for first offenders, as now, but throughout the various grades. Let association, whether at labour or otherwise, be the one thing carefully withheld, except as a reward after long period of good conduct, and the jail will soon be regarded, as it ought to be, with terror.' . . . 'Separate either of these (the larrikin or the tramp), and all the larrikin's "cheek," and the tramp's indifference, ooze out. He will not come there again if he can help it. The wisest and most experienced officers of the Penal Department have all been unanimous in advising separate treatment.' That is what Mr White says. Personally, I do not recommend the birch, except for the particular class of cruel ruffians. I believe that separate confinement is better. More reformatory and deterrent, and it is the best treatment for all persons who are really criminal.

13,997. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Would public opinion in England support you sending a child of respectable parents—boys of from 9 to 14 years of age—to prison for breaking a window, playing football on the street, or for stealing an apple from a shop door, when you have the alternative of birching them?—I do not think either birching or prison would be necessary. In nineteen cases out of twenty, the present system of probation—the carrying out of the First Offenders Act—would be sufficient. If it is necessary to send children to prison, let it be for brief periods, and let them be kept separate rather than congregated.

13,998. I know you have long been an advocate of separate treatment; but if you had to choose between birching a child and sending him to prison for a petty offence such as I have mentioned, which would you select?—If I were put on the horns of such a dilemma then I should say birch.

13,999. Is it not a fact that every parent who has got a boy requires occasionally to birch him?—Solomon himself has all along recommended the birch.—(Witness.) You spoke of public opinion. My view is that the vox populi, instead of being the vox dei, is often the reverse, especially in regard to matters of prison management. In these I am suspicious of public opinion.

14,000. I understand you to advocate the lash for ruffians?—Not the lash but the whip! Brutes must be treated in a different manner from other persons.

14,001. Is there any other method of punishment less brutalising and yet quite as effective as the lash?—Yes; solitary or separate confinement. I mean a separate system of imprisonment, which must separate them from all bad influences, but not from good. They could have plenty of visits from good people outside, and plenty of occupation and exercise. There is a difference between that and the old solitary system.

14,002. No one knows better than you the brutalising and unhuman effect of prisons in by-gone days. How do you justify now the lash as being a method of making bad men good, or of recovering them from criminal practices?—Not in the slightest degree. I have never justified the lash. I draw a distinction between the whip and the lash or the cat-of-nine tails. The horse whip is a different thing. I say that a man that kicks his wife, blackens her eye, breaks a child's limb, or brutally treats a horse or other animal—such a man as that cannot be degraded, or brought lower by the application of the whip. He is at the very lowest state already.

14,003. I understand you to indicate to the Committee that in Scotland things are about as pleasant in the prisons as they well can be?—I think you cannot very well go further without endangering the public safety of Scotland.

14,004. Do you think a plank bed, a monotonous and only sufficiently nutritious diet to prevent loss, the withdrawal of all the normal conditions of life, is not a sufficient punishment and deterrent for nine-tenths of the offences for which prisoners have been committed?—Well, I don't approve of the plank bed for the unfortunate class.

14,005. You would rather make it more comfortable?—I think that there is a want of classification at present in Scotland for prisoners. The prisons are quite deterrent enough—too much so, for the unfortunate class. But it is not for this unfortunate class merely, but for the brutal, that we want a deterrent.

14,006. I was surprised at your approval of the treadmill or the crank as a means of the reformation of prisoners?—I do not say as a means of reformation, except in the sense of a deterrent. Reformation and deterrence must be largely separated. I think it is a mistake to think that we can make our penal prisons as such, into reformatories. The sentences in prisons should be sharp and short, and then the prisoners should be turned into a reformatory.

14,007. What do you suggest as an improvement in the present system?—Very much the same sort of thing that was suggested by Sir Walter Crofton. At first a deterrent element of imprisonment, and, after that, a reformatory treatment. I visited the reformatory Irish prison farm at Lusk twice. No one would have thought it to be a prison. There were no walls, and the hedges were so low that a man could step over them. But that prison was not considered a success, and for this reason, that there were 200 men congregated together. It fell out that, according to the old scriptural principle, 'Evil communications corrupt good manners.'

14,008. But man is a free agent and a gregarious animal, and even these men would be restored to society in time?—Yes; but society counts of good and bad. At the prisons it consists mainly of the bad element.

14,009. (By Prof. Dove Wilson.) You mentioned that in Germany there was a power of sending habitual drunkards and vagabonds for long periods to prison?—Up to two years or more.

14,010. Can you give me any reference to them. I have been told so several times, but I have been searching the German laws, and cannot find this one?—I was told so, when I was there. I will try to get the reference.

14,011. (By Col. M'Hardy.) I understand your desire would be, as representing the Howard Society, to see the tread-mill worked in every prison in Scotland?—No! I do not say that, because we have not the tread-mill in every prison in England. I am not an admirer of tread-mills; but either the tread-wheel or some such

Tallack.
29 Jan. 1895.

Mr. William Tallack. element is necessary somewhere for the brutal and ruffian class.

29 Jan. 1895. 14,012. You are going to have some sort of physical machine, brutal probably in itself, in design, and mechanism, to deal with a certain class of prisoner; that is what the Howard Association would like?—I don't recognise the word brutal.

14,013. Well, perhaps the word is strong, but I am talking about a machine with axles and pinions not necessarily applied to work, but to some sort of cruel treatment of the men. How would you distinguish that treatment of the tread-wheel or crank as compared with labour such as an ordinary workman does?—Well, an outside workman is an honest and praise-worthy man; but I am speaking of this particular class of the cruel and brutal. You must either whip them, or have a tread-wheel or something which shall keep them out of these most mischievous practices. I mentioned before the class I referred to—a man that kicked his wife, who broke a child's limb, or brutally treated an animal. We must have that put a stop to somehow.

14,014. How would you characterise the sort of machine with which you would mend men as distinguished from the manual labour which is done in the country?—I don't understand the question.

14,015. Taking you as representing the Howard Association—a name associated with all that is high and noble in Penology—how are you to distinguish the tread-wheel or the crank—a rough arrangement of machinery—which you would use for these brutal offenders, as distinguished from the sort of labour which, as a punishment, has been inflicted in Scotland up till now. The labour is the same as any ordinary workman does—the punishment being arrived at by the quantity and the quality of the enforced labour?—I think I merely said that the tread-wheel or something of the sort was necessary where the prisoners had their discipline relaxed. In Scotland you have had the discipline relaxed to a considerable extent, and also in some English prisons, by allowing the prisoners to work together. If you allow prisoners to congregate together, you must counteract that.

14,016. You think that no ordinary labour, whatever the task—making bricks, for example—would be good enough to be a deterrent punishment?—I don't say that, because that is the system in convict prisons where the labour is severe and prolonged. But, for ordinary prisoners, we consider that short periods and cellular separation are the best system. Of course, you may make any kind of labour deterrent if you make it long enough.

14,017. Do you mean long enough per diem?—Long enough detention.

14,018. You think the tread-wheel may have a certain amount of deterrent effect every hour of the day?—Certainly.

14,019. Is it your Society's view that that cannot be produced by ordinary labour?—Not without separation; though in longer sentences you may do it.

14,020. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncreiff.) You wish to use some sort of labour which would be peculiarly repulsive to a certain class of prisoners?—Yes, because it cannot be extended over a series of years.

14,021. (By Col. M'Hardy.) I do not think you have yet said that you think it is impossible to produce a deterrent effect by ordinary labour if the task is heavy?—I have not said that.

14,022. If you can get deterrence by a certain task of ordinary labour, why ask for machinery of a cruel kind, like treadwheels and cranks?—I do not ask for it. I would rather see prisons without it. I merely say that, if you have sentences so very short as they are at present for habitual offenders, and if you have so many assaults on women and children as you have in Scotland now, you must have some kind of deterrent element which you do not seem to have.

14,023. When you speak of assaults upon women and children, do you mean indecent assaults?—Yes.

14,024. Are you aware that these have diminished of late? The numbers in 1893 were 82, as compared with 107 in 1884?—I was told, when I was in Scotland last year, that there were a great number of these cases. I took up a paper in Inverness one day, and I saw a paragraph headed 'A Severe Sentence.' I was astonished when I came to see what that 'severe sentence' was. It was a sentence of two months' imprisonment on a young man for indecently assaulting a girl. And yet an intelligent Scottish newspaper called that a severe sentence.

14,025. Well, but you see that the statistics show that the number of cases of that class of crime is decreasing, even with a very large increase in the population?—I hope it is so. My informant, I daresay, was speaking generally.

14,026. (By the Chairman.) You spoke about convict labour as a deterrent. Do you know if there are as many re-convicted convicts in the English jails as we have in Scotland?—I cannot say off-hand what the percentage is.

14,027. We have come across in Scotch prisons a good many ex-convicts?—We also have many recommended convict prisoners.

14,028. But have you many ex-convicts in local prisons?—Yes, I think so.

[The witness then withdrew.]

DR. HENRY WESTWOOD HOFFMAN, Inspector of Retreats under the Inebriate Acts, called in and examined by the Chairman.

14,029. You are Inspector of Retreats under the Inebriate Acts?—Yes.

14,030. That is not the only position you hold?—No. I am Inspector also under the Burials Acts.

14,031. I presume that the inspection under the Burials Acts occupies the greater portion of your time?—Yes.

14,032. In connection with the Inebriate Acts, would you please tell us how many retreats there are at present?—There are eight retreats at present.

14,033. Have you details about them?—The names of the institutions and their size are given in my last annual report for 1893. The report for 1894 is not out yet.

14,034. Kindly mention the names, and any other particulars?—I will take the male retreats first. Kingswood Park, near Bristol.—The licensees are T. Walter Brimacombe, M. Isabella Brimacombe, and R. W. Brimacombe, L.R.C.P. Lond., M.R.C.S. Eng. The last-mentioned gentleman, who, as you will see, is a licentiate of the College of Physicians, acts as medical attendant. It is licensed for 10 male patients. The Dalrymple House, Rickmansworth, Herts.—The licensee is R. Welsh Branthwaite, L.R.C.P. Lond., M.R.C.S. Eng. It is licensed for 20 male patients. High Shot House, St Margarets, Twickenham, Middlesex.—The licensees are Douglas Anderson, M.B., C.M., and R. Welsh Branthwaite, L.R.C.P., M.R.C.S.

14,035. Mr Branthwaite has two retreats?—His father was licensee of that retreat, and eventually the son succeeded him, though not resident. It is licensed for 10 male patients. Tower House Retreat, Westgate-on-Sea, Kent.—The licensees are A. F. Street, M.A., M.D., B.Sc. (Cantab), and Bridgman Smith. It is licensed for 20 patients, 14 male and 6 female. That is the only example of a mixed retreat. Then we have the retreats for women only. St Veronica's Retreat, Burlington Lane, Chiswick, Middlesex.—The licensees are Mrs. Isabella F. Smith and Hannah Maria Hanson. It is licensed for 25 female patients. The Grove Retreat, Egerton Road, Fallowfield, near Manchester.—The licensees are Mrs. Mary Hughes and Mrs. Elizabeth Pritchard. It is licensed for 25 female patients. Then there is one other small retreat at Daisy Bank, Walsall, Staffordshire.—The licensees are F. J. S. Gray and F. J. Gray, L.S.A. It is licensed for 10 female patients. Since 1893 one other retreat has been licensed to Dr. Edward Norton, for the treatment of 8 male patients, at Capel Lodge, near Folkestone.

14,036. Am I correct in stating that the Dalrymple Home stands by itself in one respect,—that it is carried on by a society who do not make any gain out of it, that the articles of association provide that any profits shall not be divided, but shall go to the improvement of the retreat, and that therefore it is purely a philanthropic experimental retreat, and not a private money-making concern?—That is so.

14,037. I have in my pocket a letter which I received the other day from the licensees of the Bristol Retreat, in which they make some suggestions as to the Inebriates Act; and they say that the restriction as to the retreats being licensed for males or for females only should be done away with. But I see you have one mixed retreat?—Yes; the Tower House Retreat.

14,038. So that there is no legal impediment to the institution of mixed retreats?—No.

14,039. In connection with these retreats is it also competent to have a certain number of patients not under license, simply voluntary patients?—They are all supposed to be voluntary patients under the Act.

14,040. What is the procedure for reception into a retreat?—The person goes before a justice, and declares that he or she is a habitual drunkard, or an inebriate within the meaning of the Acts, and volunteers to undergo detention for a given number of months, not exceeding twelve.

14,041. Thereupon the justice commits a person to a retreat, and the licensee of the retreat has legal powers of detention?—That is so.

14,042. In addition to these retreats there are a large number of unlicensed retreats?—Yes; but with these I have nothing to do.

14,043. Do you think there is quite as much necessity, or do you think there is some necessity, for the inspection of retreats and homes which are unlicensed where habitual drunkards are detained against their will, without any legal preliminaries, by persons who do not even produce those testimonials of character which are required in the case of licensees under the Act? Don't you think that these unlicensed places would be as much benefitted, or stand as much in need of inspection, as licensed places? What is your opinion on the point?—Well, there was that remarkable case that happened a few months ago—the Zierenberg case. That was a voluntary home; and I think that if it had been inspected by some independent person, it would have been a good thing. Whether it would be advisable to have all of them inspected, I am not quite sure.

14,044. What objection is there to the inspection of all of them?—It would require an army of inspectors.

14,045. Supposing there are three unlicensed retreats for every licensed one—you have only eight retreats inspected; it would not require an army of inspectors if you multiplied eight by three or four?—I should fancy there would be more than three to one. I fancy so, but I have nothing to do with them.

14,046. Can you tell me how many patients are in these retreats, and how many have gone through them since the passing of the Acts?—About 800 patients have passed through the retreats up to 1892.

14,047. Were those all patients under the Acts, or voluntary patients?—All patients under the Acts.

14,048. Have you any details concerning the results?—No.

14,049. (By Col. M'Hardy.) How many years do these figures run over?—1830–92. That is about 60 or 70 a year. At first there was only one retreat.

14,050. (By the Chairman.) Your jurisdiction extends over Scotland?—Yes; but there are no licensed retreats there. Neither are there any retreats in Ireland.

14,051. I suppose you have no cognisance of the fact that there are several retreats in Scotland?—I have not.

14,052. In visiting a place where habitual drunkards are received without any formality, certain members of the Committee saw one man, whom the superintendent of the place told us was in for drunkenness—sent in by friends. This man came and loudly demanded his liberty. The superintendent told him that he would have his liberty in two months, which was the time he had undertaken to stay there, and then only if his friends allowed him. Do you think that a detention such as that should be permitted without some sort of legal formality?—I do not.

14,053. Would not the occurrence of such cases as these justify inspection being extended over places where habitual drunkards are received and detained?—I think so.

14,054. If that were done, don't you think it would have a great tendency to make people come under the Act?—Yes. I was not aware that private patients were treated in the way you describe.

14,055. I am not talking of any bad treatment. The superintendent of the retreat in question was acting, as he thought, in the patient's interest; and was doing what he conscientiously believed to be right. But you have said that you think such an occurrence as that shows the necessity for some official inspection?—I think so.

14,056. I wish to ask you further, whether you do not think that the allowing of unfettered liberty, and an absence of inspection of these unlicensed retreats, is not a premium to people who have retreats to keep outside the Acts?—Yes, that is possible.

14,057. The names of the Acts have been changed from the Habitual Drunkards to the Inebriates Acts?—That was done when the Act was amended.

14,058. Do you think it is advisable to keep the name 'habitual drunkard' in the declaration? Do you think people have any objections to that?—Yes, the patients do object to that. They prefer the word 'inebriate.'

14,059. Do you think it is important that they should change the term?—It would be better changed.

14,060. No one can find fault with the 'Inebriates Acts'; but I find in the 'Request for Reception into Retreat,' it says:—'The above-named . . . signed this application in our presence, and at the time of his (or her) doing so we satisfied ourselves that he (or she) was a habitual drunkard within the meaning of the Inebriates Acts?'—Yes; these are the words of the schedule.

14,061. If the schedule were amended also, do you think it would increase the popularity of the Acts?—I have heard that patients, when before the magistrates, thought it rather bad to call themselves habitual drunkards. I think it would be desirable to amend the schedule so far.

14,062. Is there any other amendment under the Acts, as they at present stand, that you would suggest as desirable?—Well, there is one thing I should like to mention. I was reading Mr Morton's Draft Bill, and one thing in it I thought was very good, viz., as to what should happen after a patient had signed a request before a magistrate for reception into a retreat. It says:—'On receiving the order from the sheriff, the applicant, with the assistance, if necessary, of any of the attendants of the home, or of the officers of the law, can remove the patient to a home.' At present there is no such provision, and we have had several cases in which the applicant has signed a request for reception and then refused to go to a home, and the licensee had no power to make the patient enter his retreat.

14,063. Is there anything else you can suggest?—I think the attestation of two magistrates is unnecessary. One is sufficient.

14,064. Have you come across many obstreperous cases of habituels?—Several, from time to time.

14,065. We had one witness before the Departmental Committee who mentioned the case of a man who was in an inebriate retreat, and desired to get out, who set to work and broke all the windows, and made himself so disagreeable that they were glad to dismiss him?—We have had several cases of that sort.

14,066. That might be easily remedied, might it not, by bye-law; or would it require legislation to make that an offence which would render a man punishable in the same way as an inmate of a poorhouse is liable who tears his clothes?—Yes. I think there is a clause in the bye-laws of railway companies which provides for the punishment of a passenger who, by his disorderly conduct, annoys his fellow-passengers. A provision of that sort would be desirable.

14,067. Do you know whether, as a matter of law, the Home Secretary has power to make regulations?—He has power to make regulations.

14,068. Could he make a regulation making that an offence that should be dealt with by magistrates outside?—I should hardly think so. [Witness promised to put in a copy of the rules of the Secretary of State.]

14,069. Examination continued.—Have you many drunkards who have become insane?—Not more than two or three during the whole fourteen years.

14,070. We were informed that in Scotland, in these unlicensed retreats in which habitual drunkards are received, there had been at one time a considerable number of lunatic cases discovered. Would that, in your opinion, constitute another reason for putting unlicensed retreats under inspection?—It would.

14,071. I see the rule as to the separation of the sexes says:—‘The license shall, in cases where patients of both sexes are received in a retreat, make due provision for the separation of the sexes at night, and at all but defined hours in the day time.’ Does that take place in these mixed retreats?—It does.

14,072. By the way, there is a provision in the Act for liberation on license; is that availed of at all?—Very often.

14,073. Then, is it easy to recall persons who violate their parole, and take to drink?—Yes, they are occasionally sent back.

14,074. Is notice of liberation on license of a patient sent you?—Always.

14,075. How many have been so liberated on license?—A considerable number. I cannot say exactly how many at this moment.

14,076. I may mention that the intention of the promoters of the Act in connection with that provision was this: There are many persons who have periodical fits of dipsomania, and it was thought, if these could be got into a retreat until the fit passed over, and then let out on license, they might go quietly about their business as before. Do you know whether that provision is used by any such cases, or do you know in what cases it is made use of, or is any explanation sent you?—A copy of the magistrates’ order for leave of absence is sent to the Home Office.

14,077. But you have no record of the number?—No.

14,078. What are the charges made at these licensed homes?—At most of them the charges are two and three guineas a week, and they go up to four and even five guineas a week for patients who have private sitting-rooms.

14,079. Tell us what is the minimum charge?—The minimum charge is from nothing in the Fallowfield Retreat, supported by benevolent people in a great degree, up to £2, 2s. for the better class of patients.

14,080. In the Fallowfield Retreat are the patients required to work?—They are required, and do work.

14,081. They are under inspection, and it is your business to see that there are no people illegally detained, so that the system can be carried on without danger to individual liberty. Do you know the Kennington Oval Asylum?—Yes; I think it is an additional argument for the inspection of private retreats.

14,082. There is a rule that ‘a patient detained in a retreat shall not, without the written permission from the licensee of the retreat, enter any public-house, or other house where any intoxicating liquors are sold.’ If he offends that rule, how is he punished? Where is the enforcing power behind the rule?—I suppose he could be prosecuted for the infringement of the rule.

14,083. And if prosecuted, what can be done with him?—It would come under section 25 of the Act. ‘If an habitual drunkard, while detained in a retreat, wilfully neglects or wilfully refuses to conform to the rules thereof, he shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Act, and shall be liable, upon summary conviction, to a penalty not exceeding £5, or, at the discretion of the court, to be imprisoned for any period not exceeding seven days, and at the expiration of his sentence (if any) for such offence, he shall be brought back to such retreat, there to be detained for curative treatment, until the expiration of his prescribed period of detention in the retreat, and, in reckoning such period, the time during which such person was in prison shall be excluded from computation.’

14,084. That seems perfectly clear that it is competent for the Secretary of State to make a rule that a patient would be guilty of disorderly conduct if he broke the windows, and would be guilty of an offence under the Act, for which he might be punished by imprisonment. Therefore, you do not want any more statutory powers beyond that?—No, I think that is so. As a matter of fact, the punishment dealt out to a person of that kind at present is to be ‘gated’ by the licensee to the house or grounds.

14,085. You thought there was no power under the Act to meet that sort of thing?—I have changed my opinion. I see a rule could be introduced to meet the case of a disorderly person.

14,086. As a matter of fact, keepers of these retreats guard themselves from loss by patients getting themselves discharged by demanding payment in advance?—That is so.

14,087. Is the Fallowfield Retreat the only one into which patients are received for nothing?—There is also one at Chiswick, a Roman Catholic Retreat, attached to a convent. There, I think, they take them for next to nothing.

14,088. There they are obliged to earn their own living?—Yes.

14,089. There is nothing in the Act compelling them to work?—They might refuse to work, but, as a matter of fact, they do not.

14,090. As a matter of fact, do you find women less tenacious of their rights than men in connection with these retreats?—I do not know. I have not noticed it. Few, if any, complaints are made to me about work by these women.

14,091. I don’t mean about work, but the restriction of liberty?—No!

14,092. How often do you make an inspection of these retreats?—I generally make them about every two months.

14,093. In cases of deaths occurring, is there any investigation?—I do not make investigations. Notice of death is always sent to me. I suppose it would be my duty to investigate if I thought there was anything unusual.

14,094. You have summary powers of cancelling licenses?—Yes, I believe so. Section 23 states that, ‘If any licensee of any retreat knowingly and wilfully fails to comply with the provisions of this Act, or neglects or permits to be neglected, any habitual drunkard placed in the retreat in respect of which he is licensed, or does anything in contravention of the provisions of this Act, he shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Act.’

14,094A. And that offence renders him liable to what?—That is dealt with in section 28. ‘Any person not being a habitual drunkard detained in a retreat, who is guilty of an offence against this Act to which no other penalty is affixed, shall be liable, on summary conviction, to a penalty not exceeding £20, or, at the discretion of the court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding three months, with or without hard labour.’

14,095. These rules of the Home Secretary must be read in connection with the Acts?—Their infringement is an offence under the Acts.

14,096. So that if a patient without permission enters a public-house, he may be sent to prison for seven days?—That is so.

*Dr. Henry
Westwood Hoffman.*

29 Jan. 1895.

14,097. Again it says:—'Without special written authority from the medical attendant of a retreat, a patient shall not take any intoxicating liquor or sedative narcotic, or stimulant, drug, or preparation;' and if he did take that he could be sent to prison for seven days?—Yes.

14,098. Again there is a rule regarding attendants—'That every attendant and servant shall be duly informed of the offences specified in the Acts, and of the penalties attached to the conviction thereof. They shall also be furnished with a copy of the "Regulations and Orders" authorised by the inspector. And it shall be the duty of the licensee to prosecute every attendant offending against these acts or these rules, and, in case of conviction, to dismiss the offender from his service.' An offence by an attendant would, I suppose, come under section 28, which renders him liable in a penalty of £20 or three months' imprisonment, with or without hard labour?—That is so.

14,099. I find, further, that the final order is:—'That Regulations and Orders (not inconsistent with these rules) for the domestic arrangements of the retreat, and the management and treatment of the inmates thereof, shall, within the month from the granting of the license, be drawn up by the licensee, and by him be submitted to the inspector; and such rules, when approved by the inspector, shall be adopted and strictly observed in the conduct of the establishment.' I suppose a breach of these regulations would constitute an offence against the Act, and render attendants and patients liable?—Well, it has been considered by the Home Office that these regulations are not penal.

14,100. But it is not a matter of the Home Office. Here you have provision for them in the final rule.—(Professor Dove Wilson.) A breach of these regulations would hardly be a breach of the Home Secretary's rules.

14,101. Are there any means of enforcing the regulations you sanction?—No.

14,102. Do you think there is any necessity for such means?—I do not.

14,103. (By Col. M^r Hardy.) Have you seen any good results arising from the confinement of the patients and their treatment?—Yes. Every case improves in physical health and weight.

14,104. I understand the actual confinement in a retreat does not extend beyond a year?—No, it cannot. A patient must be liberated at the end of twelve months.

14,105. Can they be renewed?—Yes, but there are some difficulties about renewal.

14,106. Does the improvement on the inmate commence and go on rapidly at first, and then, having arrived at a certain stage of equilibrium, little change after that is observed?—Very little change after that period.

14,107. What is the average duration of that period?—According to the severity of the case. It may be a fortnight, it may be two months or more.

14,108. Do you get in two months at a stage of physiological equilibrium?—That is so in some cases.

14,109. (By Dr. Farquharson.) You are not disposed to recommend the universal inspection of institutions, however small, for the reception of inebriates whether private or public?—I thought it would be unnecessary; but the Chairman has given me arguments which lead me to think that perhaps it would be advisable in some of the larger ones at all events.

14,110. You mentioned one or two cases where you thought evil is done: do you think suspicion attaches to these places?—I know very little about them.

14,111. Would you think it advisable to place the treatment of inebriates on the same footing as that of lunatics—that no one should be allowed to take an inebriate into his house without having authority from the State to do it?—I don't think that is necessary.

14,112. Do you think there is considerable advantage from what may be called the domestic treatment of inebriates as carried on in Scotland in different parts of the country?—It is carried on in England too. Many medical men and clergymen have one inebriate patient in their houses.

14,113. Then you think that the influence of home and domestic life would be of service?—In some cases.

14,114. What is the precise object of the inspection of your office; what are you supposed to find out or do exactly?—My inspection is to see that the house is in a proper sanitary condition; that the bedrooms are suitable, and to interview patients in order to ascertain if they have any complaints to make, and whether they are properly treated by the licensees, and so on.

14,115. Of course, your office differs from that of an inspector of lunacy, who has to find out whether the person is insane or not?—I don't go into the matter as to whether they are inebriates or not; that is previously settled by the magistrates.

14,116. Do they ever make complaint to you about their method of treatment, and that sort of thing?—They do make complaints. Some serious, some trivial. One of the most serious complaints is that when before the attesting magistrates; the effect of their application was not explained to them as required by the Act.

14,117. You mean to say that they do not find out till they get to the retreat that they may be detained for a year?—I read you this Form No. 3. The above named signed this application in our presence, and, at the time of his (or her) so doing, we satisfied ourselves that he (or she) was a habitual drunkard within the meaning of the Habitual Drunkards Act, 1878-79, and stated to him (or her) the effect of this application, and of his (or her) reception into the retreat, and he (or she) appeared perfectly to understand the same.—(Witness.) Well, they complain of not being informed.

14,117A. I suppose many of these people are hardly in a mental condition to appreciate the full significance of a legal statement like that?—Many of them say that they never read the Act. I can quite understand that many of them, although not actually drunk at the time, were in such a condition as not to be able to appreciate magisterial explanations. They often say "I did not know what I was signing."

14,118. Do the keepers of these institutions ever complain to you that their operations are hampered by not being allowed to keep their patients long enough? Would they like to have them for a more prolonged period?—Yes; they think they could do more good if the period of detention were longer.

14,119. Have you formed any opinion on that point?—I agree that in many cases periods longer than 12 months would be more beneficial.

14,120. Would you make the initial period longer, or would you make it discretionary to prolong it if necessary, or would you have another application to the magistrates and another legal process?—No, I would prefer not to have another legal process. There is considerable difficulty in getting the patients to sign before the magistrates. That is necessary under the present law.

14,121. You would leave it to the discretion of the medical men?—Yes.

14,122. Would it not be an element of suspicion that the licensee wanted to keep a patient longer for pecuniary considerations?—I was about to say an outside medical man called in for the purpose. I would not give that power to the licensee.

14,123. Is there any systematic direct treatment pursued in these institutions?—Yes, very often. They use bromides and sedatives.

14,124. Have they ever tried these various cures—the Tyson cure and the Gold cure?—I don't know. I don't think so.

14,125. Do you know anything about them?—Nothing specifically.

14,126. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncreiff.) What class of society do people come from who are in these retreats?—All classes.

14,127. How are the poor patients supported?—When I say 'all classes,' I don't mean the very poor, except at Fallowfield and Chiswick.

*Dr. Henry
Westwood

29 Jan. 1895.

Dr. Henry Westwood Hoffman.

29 Jan. 1895.

14,128. The friends of the patients are obliged to support them. Does it come on the rates at all?—Not at all on the rates. It must be done by the friends of the patients or by charity.

14,129. There are probably instances where friends would be glad to send patients if they were able to afford it?—Oh, yes. May I read you some of the occupations of inmates in the Dalrymple Home?—Retired naval officers, retired military officers, medical practitioners, students of medicine, barristers, solicitors, artists, professors, civil servants, clerks in holy orders, merchants, and so on.

14,130. Is there any effort to make them work outside these places—to get up in them any wholesome interest in life?—Yes, they work.

14,131. What sort of work?—Carpentry, painting, photography, and so on.

14,132. These things are rather playing at work by lazy people?—Well, possibly. Then they have games. Golf and Tennis, and so on.

14,133. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Are you satisfied with the definition of a habitual drunkard, as settled by the Act of 1879?—Yes, I think so.

14,134. Do you consider it necessary, in regard to the police drunkard, that the number of times he has been convicted of drunkenness should be specified before certification was made; or do you think the definition of the Act of 1879 is adequate, without specifying any number of times?—I think it would be advisable to specify the number of times in each case.

14,135. Are you satisfied that the mode of procedure now adopted is sufficient to deal with all cases of habitual drunkards?—(Witness.) The method of inquiry before the magistrates?—(Dr Sutherland.) Yes!—(Witness.) I think that it could be simplified very much.

14,136. In what way?—By having only one magistrate, or even by having only one medical certificate or a letter from a parish clergyman.

14,137. Do you think the liberty of the subject sufficiently safeguarded by that simple procedure?—I think it would.

14,138. Do you know of any judicial procedure which, in the main, depends on the letter of a clergyman?—No! But are you speaking of voluntary patients in existing retreats, or are you speaking of patients to be sent to retreats by compulsion?

14,139 (Dr Sutherland.)—I am speaking of any habitual drunkard, who, whether voluntary or compulsorily, is sent to a retreat, and I ask whether the mode of inquiry at present is adequate to protect him from the possibility of injustice?—I think the two classes ought to be divided. I think the patient sent compulsorily ought to be better safeguarded than the patient who appears before a magistrate voluntarily.

14,140. You know very well that a great many voluntary patients are conussed into going?—Yes. Moral compulsion is used sometimes.

14,141. With a certain degree of threat that, if they do not go, the funds will be withdrawn, and they will be turned adrift?—That is moral compulsion.

14,142. Would you be inclined to mix voluntary and compulsory drunkards together?—No.

14,143. Do you think the introduction of a compulsory clause into the Act of 1879, for the well-to-do classes, would have the effect of sending more voluntary patients into the homes than there are at present?—I do.

14,144. The element of compulsion would make more people avail themselves of voluntary homes?—I feel sure of it.

14,145. Are you in favour of mixing dipsomanics with lunatics?—Decidedly not.

14,146. Supposing habitual drunkards were ten-times more numerous than at present—to whom would you entrust their cure and control?—To the State.

14,147. Is there any existing department of the State to whose care they might be entrusted?—I believe not.

14,148. The Chairman.—Are they not entrusted to the care of the Home Office, who has deputed you to safeguard them?—(Witness.) I think compulsory patients ought to be confined in State retreats.

14,149. (By Dr Sutherland.) Have you any say in the management of these retreats?—I, as inspector, can make suggestions, and, if my suggestions are not adopted by the licensees, I report to the Secretary of State, and, if he thinks fit, he orders them to be carried out.

14,150. (By the Chairman.) The Secretary of State, on your recommendation, can make a rule, and then any infringement of that rule becomes a statutory offence?—Yes.

14,151. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Are the two retreats where the patients are received gratuitously only for women?—Only for women.

14,152. Is there any place where male patients would be received at £2, 2s. a week?—There was one, but the license was not renewed.

14,153. (By the Chairman.) Where was that?—Near Walsall. The licensees did not apply to the magistrates for a renewal of the license.

14,154. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Then I am right in assuming that at present there is no place where a male inebriate could be received under an annual charge of something like one hundred guineas?—That is so. There were one or two rules made by the Secretary of State which I suggested should be amended, and they were amended.

14,155. (The Chairman.) That was during the days of Mr Matthews?—Yes. Nothing has been done since. One of the rules amended was with reference to patients' letters. It reads:—'The licensees shall post or forward all letters written by the patients of his retreat according to the intention of the writers, unless he shall have good reason to know that they are written for the purpose of obtaining intoxicating liquor or other prohibited articles, or of promoting the escape of a patient. He shall also deliver unopened all letters and parcels addressed to his patients, unless he has good grounds for believing that they contain prohibited articles, in which case he may require the patient to open such suspected letter or parcel in his presence.' That regulation was very much shorter, but it was amended on my recommendation, because it was found that the incoming letters for patients very often contained stamps and money, and the parcels prohibited articles, such as drugs, preparations of opium, and sometimes intoxicating liquor. Since it was amended there has not been so much difficulty.

14,156. (By the Chairman.) The licensee of a retreat can stop letters containing stamps?—He may require the patient to open all letters in his presence.

14,157. If there is money or money's worth, he does not allow his patient to have it?—He is authorised to take it, but only by a regulation and order which I sign. There is nothing in the Act, or in the Rules, to that effect. But it is found absolutely necessary as a matter of discipline. If a man happened to be out walking, and gave his attendant the slip, if he had no money in his pocket, it would be of no use going into a publichouse. They would not give him drink. But if he had money it would be different.

14,158. When parcels or letters are suppressed, they are sent to you. Are many sent?—I have had several letters, but not parcels. I have reported to the Secretary of State, who has ordered that the letters should be delivered to the patients unopened when they go out of the retreat. There is a case just now, when a contentious patient refuses to open a parcel, and the licensee refuses to give it to him unless he does open it. That parcel will be sent to me in all probability, and will be given to the patient when he goes out.

14,159. That is under a rule made by the Secretary of State?—Yes.

14,160. How do the patients know of these rules and regulations?—The patients know the rules, because there is generally a copy of them posted up in each bed-room.

[The witness then withdrew.]

Dr. Norman
Kerr.

29 Jan. 1895.

NORMAN KERR, M.D., F.L.S., Chairman of the British Medical Association's Inebriates Committee; Dr. Norman Kerr. President of the Society for the Study of Inebriety; Physician to the Dalrymple Home, Herts; and Vice-President of the International Congress of Medical Jurisprudence, was called in and examined.

29 Jan. 1895.

14,161. (By the Chairman.) You have been associated with the question of legislation for the habitual drunkard about from the time of its conception?—For 34 years.

14,162. You are, I think, the gentleman mainly instrumental in getting up the Dalrymple Home?—I was.

14,163. Am I right in stating that the object of that home was to show what could be done by means of a well-managed retreat for the treatment of inebriety?—Yes, for the medical cure, on scientific principles, of inebriety. As a matter of fact, the original Habitual Drunkards Act was only passed in a temporary form, and it was considered that some results must be shown during the experimental period. The object was to demonstrate under open conditions that it was a scientific experiment. Therefore this Dalrymple Home was established, as Dr Hoffman has informed the committee, by a company authorised not to put limited after its name. The object of it was purely philanthropic. And it was debarred by the Articles of Association from making any profit. The medical staff and the officers have no pecuniary interest in the whole concern. It was made simply a scientific experiment. I may say that, at that time, very few people believed in its success. The largest donor to the institution did not believe in it at all. This donor looked upon it simply as money wasted, but, having promised to give the money, did not draw back.

14,164. Would you please tell us the results of the work there: The numbers who have passed through it, the number of successes, and the number of failures?—These are the figures for this year which expired at the end of January 1895. We opened in 1884, and of 377 discharges during nearly 11 years, 122 are known to have done well; 14 more are improved; not improved as far as can be ascertained, 142; insane, 5. These were cases where insanity very often developed practically in a few days, or in a week or two after admission; 23 have died; and not heard from at all, 71. That made 377.

14,165. Do these 122 doing well extend over 11 years?—Not all of them. Some of them only for a year, some of them for the 10 years.

14,166. In the course of your experience have you found that, in the case of many of those you mark as doing well, there has been some back-sliding?—Well, that would not apply to this total, because it is revised every year by the latest intelligence we get of the patients. Some that would be under that heading one year might be under another in another year—as not improved, or as improved.

14,167. Do you happen to know, apart from that total, whether, after men go on doing well for two or three years—whether in the whole lot of 'doing wells' you have any considerable percentage of relapses?—Yes, there are some relapses. Speaking from a far larger observation than this, I can say there are considerable relapses every year. But this residuum of 122 represents very nearly permanent results.

14,168. That is about 27 per cent.?—Yes. It is really more than it appears to be, because some, to my knowledge, who have done well, do not want it to be known that they were ever in a home. One of the best cases I ever had in this home would not have it known that she had ever been there. But she has been cured nevertheless for many years.

14,169. You don't admit that the results shown by these figures are the best obtainable?—By no means.

14,170. You complain of the shortness of the period for which they are detained?—Yes; with people promising cures in six weeks the tendency is for patients to go in for a shorter time. Their friends believe that they are to be cured in three months.

14,171. Do you think the maximum period of twelve months not long enough?—It is not enough in many cases.

14,172. You would have that amended?—I would. I should like to see it extended to three years, as in one case abroad, with a fresh sentence on lapse after that, as there are in some other countries.

14,173. What other countries?—In San Francisco a person is restrained till he is pronounced competent to go out by two-thirds of the trustees. In this San Francisco home the average residence has been very short.

14,174. Is it a voluntary home?—That home is supported largely by a certain percentage of the police money. That is money from the revenues of the police.

14,175. From fines?—Probably.

14,176. You are sure of that?—One of the trustees who is in town at present, and might have been here only he is very unwell, told me so. The buildings were provided by the State, and a large amount of the revenues come from the State. I think as much as 700 dollars on an average, monthly.

14,177. I should like to get some detailed information as to the claims of this institution upon the fine fund of the police; the amount it receives, and the section of the Act empowering it?—I have asked my friend Dr. M'Donald, who is a very old gentleman, and who is ill at present, for information, and he has written for particulars. I have only been able to get from him some viva voce notes, such as he could recollect.

14,178. You mentioned other countries?—In Connecticut there is a maximum of three years for dipsomaniacs.

14,179. Is that voluntary or compulsory?—That is compulsory. In most of these cases in America there is provision under the Act of Incorporation of the home itself, in addition to the general law of the State. In the Washingtonian Home, Chicago, police court cases are detained in many instances for the remainder of the sentence, or the period liable to be sentenced for. If incurable, there is permanent detention. In New Jersey, on the order of a judge, or certificate of two physicians, the patient can be detained till in the discretion of the officers he may be discharged. At Zurich the least term is four months, and it runs up to twelve months. After that term is expired, and the patient is uncured, there can be a new agreement. In the Canton of St Gall, in Switzerland, the period is from nine to eighteen months, compulsorily. In Untervalden the plan is generally up to eighteen months, which can be doubled on relapse. You will find that general in Switzerland.

14,180. Do you know anywhere else where they have a law holding on to the fines?—Not exactly the fines; but that might, perhaps, come under the head of maintenance. In Zurich and St Gall one-tenth of the revenue from the alcohol monopoly goes to them. There are several homes in America which receive a percentage of the license money. I have noted two of them. Washingtonian Home, Chicago, founded in 1867, gets 10 per cent., and the Fort Hamilton Home, Kings County, New York, also founded in 1867, gets 13 per cent. These are the only two I am positively aware of in this position, but I know there are others in America.

14,181. You don't know any others where the fines come in?—The San Francisco one is the only one I know.

14,182. About the period of detention. You have mentioned a number of cases where there are great facilities for recommitment on relapse, and for rather prolonged periods. The State, I take it, has control of these institutions?—Quite.

14,183. You cannot have a second term without a second process?—You must begin de novo, in Britain.

14,184. Do you say that legislation should be amended on that point in this country?—I think the maximum ought to be, even under the present system, —three years. In many cases I recommend two years, two and a half years, and three years; and at the Dalrymple Home there have been patients who stayed, voluntarily, after the twelve months, and have also gone in for a new term entirely.

Kerr.*

29 Jan. 1895.

14,185. There was no cause of detention?—None whatever, unless their voluntary desire for a second term. Under the present system they are all voluntary patients.

14,186. Would a magistrate take a declaration that a person was a habitual drunkard after having been sober for a year?—That is a disputed point. If a patient goes out and relapses I think some magistrates now would hold that he is a habitual drunkard. I do not know that any would if he did not relapse.

14,187. Then, have you relapses in order to get a second year?—I am afraid so.

14,188. What is the longest term you have had any patient?—I cannot say; I have no information on that. For the full period of twelve months there have been 87.

14,189. You know a great deal about other homes?—About a number of them.

14,190. You are an authority on the subject, and I wish to ask you if you have reason to believe that many of the homes have been or are managed in such a way as to be money-making concerns for the licensee, but without any regard to the welfare of the patient?—Yes; I have known instances. I might mention one now closed. There have been other homes carried on in a loose way. There was that home of the Zierenbergs. That was not under the Act. I cannot say very much about those that are licensed. There are very few of them altogether.

14,191. As to the system of licensing and inspection, you are aware that the inspector of inebriate retreats had this function added to duties that were probably sufficiently absorbing?—Yes.

14,192. Do you think the inspection is as efficient as you would like to see it? I say that without the smallest reflection on the inspector?—I think he has done his duties well.

14,193. Do you think the inspection would have more justice if the entire time of the inspector was devoted to it?—There is little to inspect at present. Only a certain proportion of places are under the Act. That is one of the greatest practical evils at the present time.

14,194. That is a point of practical importance. There are a great number of unlicensed places where habitual drunkards are received. We came across one place in Edinburgh where the first patient that we interviewed told us she had been kept in for five years. She complained that she had been sent in by her husband for a few months, and her husband would not let her out; that is to say, he would not supply her with means to go out. Do you think that where people can be detained—there were 15 or 16 women in this retreat—for prolonged periods, there should be inspection?—I think no inebriate, any more than a lunatic, should be retained either in a public or private asylum or retreat without the power of inspection.

14,195. Do you think that the present state of the law which exempts non-licensed houses from all inspection puts a premium upon abstention from coming under the provisions of the Acts?—Undoubtedly. Many people do not want to come under the law. Their friends don't like the idea of their being seen by an inspector. They do not wish it to be known that they are there at all.

14,196. But the fact of the inspector seeing them does not do them any harm?—Not at all. I wish to see every precaution taken; because, knowing of those few instances mentioned, and knowing of disasters which have occurred privately, I think there is at the present moment unlimited power of abuse, in places not licensed. It is a very difficult thing at some places where inebriates are kept for even their friends to get at them. I have heard some heart-rending details of cases of that kind.

14,197. You mean of people sent in by friends—a husband or wife. Someone else could not be got at by their friends?—And in some cases they had great difficulty of getting away out of the clutches of individuals who kept these places.

14,198. In the case of people applying for license they have got to produce testimonials of character?—Yes.

14,199. It is very much the same as the certification of the respectability of a person applying for a public-house license?—Yes.

14,200. Any one can set up an inebriates' retreat?—Yes. Clergymen, doctors, and laymen, who know nothing whatever about it in many cases.

14,201. You think it would be a great improvement to have a record of all places where inebriates are received and detained to have all these places licensed, and to have them inspected?—Quite so. At all events, there should be a power of inspecting them. A great deal of mischief arises at present from want of that.

14,202. Do you know anything about places for inebriates in Scotland?—Not practically. I have not been in any of them.

14,203. You have no experience of cases sent to them?—Yes.

14,204. Of Skye?—Yes.

14,205. A number of cases are sent to islands on which there are no public-houses?—Quite so.

14,206. I suppose you find that good?—In some cases. I have not found much advantage in that. There have been a few rare cases. Some people with almost any treatment reform themselves, with a little outside assistance. Even with quack cures, or anything else, a certain proportion will be cured.

14,207. You have mentioned quack cures. I know you have gone into these pretty extensively. There are some members of the Committee greatly interested in that branch of the matter, would you please tell us what your experience in connection with them has been?—One experience has happened only within the last day or two, and it will be probably quite sufficient to cite it. There is secrecy in all this kind of thing, and therefore a want of proof. But this poor clergyman came to me a year ago to advise with me about his son who was a very intelligent man, but a morphinomaniac. He came back to me only on Sunday last. The son had gone in for one of these cures. They took him away for six weeks into the country, and they cured him of morphinomania; but he is now a worse drunkard than ever, because he is an alcoholic drunkard. I know there are other instances that have come to my knowledge, where 75 per cent. of the cure was alcohol, so that they simply substituted alcohol drunkenness for opium drunkenness. I don't mean to suggest that all cures do that.

14,208. In connection with these, were you not mixed up with some dispute in which legal proceedings at one stage or other were threatened?—Yes. An action was brought against the Lancet, and against another medical journal who reported a speech of a gentleman who had been at one of those institutions looking after it, and who brought a great many American papers over here which were filled with accounts of disasters—from insanity, death, and so forth—which were attributed by physicians in America to certain cures. An action was brought, but, in the long run, it was withdrawn and, all costs paid.

14,209. There was an intention of going on with the action?—The whole defences were ready, I know.

14,210. Without going into detail, your opinion is that there is nothing in any of these cures?—I think there is a psychological element in them all. Otherwise a patient would never get cured. As to the drugs, they must be powerful. They seem to be either a potent drug intended to make the patient sick and disgust them with liquor, or they are strong nerve tonics, given in doses which probably an ordinary physician would not dare to do.

14,211. If sickening them, it would be tartar emetic?—Or ipecacuanha or apomorphine.

14,212. You speak of nerve tonics?—Yes, strychnine; which is probably the most powerful of them all.

14,213. Do you think that a judicious combination of the tartar emetic and strychnine treatment could do permanent good?—I have seen that kind of treatment do good when it was done openly, and the patient's will was carried with you, and he was desirous of being cured.

14,214. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Don't these poisons balance each other?—They do, when taken together; but there is the effect of them administered at different stages. I know nothing about the cures myself.

14,215. (By the Chairman.) You have had occasion to deal with a large number of cases of habitual drunkards?—Perhaps more than any other man in this country? With somewhere about 2000 now.

14,216. Do you use drugs in their treatment?—Yes.

14,217. Tonics?—Yes. Strong tonics, but only in moderate doses. Such as would not produce any immediate dangerous effect.

14,218. You believe that the only real cure is the placing of the habitual drunkard in such a position as to prevent him getting drink?—Well, I find in the case of a certain portion of them, if they have a certain amount of will power, or even those without much will power, that a sudden nervous shock will alter the whole conditions of life, and then they go on all right. I have known of a man and his wife suddenly, without any apparent inducement of any kind, and after twenty years of drunkenness, suddenly make a resolution never to touch drink any more, and keep it. They were very ordinary people. In every batch of patients, large or small, you will be sure to have a certain proportion who have that reserve of will power in them.

14,219. But the great majority?—The great majority of cases require seclusion. Decidedly! I should say eight-tenths.

14,220. And the separate seclusion consists in keeping them from drink?—And temptation. Many, of course, are predisposed to drink through mental infirmity of some kind of incipient insanity.

14,221. You are the president of the society for the study and the cure of inebriety?—Yes.

14,222. That presupposes that it is to a certain extent a disease?—We believe it to be a disease. I may say that, 33 years ago, one of the first cases I saw was a young man. I sent him out to the State of Maine, to one of the country parts, as in five-sixths of that State there was no liquor to be had. That man did very well. There were no institutions of the kind we know now. He simply went out there, and kept from liquor.

14,223. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncreiff.) He had the will power enough to stop there?—Yes. He was young. That was one thing in his favour.

14,224. (By the Chairman.) You mentioned the abuse of morphia. We got a letter the other day from the licensee of a retreat near Bristol, suggesting several points, in which he considered that the Inebriates Act should be improved. One thing he said was that the Acts at present did not provide for people who used morphia and other drugs; is that so?—Yes. I may say that in this evidence I am speaking practically for the great mass of the members of the British Medical Association. Being Chairman of the Committee, we have gone over all these points repeatedly, and have memorialised the Home Office, among other things, on the want of a provision of this kind in the Inebriates Acts. It is not so in several other countries. And it would be an enormous advantage to include inebriety by any drug of any kind.

14,225. Have you got the words there of any Act?—For instance, in Manhattan Island. The Inebriates Act, for it is given in full in my book. In the case of the St Saviour's Retreat for females, these words occur in the law of 1892:—'That such female is incapable of or unfit to properly conduct herself in her own affairs by reason of habits of periodical, frequent, or constant drunkenness, induced either by the use of alcoholic, or vinous, or other liquors, or opium, morphine, or other narcotic or stupefying substance.' There are many other homes which can take patients addicted to the use of opium, morphine, and cocaine, but we have none in this country.

14,226. You mentioned cocaine. Is that frequently used?—Not so much here as in America. But it is increasing here.

14,227. Has it any particular effect?—It is probably the pleasantest, and has fewer drawbacks than any narcotic drug in this country.

14,228. What dose do they take?—As much as 30 grains a day are injected, if the disease has been going on for a long time; and yet somewhere about one-seventh or one-sixth of a grain has been known to prove fatal. But, by a gradual process, people can get to use enormous quantities. In this country it is more used along with morphia. A good many literary men and literary ladies take, perhaps, 20 or 30 grains a day of opium and 20 grains a day of cocaine, and the two together have a tremendous effect on the system.

14,229. But these must be great epicures to mix their drink in that way. We have heard of antipyrin being used?—I have had some experience of that. Antipyrin is not so narcotic. It belongs to that class of substances which may be taken without having any dulling effect on the mind, the brain, or the morals. Tobacco, tea, coffee, all of these are of the nature of antipyrin, and have more or less effect on the nervous system, and other organs, but they do not bring people into criminal paths, unless they become insane.

14,230. And cocaine?—It works very rapidly. It is more powerful than almost anything else, and obtains a greater hold sooner than anything else.

14,231. Is Indian hemp much used in this country?—Not in this country. In other countries it is largely used. It is practically prohibited in this country by the Poisons Act.

14,232. But is not the same prohibition extended to opium and other substances?—The direct sale of them. But they get opium in all sorts of mixtures. There is no drug more popular.

14,233. What about chlorodyne?—I have seen a great many cases of that kind of chlorodyne-mania. They were mostly women—coachmen's wives, clergymen's wives, doctors' wives. It is a very expensive drug.

14,234. Have you ever had any obstreperous cases?—I only go out to the Dalrymple House once a month. I have had cases of that kind reported to me. In a case of that kind the superintendent would at once wire for a mental nurse.

14,235. I do not mean an insane case. To the Committee appointed by the Home Secretary evidence was given of a certain case of a man who had gone into a retreat, and wished to get out. In order to effect his purpose he smashed all the windows, and behaved so uproariously that they were glad to turn him out. Have you ever had any case of that kind?—I have had no case of smashing windows. But they can do it in other ways. These are rare cases. Of course, the general tone of the patients being high would prevent anything of that kind. But cases do occur occasionally, and there is no legal remedy for it.

14,236. You say, 'the general tone of the patients being high;' I thought the general tone of dipso-maniacs was very low?—I speak, of course, of the Dalrymple Home. A great deal depends for its success on the tone of the patients there; and, though patients come and go, if there are some good men among them, they give tone to the house. Take the case of a man who held high office in England. He was there himself, and he has sent a good many there since. He himself at that time was the leading influence in the place. He was cured in six months, and again fills his post with the highest credit. When any one connected with him is sent there, there is always a high moral tone given to the institution. It is true that once the tone got down. One or two men of low tone morally—incurable cases—got in, and several were discharged summarily, so as to get rid of the lowering element. That is the only time there has been any trouble.

Dr. Norman
Kerr.

Dr. Norman
Kerr.

29 Jan. 1898.

14,237. You require your patients to pay in advance?—Always.

14,238. That gives you a certain hold over them. What happens if you dismiss them?—The money would be sent back for the rest of the period.

14,239. The idea there at Ricksman'sworth is to carry out the experiment in such a way as to ensure success?—Yes.

14,240. There is a provision in the Habitual Drunkards Act to allow people out on license. Is that much used?—I don't think it is. It has not been found to work, because the period they ought to be kept in is for three months or six months, unless they came in voluntarily, as in some cases of insanity in Scotland. At certain periods persons knew they were going wrong for a week, and they went voluntarily to an asylum to tide it over, but that could not be done at the Dalrymple Home. The least period for which a person can be received is three months; and that is a provision that wants to be made in any further legislation on the subject.

14,241. Is there not a provision that a person may commit himself for a year, and be allowed out on license, and return at another time?—Yes, but then, unfortunately, there may not be a vacant bed for them. People have often to wait. I do not know how it is with other homes, but if any inmate is allowed out on probation with us, it is for some domestic claim, or some call of business.

14,242. Do they often break down when they are let out?—Of course, there is a proportion of them, especially of those that are in for three months; there are fewer at six months, and there are fewer at nine months, and a year.

14,243. You mentioned that the Committee of the British Medical Association had been going over a number of points which required amendment?—Yes.

14,244. Would you mention some of them to us?—Well, I may say, with regard to non-police cases, that these, in my experience—and I have experience both of the rich and the poor also, as I have care of one of the largest parishes in London—that those who do not come under the police in London are at least 12 to 1, probably 20 to 1—certainly 12 to 1 in the working classes. Of course, in the recommendation of the British Medical Association, in the forefront of legislation is power of compulsion.

14,245. (The Chairman.) We will divide them into three classes—(1) the voluntary patient; (2) the class that a number of people desire powers to commit compulsorily; and (3) you have the quasi criminal class—the police court drunkard. Let us deal at present with the voluntary man. Have you any recommendation as to him?—The first recommendation is that voluntary applicants should be admitted, as they are in many institutions in other parts of the world, on a mere request when sober. For example, in New Jersey, a simple request in writing is received when the applicant is sober, and that by an Act is as binding as if he had made a declaration before a Commissioner for Oaths.

14,246. If a man on a written request is admitted, are powers of detention given to keep him there for a certain time?—The same powers of detention. It is very general to make a request in writing, but he must be sober when he signs the request. There are two ways in which they can be admitted in New Jersey—one on a request attested by a commissioner for oaths, and the other a simple request in writing when sober. In New Zealand a person is received into a home by a judge's order on the inebriate's request. In Victoria the request is attested by one justice, and it is the same in South Australia. We recommend, for the admission of a voluntary patient, simply a request in writing when sober, or attestation by one justice instead of two, or, still better, attestation by a commissioner for oaths, a clergyman, or any constituted authority. The present system is so forbidding that very few women will undergo it, and only a small number of the men. In many of the homes there is less than a half go under the Acts.

14,247. In the case of the Dalrymple Home, how many have you under the Acts?—Under the Acts 177, Dr. Norman Kerr. and otherwise 200.

14,248. So that the majority in your home are not under the Act?—We managed it better at first. The first year or two there were fewer patients, and we were able to bring more influence to bear upon them. Since the idea that the whole thing can be carried out in six weeks, still more decline to come under the Acts.

14,249. Let us take the second class—persons non-criminal, for whom, I presume, the British Medical Association wish powers of compulsory detention to be given?—Yes. The Committee next in order place the sending of the non-criminal cases—the non-police cases—under some jurisdiction for curative treatment in some special institution, either on the production of certain certificates by a medical officer, or by some constituted authority. They do not wish it to be done without a judicial authority, in addition to medical certificates. I can give you the procedure in various counties. In Kings County, Fort Hamilton Home, one justice for one year, established since 1867. There is no mention of a medical certificate there at all. In Connecticut, by District Court of Probate, after inquiry on application from a majority of court of select men of the town, and two medical certificates. In Pennsylvania, the chief officer of the home alone, or two medical certificates attested by a commissioner, and presented by a friend. In San Francisco, on the order of one of the trustees, or of any police judge, who may or may not require a medical certificate. Ontario, by the Provincial Secretary, after inquiry by a judge. Quebec, any judge can appoint a curator, who has power to place the drunkard in any asylum. Nova Scotia, the same as Quebec. New Brunswick, by curators appointed by a judge, and by a judge after inquiry. The Canton of St Gall, by the Communal Council, confirmed by the Council of State, or the latter alone if the former declines to act, on one medical certificate. Unterwalden, by the Council of State. In the provision for the poor in the Canton of St Gall, by the Act of 1891, these words occur:—'If no means, or the cost too great for breadwinner's family, they are levied on the poor rates.' In addition, in certain special cases, the State is to contribute to the maintenance of the family during the patient's incarceration—that is, if he is the breadwinner. In several other Cantons there is provision made for two-tenths of the alcohol revenue monopoly being applied for the purpose of placing pauper inebriates in suitable institutions. In Thurgovie, one-tenth to defray expenses of alcoholics in the House of Correction at Kalchrain. At Unterwalden the poor law authorities can agree with the Council of State to place and pay for habitual drunkards in institutions for inebriates. In San Francisco there is no exemption on the ground of inability to pay. Those able always pay; always do so. They get accommodation according to what they pay. In Connecticut and New Jersey the city and county are liable; and in Massachusetts the municipality is liable to pay for poor inebriates. In South Australia work is accepted in payment for the poor, and that is the case also in Ontario and New Zealand.

14,250. If we recommended the institution of such places where drunkards might be committed compulsorily, I do not see that we can get any light as to our financial proposals from those cases?—I was only showing the way other countries have provided for the poor.

14,251. Can you give us any idea where we could get funds if we wished to make such a suggestion?—I should think that that must be left to the Government of the day to carry it out practically.

14,252. That is true; but then the Government of the day would never think of carrying it out practically unless those interested could suggest ways and means?—There seems to me no way of providing for the poor, or those of limited means, except to provide accommodation for them at the cost of the State, or the local rates.

14,253. Unfortunately, we have not always found

Dr. Norman
Kerr.

29 Jan. 1895.

great approval of the proposal. Everyone wanted some one else to pay for it.

14,254. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncreiff.) If you adopt the Gothenburg system, that will settle the thing at once?—(Witness.) That is practically the same as it is in Switzerland.—(To the Chairman.) I, as an individual, would not approve of it. It would be making inebriates on the one hand, and curing them with the other.—(Witness.) With regard to the non-criminals, it is impossible, it seems to me, for any voluntary effort to do it. They can only get up an institution, and charge a number of the patients a certain sum. Then the State, or the Local Authority, would pay so much out of the public funds for the maintenance of those who are not able to pay. A voluntary fund would never do anything of that kind. That has been tried, and has failed. People won't respond to an appeal of that kind, I am certain, in this country. 'Provision for the poorest' was another recommendation of the British Medical Association. They do not go into details, but simply say that the poor ought to be treated as well as the rich. Another recommendation was that spoken to by Dr Nicolson regarding the inclusion in the Acts of intoxication by morphine, or other drugs. In regard to escaped patients, there is great difficulty now. Under the present system, if a patient escapes, whether rich or poor, he sometimes has to pass a night in the police cells, because the licensee must apply for a warrant of a justice, and the escaped patient must be brought before that justice who issued the warrant. In connection with all these institutions, in America and elsewhere, any authorised person is entitled to recapture, and to bring back direct to the home, with the aid of the police.

14,255. Dr. Hoffman mentioned another point, in connection with which additional powers were requested, viz., where a person who had made an application to be received into a home, and had been committed there by a justice, refused to go, and there is no power to take him?—There is none in this country.

14,256. You indorse the recommendation that there should be such a power?—Certainly. In South Australia, Victoria, and Ontario, any person authorised can retake an escaped patient.

14,257. Any further suggestions?—With regard to paupers, the guardians of the poor should have power to detain, in a special department of the workhouse, or pay for the treatment of inebriate paupers at curative homes, the same as they do for lunatics at present.

14,258. That is a very important suggestion, and I think it one of great practical importance. Any other suggestion?—We think that all homes for inebriates should have a minimum extent of grounds for outdoor exercise; and we think, also, there should be Government inspection of all inebriates under detention anywhere.

14,259. But if it costs £110 a year per patient to make a home pay, would not these provisions, as to ground especially, make it more difficult to make it pay if they were carried out?—These institutions would be for the poor and the rich, and would be state-aided, or aided by municipalities. There is another matter on which we feel very strongly, and that is that the staff should be abstainers. The influence of a single person who drinks, in such a place, is unconsciously, in the main, disastrous to the patients. That is actually a part of the constitution of the Ellikon Home, Zurich.

14,260. That is not enacted by the law of the State?—Ellikon is practically a State Institution supported by the State to a large extent.

14,261. Is that recommendation as to teetotal attendants a recommendation from the British Medical Association?—It has not been sent in yet, but it will be soon. Another practical point is, as regards the patients working. We have no power at present to compel any body to work—rich or poor—at present. And we propose there should be power to compel the patient to work. Idleness militates very much against the curative treatment.

14,262. What would you work them at?—Women could be worked on a great many things—laundry work, preparing flowers, and a great many other little things.

14,263. Let us have them. We have been on the outlook for some work for women? I have not gone into that minutely, but they must be employed at something if they are to be benefited. I do not mean that their work is remunerative. I do not think such work will do much towards keeping up the homes at all, unless where there is no rent to pay. It is for the employment of the patient rather. There are various things connected with flowers that women can do, and there are little industries being taught women all over Ireland just now. We might just as well do them here. There is another point which I do not know if the Committee will take cognisance of, and that is forbidding the sale of liquor to declared habitual drunkards.

14,264. Let us have the practical working out of that suggestion for the sale of liquor to habitual drunkards?—I have taken a note of the only two countries I can find, where they have a fine or penalty for disregarding that notice. Both are in the United States, where there is a provision that wife or widow, or other person, can proceed against any publican selling or giving liquor to such drunkards.

14,265. What States?—In Ontario a police magistrate or two justices may forbid the sale of liquor for twelve months. For the first offence there is a penalty not exceeding £5, and, for a second, not exceeding £10.

14,266. That might work out in a thinly inhabited country, but not in large towns?—It would necessarily be less operative in large places.

14,267. Take the case of London or Glasgow—it would be quite impossible to have anything of that sort?—It would; but, in small towns with 5000 or 10,000 inhabitants, it would be quite practicable.

14,268. And in the counties?—Yes. In regard to the Act of 1879 itself there is no power to elect a permanent deputy?—There is only power to a deputy for six weeks. There ought to be power to the licensee to elect a deputy for a whole year.

14,269. But you have two licensees registered in most of them?—We have not at the Dalrymple Home.

14,270. If you take the Bristol Home there are three licensees; at Daisy Bank there are two; and there are two ladies registered for the Chiswick Home. The difficulty can be got over by this double system. Then it would be an enormous advantage if the licensee could appoint a deputy. In regard to criminals, the British Medical Association have considered that part of the subject again and again. They are most anxious that there should be some probation, simply at the magisterial option; instead of the magistrates sending a prisoner to prison, to allow him to go for three months of special treatment. They could let him out on recognisances. That has been done in London in several cases in the higher courts.

14,271. (Sir Colin Scott Moncreiff.) There is a difficulty about the three months?—Six months is the very lowest that would be permanently useful.

14,272. (By the Chairman.) I have been very much struck with the way in which magistrates deal with first cases. Out of twenty cases, about every one of them was let off with an admonition. Formerly these would have all been sent to prison.

14,273. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncreiff.) If there was compulsory confinement in these retreats, how would you maintain discipline. You say that now a percentage is turned out, but if you took them in compulsorily what would you do?—In any proper system there must be classification. You would have to make special provision for incorrigibles and incurables.

14,274. We have been told that the greatest temptation came upon a person under treatment within the first twelve months. Do you think it would be a desirable thing, therefore, to give a license for twelve months. It is only six months now for lunatics; and that it should be twelve for habituals seems a long period?—Of course, it would not be a fixed period.

14,275. Then you think there might be another period at the end of 365 days—a sort of prolonged license. Do you think that would be a desirable thing?

Dr. Norman
Kerr.

29 Jan. 1895.

- Dr. Norman Kerr.*
29 Jan. 1895.
- There ought to be a period of probation. There is that in the case of lunatics. There would be no harm. They would be discharged with a license for a long time if there was no offence. They might be under observation in some way.
- 14,276. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Do you think the number of inebriates in the country is increasing?—I think the number of diseased inebriates is increasing—inebriates more difficult to cure.
- 14,277. Do you think the total number of inebriates is very large?—Very large, indeed.
- 14,278. Suppose we were to come to the conclusion to incarcerate these inebriates compulsorily, would that involve, to your mind, a large expenditure?—It would, to do it properly; but the Government might take a little part of the matter. For instance, in London, a home for 50, 60, or 100 of the worst incorrigibles might be started. Perhaps Glasgow might do something as an experiment. I am sure that in such towns as Glasgow, Belfast, or Dundee, they might have it on a much smaller scale if they had power to allocate local funds, and it would answer the purpose very well. In London provision for 100 would take away almost all the worst cases out of the police courts, supposing they did not wish to go into it on any larger scale.
- 14,279. You could not commit yourself as to the number of diseased inebriates in the country that would come under such a provision?—Probably there would be 20,000 that could legally come under the designation.
- 14,280. Does that 20,000 include the frequent committals of people who come up over and over again for offences of this class?—I mean 20,000 individuals—criminal and non-criminal—putting them both together. I think provision for 20,000 would be ample for the United Kingdom.
- 14,281. Have you any plan for utilising existing institutions in any way so as to make them useful for this purpose?—Disused prisons might be made practicable if they had ground about them. Barred windows and things of that kind would be out of the question.
- 14,282. But how would you keep the patients in?—The tendency in lunatic asylums is not to have these mechanical restrictions. It is very different from the old state of things.
- 14,283. What would be the machinery for dealing with these people before incarceration?—In police cases a certain number of convictions in cases of drunkenness and light offences—so many committed within six or twelve months.
- 14,284. Would you consider medical testimony of importance?—I think it would be. There ought to be proper curative treatment.
- 14,285. Do you consider it necessary that a medical certificate, as in cases of lunacy, should be given?—I think no one, unless, perhaps, a criminal, ought to be put in a special reformatory without two medical certificates and judicial authority.
- 14,285A. The medical testimony would merely be part of the general evidence?—Exactly.
- 14,286. I suppose you would say that the results obtained at the Dalrymple Home have been very satisfactory in respect of the numbers cured?—Very much so, indeed. In the United States, among several thousand cases, one-third after ten years were found to have remained sober.
- 14,287. You are sanguine as to the results of treatment?—If there is one-third just now, I think that, with a State system which would prevent abuses, there might be 50 per cent. of cures.
- 14,288. You mean permanent cures?—Yes! permanent cures. Some cases would require to be detained as long as they lived.
- 14,289. I suppose the cure will be more rapid the earlier the case is got?—Decidedly.
- 14,290. Is there any difficulty in getting sufficient evidence to get incarceration?—Even in cases at an early stage the evidence should be sufficient to satisfy an ordinary intelligent judge and an intelligent medical man. There might be a family council. Everything should be done to safeguard the patient's position.
- 14,291. Would there not be a difficulty in these cases of domestic drinking where the man or woman was ruining their family and themselves?—Of course, in France and several other countries, there would be no difficulty. Whether from excess in gambling or anything else, a family council is called, and the judge acts upon that. In lunacy cases here the evidence is very much of the same character.
- 14,292. You think 50 per cent. of the cases are incurable. Are they incurable because the tissues are diseased from the effects of drink?—I would not put it in that way. Many of them are damaged before they begin. They are not drunkards because they drink. They drink to excess because they have had some pre-existing condition sufficiently strong or hereditary. I have seen many such cases.
- 14,293. Do you think that the statements of the American institutions, as regards cures, are to be taken with reserve?—Some of them I do not take at all. There is an institution at San Francisco where the average period of residence is six weeks, and they say they cure 80 per cent. They cannot follow up the cases even in genuine homes. Improvement appears to be reckoned cure.
- 14,294. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) If you are to have compulsory seclusion of inebriates, won't it be necessary to have some provision for the management of their affairs?—It must, in many cases.
- 14,295. Have you come to any conclusion on that point?—The provision made for the management of a lunatic's affairs would suggest something of the same kind here. There might be a curator or trustee or some official person.
- 14,296. Has this point ever occurred to you, whether it might not, in some cases, be necessary to take away the power of making a will from the persons secluded?—I have seen that occur, and I have seen it more especially in inebriates who have, under moral compulsion, gone into a home. They were in a rage at their wives, or who ever put them in; and certainly a will made under such circumstances ought not to stand. [The witness then withdrew, and the Committee rose for the day.]

[ADJOURNED.]

TWENTY-SEVENTH DAY.

Scottish Office, Dover House, London, Wednesday, 30th January 1895.

PRESENT:—

Sir CHARLES CAMERON, Bart., M.P. (Chairman).
Col. A. B. M'HARDY, R.E.
Sir COLIN SCOTT MONCRIEFF, R.E.
Dr FARQUHARSON, M.P.

Professor DOVE WILSON.
Dr J. F. SUTHERLAND; and
Miss FLORA C. STEVENSON.

Mr. David
Crichton
Lamb.

Mr David Crichton Lamb, Brigadier of the Salvation Army; Col. James Barker, Col. Adelaide Cox, and Miss Lambert, all of the Salvation Army, London, were introduced. It was agreed to hear Mr Lamb first.

Mr. David
Crichton
Lamb.

30 Jan. 1895.

14,297. (By the Chairman.) You are an officer of the Salvation Army?—Yes.

14,298. You come as Secretary for Social Affairs to Mr. Bramwell Booth, the Chief of the Staff?—That is so.

14,299. You have had a large experience in dealing with drunkards, prostitutes, and petty offenders in connection with the social work, especially since the inauguration of the Darkest England Scheme?—Yes.

14,300. During the 29 years of the existence of the Army, your efforts have been directed towards this class?—Yes.

14,301. How long personally have you been in the Salvation Army?—For 10 years, but I have been connected with the organisation for 12 years.

14,302. The soldiers and members of the Salvation Army are all total abstainers?—Yes.

14,303. What percentage of the members of the Army are what you would term saved drunkards?—I should say about 27 to 30 per cent.

14,304. About these saved drunkards: do many of them relapse?—Well, certainly a percentage do; but a very small percentage, I should say.

14,305. I suppose a good number of men leave the Salvation Army?—Yes.

14,306. You have no means of tracing them afterwards?—No. One thing I have observed is, that those that do lapse come back to us. If a man leaves us, for instance, and joins a church, and he afterwards lapses, he does not continue to go to church, he probably turns up at the barracks again; so that we are familiar with those that do lapse.

14,307. And from your experience you think that a very small percentage of saved drunkards lapse into drinking again?—That is so.

14,308. In connection with the Darkest England Scheme, temporary relief workshops have been established in London and several provincial towns, and a large farm has been acquired at Hadleigh, near Southend, Essex?—Yes.

14,309. You have here a list of the institutions worked by the Salvation Army: would you please just go through it?—First there are the slum posts, of which there are 40 in England. The number of slum posts abroad is slightly in excess of those in England—viz., 42.

14,310. What is a slum post?—A slum post is usually two rooms taken in the poorest localities of our large cities—Seven Dials, for instance, in London; and in Glasgow in the neighbourhood of Bridgeton and the lower parts of Anderston.

14,311. You speak of 40 in England. Do you mean Great Britain?—That is so.

14,312. Tell us about the slum posts.—Two female officers go to live in these rooms. One of them is a bedroom, and one is used as a meeting-room. From these posts the officers go and visit the people who live around them, and go into the drunkard's home, nurse the sick, scrub out the house if necessary, and wash the children, because when a mother is sick the children are left very much to themselves. The husband is off in the morning and not back until night. These girl officers act as visitors and nurses and ministers and everything else to these poor people. You will find them at work in places where the police dare not go: where they only go to the end of the alley. These girls will be found down working in the alley, so that they come in contact with a class that do not even come within the cognisance of the police.

14,313. Are these slum posts used as shelters at all?—Not as shelters. A girl who might be brought there would be taken by these officers and passed into a rescue home. If a man, he would be drafted into a workshop.

14,314. What about rescue homes?—We have 16 of these in great Britain, and 39 abroad.

14,315. Have you the separate figures for Scotland? We should like them.—I am sorry we have not got them, but I will fill them in. The following has been supplied:—1 Shelter for women (accommodating 200), in Edinburgh; 1 Rescue Home for women (accommodating 60) in Glasgow; and Slum Posts in each of the following places:—Aberdeen (1), Dundee (1), Glasgow (2), Leith (1).

14,316. Of course, as our inquiries are chiefly about Scotland, we would like the Scotch figures! Now about the rescue homes?—Colonel Adelaide Cox is here, and will explain at length the work of the rescue homes.

14,317. Well, we will take the ex-criminals' homes?—We have one in England at King's Cross, London. We have accommodation in that home for about 100. We don't usually receive drunkards there. It is for the first offenders and for the criminals.

14,318. You receive first offenders there?—Yes.

14,319. But first offenders are usually let off?—I am glad you have corrected me. I should say first sentences, the work of the home being to give the man a chance after he comes out of prison. When a man gets into prison his friends usually turn their backs upon him and discard him. He has in that way no chance of pulling himself together, and his only hope is to go into crime.

14,320. How is the ex-criminal home worked?—We have various industries there. The chief industry is paper collecting and sorting.

14,321. Paper collecting?—Yes, the men go round to houses and to firms where previous arrangements have been made, and on the presentation of a ticket with which we have provided them they systematically collect paper. A certain percentage of the inmates go out collecting, and the others are kept in sorting. We have also bootmaking, and a little tailoring, and also mat-making—these industries, of course, being what a man would have learned something of in prison.

14,322. You have only men in this home?—Yes, the women are dealt with in the rescue homes.

14,323. Do you work in connection with the Government scheme for prisoners' aid?—The Royal Prisoners' Aid Society frequently send ex-prisoners to us.

14,324. But do you in any way work with the Government, so as to participate in the Government grant?—No; I am sorry to say not.

30 Jan. 1895.

Mr. David
O'Connell
Lamb.

30 Jan. 1896.

14,325. Are you acquainted with the system?—I have a little knowledge of it.

14,326. How does it happen that you have so large a percentage of your criminal homes abroad?—9 abroad, I see, against 1 in the United Kingdom?—There is one in each of 9 different countries—one in Africa, one in each of the colonies of Australia, one in Canada. It was in Australia that our first ex-criminals' home was planted 10 years ago. Colonel Barker, who has been in Australia, will speak on that point. The first prisoners' home was started under his care.

14,327. How long do you keep people in the ex-criminals' home?—It varies from about 2 months to 7 months.

14,328. Do you draft them into other organisations connected with the Salvation Army, or do you endeavour to get them work outside?—We get them reconciled to their friends, and we also draft some of them into other institutions of the Army, or pass them into the Farm Colony.

14,329. You have always got so many outlets for these ex-criminals in your own ranks that you can assure them of some means of livelihood?—There are not so many go into our own ranks as one would imagine. In 1114 cases received since the opening of the home three years ago next month, 255 of them have been drafted into other departments of the Salvation Army, and 358 have been sent to situations and permanent employment, 7 have enlisted into the army, and 344 have left, after satisfactory conduct, with a fair prospect of finding work themselves.

14,330. Have you all ages of inmates there?—I have have not got the ages at hand.

14,331. Can you tell us if there were many juvenile offenders there?—A few. We have a great many between 16 and 24.

14,332. Over the Reformatory age?—Yes.

14,333. Come to the food depots and shelters which you bracket together?—Yes; we bracket them because they are so closely allied. The food depots are worked in connection with night shelters for the homeless.

14,334. Would you describe the system of food depot?—It is simply established for the supply of good wholesome well-cooked food at as low a rate as possible. We buy in the best market, and we buy nothing but what is of good quality. I do not mean we buy the best quality, but it is better than the people in these neighbourhoods have been accustomed to by a long way. We supply cooked meals at prices varying from one farthing to fourpence. For fourpence a man can get a good dinner.

14,335. What can he get for one farthing?—That is for children. A basin of soup is given.

14,336. And for 4d.?—A man would have meat and potatoes and pudding and tea.

14,337. Is that self-supporting?—Yes. Last year we had a considerable profit on the food depots. In the winter time we sell 15,000 meals a day, so that the turnover gives room for a margin of profit.

14,338. Does that allow for labour in connection with it?—For all labour, rent, and management expenses.

14,339. How do you find that part of the enterprise regarded by the vendors of articles of food in the districts?—The result of our operations for three years has been that in the neighbourhood of our food depots our system has been copied, just in the same way as in the city the light refreshment places started by the Baked Bread Company have been multiplied. In the lower parts our food depots have been copied. We have been copied by the Victoria Homes. Only last week they opened one of their large day shelters as a food depot precisely on our lines.

14,340. You consider that if other people take up the work, and do it as well as you can, it is so much labour saved to you?—We don't mind at all. The London County Council in their Parker Street lodging-house copied our bill of fare exactly, but that we don't mind one bit.

14,341. Would you please explain what the shelters are exactly?—The shelters in London give accommodation for about 5000 men and women every night, at prices varying from one penny to 6d.—1d., 2d., 3d., 4d., and 6d.

14,342. What for one penny?—A bare shelter in a warm room with a comfortable seat, and a piece of bread is also given for 1d. He can also have an ample supply of hot and cold water. The shelters are open from 5 o'clock in the afternoon usually, though in the severe weather recently experienced they have opened at 4 until 8 o'clock next morning, so that a man who is destitute need not hang about the streets or be without a shelter.

14,343. Do the men who pay a penny sleep on the floor?—No; the seat is very much like a church pew, with a book-board in front, so that a man can lie forward. Before the shelter fills up a man can lie on the seat and rest himself. The seat is especially broad, like a railway carriage seat, but when the shelter fills up he has got to sit up, and if he wants to sleep he lies forward on the book-board.

14,344. He gets a piece of bread when he comes in, but nothing in the morning?—Nothing in the morning. In severe weather such as we have at present we provide a small tank for a man who has not a penny that he can do in about three-quarters of an hour. Some experienced hands would do it in twenty minutes. It is chopping up wood. In this connection, it would be better for us to give him shelter for nothing, because of the waste of wood he effects before completing his work. But then, on the other hand, the man feels that he has done his pennyworth, and is entitled to his shelter.

14,345. Take the two-penny man?—He is provided with a bunk, with a sea-weed mattress covered with American cloth, and with a cover. The room is kept up to 70 degrees of heat. That is perhaps more than you or I would care for, but to these poor people heat is very essential to them.

14,346. Do they sleep in their clothes in these bunks?—Some undress, and some sleep in their clothes.

14,347. Do your rates apply to both men and women?—2d. is the lowest for women.

14,348. That is rather hard on the women, isn't it? If a woman comes without 2d. she does not get a bed?—All our officers exercise a certain amount of discretion. If a man or woman is destitute, he or she is not turned away by any means.

14,349. You have no intermediate system for a man simply lying on the floor. You give them either a seat or a mattress?—That is so.

14,350. Have the two-penny men any food given them?—They must pay for their food. If a man takes a penny shelter, we know that he must be hard beat, and we say—'Here is a piece of bread for you.'

14,351. What does the three-penny man get?—The same very much as the two-penny man. Only the bed is a cubicle, like a ship's cabin arrangement, and two in a room.

14,352. Then the four-penny man?—For fourpence he gets an ordinary bed and blankets. The bed is in a room, with probably 10 or 12 others in it.

14,353. Which class do you find most run on?—The two-penny shelters.

14,354. By men and women too?—Yes.

14,355. Above one penny they get no food?—No.

14,356. Have you many people who come back night after night to these shelters?—Yes, a certain percentage do come back.

14,357. Not a large percentage?—We have a shelter in Clerkenwell where the men come back night after night. It is a 2d. shelter. When it was started it was 4d., and we gave them for that $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. of bread and a pint of cocoa every night and morning; but we found a little difficulty in working it. The men preferred spending their money other than on the roll and cocoa we gave them, so we dropped the 4d., and charged 2d. These men are most men who work in the markets. Many of them make the shelter to a large extent their home. Some of the penny shelter people also come back. We took a census once, and, as far as my memory serves me, there were over 50 per cent. who had not been there a week in succession.

14,358. Are many of the men who go to your shelters the same class as go to the casual wards?—Yes, a great many of them.

14,359. If they have 2d., do you find that they prefer to spend it with you on a more comfortable bed, or save the 2d. and go to the casual ward?—They prefer the shelter.

14,360. You think that if a man had 2d. or 3d., sufficient to pay for a little bread besides his bed, he would not go to the casual ward?—I do not think so.

14,361. It is only when he is absolutely destitute that he will do so?—Yes.

14,362. Come to the next item—'Labour Bureaux.' I see you have got 18 of them in the United Kingdom and 6 abroad. How are those at home distributed?—The majority are in London. We have one in Bristol, and one in Bradford, and one in Leeds. Of course these bureaux are worked as adjuncts of the shelter. The chief centre is in Whitechapel Road. The other branches report there.

14,363. You have got no shelter in Scotland?—We have a shelter in Edinburgh.

14,364. Where?—In the Vennel, off the Gassmarket. It is for women. It was opened last year. We have a property now under consideration in Glasgow, which would be for women, and we have a rescue home for women at Garnethill. Miss Cox will speak of the Edinburgh and Glasgow institutions.

14,365. Come to the labour bureaux—how are they worked?—The system of registration is simple. The name of a man is taken and his qualifications, and he is given a ticket available for a month. His name is kept on the books for a month, but he can renew it at the end of the month if he wishes it. If he does not renew it, we file past the counterpart of the particulars taken in the first instance.

14,366. What class of men have you among those who inscribe at your labour bureaux?—Mostly the labouring class, with a sprinkling of mechanics and skilled labourers.

14,367. Only a sprinkling of them?—Yes. Strikes and special periods of distress increases the number of skilled workmen among the unemployed.

14,368. How do you find them employment?—We look for employment for them to the extent of our capacity. We receive the more pressing cases into our labour factories.*

14,369. Can you tell us how many have passed through these bureaux?—Since the beginning of the scheme, three years ago, we have received 11,000 applications from persons out of work, and we have found temporary or permanent employment, including those provided for in the labour factories, for 5160.

14,370. Have you any list of the trades of the skilled applicants?—I have not a list with me. The following has been furnished:—A recent census of the men in the 'Elevators' shows that 2½% of the men are of the professional class, 15½% commercial, *30% mechanics, 52% unskilled.

14,371. Do you make any inquiries as to character?—We make no inquiries as to character, unless in exceptional circumstances, when character is specially asked for.

14,372. Can you tell us how many you have drafted into your own organisations in the factory and farm colonies, and how many you have got situations for outside?—I could get that information for you.

14,373. It has been raised as an objection to labour bureaux that the people who go to shelters, such as you find in the large towns we have visited, know exactly where to apply for the sort of labour they can do. For instance, in Glasgow a large number will go to the shipbuilding yards in the morning to see if there is any work to be had, and practically they can get their information at first hand, and in that way have a better chance of employment than they would if they were waiting on people going to a labour bureau for them?—On the other hand, employers of labour object to great crowds of men going when there is only work for a dozen. Therefore they utilise labour bureaux.

14,374. But do they ever say they won't take men who apply personally?—Especially for a certain class of labour—board carrying and bill distributing, and that is largely done in London by the large firms.

14,375. I suppose in cases of a sudden fall of snow they would send to you for men?—That was done two years ago. I do not know that it was done this year. Of course, during the last 18 months, the Vestries of London have tried labour bureaux for the unemployed, and that has drawn a certain percentage from us. My own idea of a labour bureau is, that it must have a strong central authority to which all labour bureaux would make reference.

14,376. So as to adjust the supply and demand?—Yes. You must have an authority.

14,377. How many bureaux have you in London?—About 12 or 14 in London.

14,378. You have 18 altogether?—Yes. There are 15 in London.

14,379. Have you any centre?—Whitechapel is the centre.

14,380. And all the branches report to you?—Yes.

14,381. And that holds good both for the demand and supply of labour?—Yes, although in certain cases an urgent demand is met locally.

14,382. Do you report by means of the telephone?—No. By daily returns.

14,383. Have you bureaux for women also?—There are registers for women. They are servants' registers more than anything else, and various people go to them for general servants. One interesting point in connection with our labour bureaux is that it brings people under our notice. A poor man comes to ask for work, and that very often leads to our people visiting him.

14,384. Well, of course that is very important from your point of view; but we have to consider it from a different standpoint. We all quite appreciate the importance of your point of view.

(By Col. Barker, one of the witnesses in the room.) Ten years ago in the Colony of Victoria, when so many men were out of work, the Government asked the assistance of the Salvation Army, and we came into contact with every corporation and every vestry. They all used the Salvation Army Central Depot in Melbourne for filling up forms which were supplied by the Government; and we were also in contact with various district visitors, clergymen, &c. In a very little time we had the whole town into proper systematic order, and we knew what situations were vacant and the people out of work, we found that worked very well; and for our assistance the Government helped us by placing at our disposal a building for a central depot.

14,385. You don't appear to have many artisans applying at these bureaux?—(Mr. D. C. Lamb.) That is so.

14,386. Do the vestries work with you?—Not at all.

14,387. How do you do about skilled labour—when you get that sprinkling in artisans—300 or 400 out of 5000?—If they are destitute, we of course receive them into the factory. If, on the other hand, an artisan has got a home and is not destitute, we see what we can do for him. We have occasional enquiries from employers of labour for skilled mechanics, and then we act the part of middlemen.

14,388. Let us know about your labour factories. You have got 10 of them—are they all in London?—No. We have labour factories at Bristol, Bradford, and at Leeds.

14,389. That gives 7 in London?—Yes.

14,390. Tell us what they are?—They are what I would term temporary relief workshops, where destitute men are received.

14,391. What do you work at in them?—The chief industries are salvage collecting and sorting and firewood chopping. Of course, you can see we are dealing with the unskilled; therefore our chief industries are such as unskilled men can follow. We have also sack making, paper collecting and sorting, the same as the prison gate home, and we have also some carpentering and joinering—tambourine making and brush making. We make all the seats and chairs for our mission halls.

* The number of mechanics is higher than the average, probably on account of the severe weather recently experienced, affecting building trades, &c.

14,392. Does this exhaust the list?—We have got a little wheelwright work and tin working. We have also got match-making, and card box-making, and in connection with women's work we have bookbinding, knitting, and laundry.

14,393. Anything else?—Needlework and washable texts for walls, and they do domestic work.

14,394. Some of these industries—firewood, sacks and paper sorting can be done—I suppose, by anyone?—They take the bulk of the men.

14,395. Wheelwrights and tinsmiths—do you train them?—Yes; we have a skilled working foreman in each of these departments; and if a man comes who knows a little of tin working, say, or who has any particular desire to learn it, he would be put into that section.

14,396. Does he stay with you any length of time?—Well, that varies. He may get a situation at his own trade, or at some more remunerative labour, and he will leave us. But we are quite prepared to keep him so long as he is willing to work and behave himself.

14,397. How do you gauge a man's work? I suppose you have a great number of lazy people?—Well, it is in this way. The foreman is in a position to value a man's work; he gives him a certain task to do, and we give him tickets to exchange for food three times a day. They start work at seven in the morning, and breakfast is at half-past eight to nine. He gets a ticket then for his breakfast. He starts work again at nine, and works till one. Then he gets a dinner ticket. We attach full value to the tickets as follows:—3d. for breakfast, 4d. for dinner, 3d. for tea, with 2d. every day for Sunday. If he does not work well he does not get a 3d. ticket for breakfast, only a 2d. one. The probability is that he will work better in the forenoon, and be able to get both his 4d. dinner ticket and his 3d. tea ticket. But if he does not work the value of the ticket is again reduced. The foreman has power to do that without any reference to the chief manager.

14,398. Does the man who works at tin work get the same pay as the man who works at firewood?—If he shows skill, and his work is worth more, he gets a cash grant at the end of the week. Although we try to instil into these men the feeling that if they are strong and more capable, they have a right to certain benefits, yet we teach also that they have a right to care for those who are not so well off as themselves, and that they should give a certain part of their skill to support such people. We let them feel that others have a claim upon them as well as themselves.

14,399. I suppose the men who are in all these institutions we have named are not members of the Salvation Army?—Oh, no!

14,400. Neither are the people to whom you give shelter, nor those who apply at your labour bureaux?—Occasionally we have members applying at the labour bureaux.

14,401. How is that?—Just an ordinary Salvationist out of work. He comes to us in the ordinary way, the same as any other unemployed man would.

14,402. And those in the labour factories are not members of the Army either?—No.

14,403. Do you not find that the rate of pay you give for skilled labour has the effect of excluding from your factories all skilled men, such as tin workers, carpenters, wheelwrights, &c.?—We do not want them.

14,404. And you only give them work to keep them going?—That is so.

14,405. In the case of women, I notice that you employ them at an industry we have not yet come across—viz., bookbinding?—Yes. Miss Cox will tell you about that.

14,406. In the workshops in London you have accommodation for 1000 persons—men and women?—Yes. 1000 daily.

14,406A. You have recently had a census of 800 of the men frequenting one of your shelters, which showed that 213, or 27 per cent., attributed their destitute condition to drink and gambling?—That was their own statement.

14,407. And the others attributed their destitute condition to bad trade, old age, and ill health.—Yes.

14,408. Do you believe the statements made to you are generally true?—Yes. The men understand that there is nothing to be gained by making any false statement. I think the statements are as truthful as you would get from an average 800 men.

14,409. They attribute it to gambling. What sort of gambling?—I cannot specify that.

14,410. Can you tell us how many people have passed through the workshops since the inauguration of the Darkest England Scheme?—9531.

14,411. And of that number only 10 per cent. have proved unsatisfactory?—Yes.

14,412. In the majority of cases the cause of failure has been drink?—Yes.

14,413. And you say that an unfortunate incident common to most of the break-downs has been that the man breaking away has taken one or more men with him?—That is very often the case.

14,414. I suppose you have a large number of ex-prisoners and habitual offenders who go to your shelters?—Yes, that is so. Somewhere about 20 or 25 per cent. of those who go are men, I judge, who have been in prison for one reason or another.

14,415. I suppose you have got a good number who have been there very often?—Yes.

14,416. Do you find it difficult to maintain order?—No difficulty whatever. We do not admit men who are drunk into the shelters.

14,417. That appears to be a general rule. But what becomes of the men who are drunk?—They fall into the hands of the police. If he is not very drunk our door-keeper will say, you are scarcely up to the mark; you go along and walk for half an hour, and then come back. When he comes back we reckon that he is sober enough to know what he is doing. If he does not come back sober we get him away from the door without causing any disturbance.

14,418. Have you any cases of theft—one inmate from another?—Very little. That may happen in the better class, but not often in the 2d. shelters.

14,419. Do the prisoners' aid societies send prisoners to your shelters?—Not to the cheap shelters. Occasionally to the better class houses, where beds are provided.

14,420. Is there any objection raised to mixing with these people?—None whatever.

14,421. And you don't know of any bad results from mixing the criminal and the more innocent class of lodgers?—Well, of course, there is a general association, yet there is no opportunity of any scheming being done or any close contact with the prisoners.

14,422. You have always officers in the dormitories?—Yes. Of course, they are large dormitories, and order is easily kept.

14,423. You say you do not like pensioners?—Well, the pensioner makes a very good workman. He is probably clean and tidy and regular in his habits, and of course his military experience and training makes him orderly and amenable to discipline, which is always an advantage in dealing with the masses such as we do. But when pension-day comes round he simply loses his head. He may perhaps have to get £5, £6, £7, or £8 of a pension. There are always a certain number of loafers hanging about the post-office on pension-day. It is as well known to them as Christmas or the New Year. They get tacked on to the pensioner, go off and drink, and I have seen them with £10 one day and not a penny the next.

14,424. And the pensioners take off other men from Lamb.

Lamb.

the shelters?—Yes. They know the ways of the world; they make friends, and when pension-day comes the result is that two or three of them go off on the spree. That is a real evil, perpetuating, as it does, the chronic craze for drink, and dragging others down who, but for that association, would probably be enabled to lead sober and moral lives.

14,425. You say that the London workshops are not self-supporting, mainly on account of the men remaining less than two months. Do you think that men who remain for two months earn their cost?—Yes. We have been careful about that.

14,426. Could you give us figures of the cost and the earnings? I should like to know the cost of the maintenance of the inmates, and how much goes for management and rent?—Of course the balance-sheet does not show these details. We reckon that the cost of a man is about 7s. per week, cash—and special grants are extra.

14,427. One shilling a day?—Yes.

14,428. That does not include management and rent of workshops?—Yes. The profit that we make on the food really covers the management, without being a specific charge upon the man's labour. I ought to explain that this is with respect to the men who have been with us more than two months. We lose on those who remain with us a shorter period.

14,429. Does it include depreciation of machinery and tools?—Depreciation is a small item, because we make it a charge upon the regular working. In the paper-sorting department depreciation would be the sacks for collecting. These are replaced week by week, the old sacks being sent with the paper to the mills; and in the wood-chopping the depreciation is very little.

14,430. Tell us about the farm colony.—We have about 1500 acres, and about 1400 acres of what are called saltings—that is, covered by the sea with the tides. We are on the Thames. The 1500 acres are arable.

14,431. Do you reclaim these saltings?—The fishings are let out at present. We have reclaimed a small part.

14,432. You have from 250 to 300 colonists at work there?—Yes. Since the commencement, 1488 have been received. Probably 30 per cent. were destitute on account of drink; and of the 1488, 349 have been discharged as unsatisfactory. About two-thirds of these on account of drunkenness.

14,433. How do they get cash to get drunk with?—We give them a small cash grant. We could provide them with all they require on the colony; but as the colony is not only a training ground for our proposed over-the-sea colony, but also a stepping-stone back to industrial life in England, we thought that to keep a man without money, until he was reconciled to his friends or could find a situation, and then give it to him in a lump sum would probably have a bad effect upon him; whereas, if you give him money continually, it implies a certain amount of trust in the man. We give him the money on the idea that he could buy what he likes with it, except drink. If he spends it on drink, the understanding is that next week his cash grant will probably be dropped. If he repeats his drunkenness he is sent off the colony.

14,434. How much is the cash grant?—It varies from 6d. to 5s.

14,435. Per week?—Yes.

14,436. What is he supposed to supply himself with out of his cash grant?—We give him food and lodging and washing. Out of his cash grant he may buy tobacco, sweets, newspapers, postage stamps, &c.

14,437. You don't do as they do in many institutions—credit him with a certain amount, and give him an outfit and a fresh start?—We did that for some time in the city colony, but it worked out badly, and two years ago we altered our system considerably. At the farm we had a system like this. If a man was entitled, on the recommendation of the foreman, to a 3s. cash grant at the end of a week, he was paid one-third in cash and two-thirds went to a reserve fund. Well, the two-thirds would accumulate until the man had £2 or £3. Then perhaps he would go on a drinking bout, and come up to the cashier's counter and demand this reserve fund. Of course, if you are going to give a man a reserve it must be his property. If, therefore, a man demanded his reserve we had no option in the state of the law but to give it to him, well knowing that he would go to a public-house and spend it all before sunset.

14,438. Then you dismiss him?—Of course.

14,439. Do you take men back again?—We exercise our discretion. If this has been his only fault we probably take him back again once.

14,440. But supposing this man who cashed his £2 or £3 went to Bristol and presented himself to the organisation there?—He would have a chance there, of course.

14,441. He would have as good a chance as any other?—That is so.

14,442. What do you reckon the cost of feeding a man in these places?—In the city we reckon about 7s., and 9s. on the farm.

14,443. A 5s. cash grant, then, and 9s., would make 14s. That is a fair agricultural wage?—Yes; but these men would not be employed in agricultural work. They would be joinering, carpenting, and building.

14,444. Let us take the agricultural labourer. What does he get?—They run on an average about 10s. That would be 1s. of cash grant. He has his four meals a day, and he could save his supper, or take a threepenny dinner instead of a fourpenny one. He buys his clothes out of his grant. The men are selected at the farm, and in that respect differ from those in the city colony.

14,445. You don't mention the city colony in your precis.—It is the same as the labour factories or workshops. We reckon 7s. a week for the cost in the city, but it goes up to 9s. at the farm. There is an extra meal a day.

14,446. Have you any competition for places at the farm?—Yes. We have always more men in the city desirous of going than they can receive at the farm. That has been the position for the last 18 months.

14,447. And you select men as much as possible connected with agricultural work?—We like to give others a chance as well.

14,448. You say you have a good deal of trouble with pensioners there also?—The same difficulty arises there as in the city.

14,449. Would you mention the industries at the farm?—Farming proper, fruit and dairy farming, market gardening, piggery and butcher's shop, poultry keeping, brickmaking in the fields, and steam joinery and building.

14,450. How long has the farm been in operation?—About three and a half years.

14,451. Have you got results?—Of the 1488 men that have passed through the colony 51 have been restored to their friends, 283 have been sent to situations obtained by us, 51 have enlisted in the army and emigrated,—we consider that very satisfactory; 602 have left with situations in view, whose conduct was satisfactory; other satisfactory cases numbered 6; left without notice on their own account, 146; and discharged as unsatisfactory for various reasons, including drunkenness and being unwilling to work, 349. There was an idea when the farm was opened that an over-the-sea colony would be instituted, and a great many of these men would have been very worthy fellows to have gone there.

14,452. Where was the over-the-sea colony to have been?—That was never decided, although Western Australia, I believe, was most favourably spoken of.

10,453. Can you give us any results of the different industries at the farm? Does the dairy farm pay?—The dairy is all right, because we have an outlet for the produce at Southend. In the summer especially, when the visitors are there, the demand for milk is great, and we save in that way the railway rates to London.

14,454. And market gardening?—Yes, the same applies there. These are two of the most hopeful

Mr. David
Crichden
Lamb.

30 Jan. 1895.

Mr. David Crichton Lamb. — branches. We have a good market gardener as foreman, and one or two good men under him. We have about 100 men working in the market garden.

14,455. And the piggeries?—Yes, we think they will pay.

14,456. And the poultry?—That is very doubtful.

14,457. How much land have you got in your poultry farm?—I could not say.

14,458. Is there any poultry farming done in connection with the female branches?—Nothing beyond keeping a few chickens.

14,459. And the brick fields?—We have got good soil there for brick making, but there is of course nothing being done at present.

14,460. The fruit farm?—The fruit appears to be all right, but it is premature yet to speculate; the trees have scarcely reached maturity.

14,461. You explain that the Salvation Army, believing that men cannot remain sober by Act of Parliament, relies on its religious influences to effect the salvation of those whom it seeks to benefit?—Yes.

14,462. You say that to save an inebriate, if he is in work, religious and moral influences only are of use; if he is unemployed and rich, find substantial employment and compel him to work, giving suitable food, &c.; how are you to do that if he is unemployed and rich?—Well, we have people occasionally coming to us who are in that unfortunate position.

14,463. Do you mean work as an officer in the Salvation Army?—Oh, no; any work that he could do. If he is a merchant he will probably have a fair knowledge of books and take a clerk's place.

14,464. But he won't do that if he is unemployed and rich?—Well, sometimes they do. I had a man of that class within the last month. He came and begged of us to give him a chance. He had an anxiety, which he regarded as the curse of his life. He has lived apart from his wife, on whom he settled £2 or £3 a week. We have taken him down to the farm and attached him to the dairy, because he knows something about dairy-farming. But we have no legal control upon him.

14,465. Well, of course you are in the same position with him as you are with all the other pensioners?—Yes and no. He is not dependent on us for his food as the other men are.

14,466. But the pensioners?—When he squanders his pension he has got to wait three months before he has any more money.

14,467. You have little to do with the redemption of the rich?—We simply refuse to take them. We have had during the last three years, I am safe to say, an average of an application a-week from people who would pay 10s. to £1 a-week if we would take them. We have no home for such cases.

14,468. And if you had a home?—The difficulty would be to make them work.

14,469. If a man paid £1 a-week for his keep, in all probability he would object to be compelled to work, would he not?—Yes, I am afraid that is so.

14,470. Then there is not that difficulty in the case of the poor?—No.

14,471. You think there should be a Government subsidy to institutions taking in poor drunkards?—Yes.

14,472. And that powers of compulsory detention should be given?—Yes; when other efforts fail.

14,473. Do you think that drunkard cases should be mixed with criminal cases in prison?—No. They should not be mixed.

14,474. They are not mixed, are they?—It happens occasionally, and with no good result.

14,475. You have had some experience of the chloride of gold cure?—Yes.

14,476. Tell us about it.—Two years ago two American companies tried to float branches in England, and opened depots in London, where experiments were tried on notorious drink cases. Representatives of both companies came to me, and I induced several men who had come under my notice as being unsatisfactory to subject themselves to the treatment. To one company six men were sent, and the result was that in one instance 'the cure' failed absolutely; in one instance 'the cure' was doubtful; in four other instances they appeared to have effected a cure, but in two of these instances the men lapsed within twelve months—the other two I have lost sight of. To the other company three men were sent, and in every case the alleged cure failed absolutely. All were above the average intelligence, but were the worst and most hopeless class of drunkard I have met. Last year a more recent nostrum—a South American drug, I believe—specially noticed last year in the Daily Chronicle and The Review of Reviews, has also come under my notice. To this I sent two cases—one of them one of the 'gold cure' failures—in both instances the cure failed, although at first it appeared to have been successful. Both cases were worse after this final failure than ever they had been. One man finished in the lunatic asylum.

14,477. You tried on both men and women?—Yes, I should like to mention a case to you. 'C.' was a dentist who is now in one of the workhouses in London. His daughter wrote me a most pathetic letter about her father and herself. About herself, she said, that although she had never tasted drink, a dreadful craving came upon her at times.

14,478. Did you manage to keep her off it?—Yes, as far as I know she was all right. The father was one of the 'cure' failures.

14,479. You have some practical suggestions taken from Darkest England report of 1894. Will you please read them?—There is a chapter in this book on the 'Won't Works,' for our operations have brought us into contact with a class which we style the 'won't works.' This is what Mr. Bramwell Booth (who writes the Report) says about them. 'Is it not about time to take some simple way with your work? net. Why should he not be brought before a magistrate, invited to prove himself of employment, or active efforts to obtain it, and in default committed to an agricultural settlement, and made to dig his bread out of the earth. If he objects to dig, cut off his diet. He will soon come to. "Armies," said Napoleon, "march on their bellies." And, fortunately, from the point of view of reforming him, our miserable Won't Work can't dispense with his stomach. The cost! It could not be very large. He could produce a considerable part of his needs. But even if he cost as much as an ordinary pauper, the gain to the whole community by limiting the sphere of his influence would be enormous. Such an arrangement would reduce his numbers at once, would at any rate limit his opportunity for multiplying his kind, and would within a reasonable period blot him out altogether as a class.'

COL. ADELAIDE COX was next examined.

Col. Adelaide Cox.

14,480. (By the Chairman.) You are an officer of the Salvation Army, and you come here as representing Mrs. Bramwell Booth?—Yes.

14,481. Mrs. Bramwell Booth directs the rescue homes for friendless and fallen women, and the women's social work generally?—Yes.

14,482. Please tell us the institutions connected with your branch?—We have 29 institutions in this country, classified as follows:—15 Rescue Homes,

3 Metropoles, 3 Lodges, 2 Shelters, 3 Industries, 1 Maternity Hospital, 1 Slum Nursing Institute, and 1 Midnight-work Centre.

14,483. Rescue Homes! Are these for the rescue of fallen women?—Yes.

14,484. What is the nightly average of their inmates?—288 for the Homes and 350 for the Shelters.

14,485. Are the 15 homes all in London?—Seven of them are in London.

Col. Adelaide Cox.

Col. Adelaide
Cox.
30 Jan. 1895.

14,486. Are the 288 inmates all in London?—No, in all the homes.

14,487. Take the case of London. How many will you have there?—About 140 on an average.

14,488. These are nightly inmates?—Yes.

14,489. Do they stay in these homes for a lengthened time?—The term would average from four to six months. There are some that remain longer. But we don't like to keep them longer than six months.

14,490. How do they contribute to the support of the homes?—Of course, first of all they do not entirely contribute. We cannot make a rescue home self-supporting. In that they differ from the workshops and shelter for women. I should say that they contribute about one-third to the cost of the homes. They are employed at different industries—needle-work especially, and then we have the text-making, which has been referred to.

14,491. Laundry work?—Laundry work is not sent to the homes.

14,492. This is the first instance we have had where it is not. Tell us about it.—Mrs. Booth very much objects to it as an employment for these girls.

14,493. Why?—For many reasons. She thinks it is not interesting. There is nothing to interest the inmates in it. We like to elevate them by what they are doing; and Mrs. Booth thinks that standing over a wash-tub all day does not elevate them in anyway. Of course the washing of the home is done in it, but they do no laundry work in the sense of taking in laundry work. They have a work-room where they do more interesting work—sewing fancy things, text-making, dressmaking, &c.

14,494. They can be read to there also?—Yes, they are read to, and there is singing. They cannot do that in a laundry.

14,495. What do they do about physical exercise?—We have a garden attached to all the homes—a larger or smaller piece of ground and we let them play about in the garden. In addition to this they go out but always accompanied by an officer.

14,496. You say you only keep them for four or six months?—Yes. By that time we generally get them into situations. Some who are not suitable for situations we draft into our own industries, or try to get them into other industries outside.

14,497. Sewing, I suppose, is the chief industry you have?—It is.

14,498. Does it pay? We have been told that it pays.—Well, I cannot say that we are satisfied that it pays. You see, the labour is not properly paid for, and in that way we cannot bring it on to business lines.

14,499. How do you pay for the labour?—We do not actually pay it at all while the girls are in the homes. We pay for the materials, and we try to make that material produce so much; but we don't trouble much about the labour, as the girls are, as a rule, totally unskilled.

14,500. You don't give them any money?—Not in the homes.

14,501. They get food and shelter and clothing, I suppose?—Well, their clothing is mostly given.

14,502. When they go out as servants or into situations, do they get any clothing?—Then we give them an outfit, but they have to pay for it from the wages they are going to earn. We have an agreement that the girl signs, and a counterpart of it for the mistress, so that she knows about it, and has a certain responsibility to see that we are refunded.

14,503. What liberty have the girls in your homes? Do they stay in all the time they are with you?—Yes, except as explained above.

14,504. And if they wished to go out for a walk?—They have no liberty in that sense, not unless accompanied by an officer.

14,505. Suppose a girl came and said she was not going to work any longer, and wanted to go?—In the long run we should not detain her, though we should generally make her sleep over it. We should not part with her until next day in any instance. If she persisted in her determination to go we should let her go.

Very few comparatively do go. The longer they stay the chances of their going in that way are less. If the management is efficient, the hold is very strong upon them.

14,506. How do you get these girls? Are many of them from prison? Of course we are specially interested in that class of women who are habitual offenders.—We have had a very large number of these, who have come to the rescue homes since the inauguration of the Darkest England Scheme.

14,507. How many have passed through the rescue homes?—5915 since the inauguration of the Darkest England Scheme.

14,508. How many were satisfactory?—4462. Of the total number there were received—from a life of prostitution, streets and brothels, 2899; those who were living in immorality, but not on the streets, 1795; maternity and other cases, 1121. Of the above total there were:—Habitual drunkards or heavy drinkers, 1191; women who had been imprisoned, 750, with a total number of 2540 commitments. Of the 750 women in prison 450 were known to be thieves; and there were sentenced for criminal offences, 439. The longest term served by any one person was 21 years. I have here the figures for the 12 months ending 30th September 1894. These are—Number of women and girls in the homes at September 30th, 1894, 288; total number dealt with in the present year, 1414. Of these there were sent out:—Satisfactory, 1157; unsatisfactory, 257. Children sent to nurse-mothers, 61.

14,509. I notice you have a large number of maternity cases?—I suppose one-third of them would be maternity cases. We receive a number of women from the workhouse with their children.

14,510. Why do they come to you from the workhouse with their children?—They want to get out. They have become tired of it. Others are quite young women, whose children are born in the workhouse, and they might remain there always if some one did not take hold of them.

14,511. The number of commitments, 2540 for 750 women, does not seem to be very large.—We have had a great number of women who have had long terms.

14,512. Do these women come in contact with the other inmates of your homes?—Yes.

14,513. We were told that in your Glasgow Home you had prostitutes who had been very often in prison for offences of solicitation?—Yes.

14,514. Here, in London, there is not much of that sort of thing?—No.

14,515. You have 450 that were known to be thieves, and 439 were sentenced for criminal offences; then it would only be the balance of 311 that would be imprisoned for street offences?—Yes. And that would include drunkenness?—Yes.

14,516. So that, as a matter of fact, there must be very little imprisonment for street offences?—Very little of that in London. We find much more of it in Scotland.

14,517. I see, for instance, that there were 2491 women apprehended for prostitution in Glasgow in 1893 against 1893 in London.

(By Col. Barker.) I think they are apprehended in London under a different heading. They are locked up for having no lawful visible means of support.

(By the Chairman.) The offence in Scotland is loitering and importuning, or solicitation, and it adds a very considerable number to the prisoners in Scotland. In Glasgow alone there are 2400 cases.

14,518. (To Col. Adelaide Cox.) You have, I see, three metropolises. What is a metropole?—A metropole is a kind of shelter, but a shelter in which there would be different kinds of accommodation—chiefly cubicle accommodation or bed accommodation—better than an ordinary shelter. Girls pay in these 4d. for a bed and 6d. for a cubicle, and they work outside. We do not provide them with work. They get their own work, and come to us at night.

14,519. They are permanent lodgers?—Yes, a great number of them are; they come continually.

14,520. You provide them with this, in order that there may be a respectable lodging-house and supervision over them?—Yes.

Col. Adelaide
Cox.
30 Jan. 1895.

Col. Adelaide 14,521. How does that pay?—The metropoles are self-supporting.

30 Jan. 1895. 14,522. Are the three that you have in London?—No, I should call the one in Edinburgh a metropole. It has been called a shelter, but I think metropole would describe it better.

14,523. I think the change of name desirable, because a shelter suggests a place where people go without paying at all. I see you have only two night shelters?—Yes, we have only one in London, the other in Edinburgh.

14,524. How is that?—Because we have not been able to find a proper site to build upon, or a proper place that we could adapt to our purpose. We are very much behind the 'City Colony' for men about that. We have been looking out for a long time. We have some statistics here about our night shelters.

14,525. Please give us these figures.—The total of attendances in shelters and metropoles for the 12 months to 30th September 1894 were 116,986; children, 12,414. Of these 325 women were sent direct to situations or friends, or were enabled to earn their living in other ways, and 77 were sent to homes.

14,526. Then it appears that in connection with shelters you have some arrangements for assisting women to situations?—Yes.

14,527. Come to the workshops for women.—We have three in London—a laundry, a knitting factory, and bookbinding. These contain a total accommodation for 103 women, and the total earnings for the year amounted to £3098.

14,528. That is a large amount, is it not—£30 a year a-piece?—Yes, when I say accommodation for 103 women, I do not include other accommodation at the bookbinding establishment, where we have some men for the heavy work. There is actual accommodation for 103 women. There are also a few men at the laundry to do work women cannot do.

14,529. This is self-supporting of course?—Taking the three together there is a little profit. The bookbinding is by far the best in point of profit.

14,530. How do you get bookbinding work?—From publishers, and we do a great deal of our own literature. We have two or three magazines and hymn books and that kind of thing; then we go to various publishers.

14,531. But the work you do for yourselves, do you gauge it at current rates?—Oh yes, it is a separate department altogether. As far as we are concerned everything is done as in an ordinary trade institution. If binding is wanted for the Army, they send and get an estimate from our manager, and if it is the lowest he gets it; if not, he does not.

14,532. You have some statistics as to the destination of these rescue cases; please give us them.—Every hundred women coming into our hands as rescue cases after their stay in the homes has been completed—it averages about four months—are returned to the world outside, classified in about the following proportions:—

Satisfactory Cases.
To situations	51
Returned to friends	14
Emigrated, married, died, or otherwise satisfactory	13
Total satisfactory	78
Unsatisfactory	22

After the lapse of three years, during which it is generally admitted, and so have we found, the chief strain has to be met and faced, what do we find? Here are the proportions per hundred of the cases named above as satisfactory as they stand after three years have passed:—

Still in situations	42
With relatives and friends	28
Married or otherwise satisfactory	15
Total known to be satisfactory	85
Lost sight of, but known to have relapsed	9
Relapsed	6
			100

I have another classification here of 200 women and girls received into London Homes. Of these there were:—126 London girls, 72 from the provinces, 2 from the Continent; 70 were under the age of 20, 17 had been married, 32 were pregnant, 34 had one or more children, 18 came from prison, 65 were known to have been dishonest, 60 were drunkards, 23 came of their own accord, 69 were received directly from the streets. Quite half appeared to have been first led astray under promise of marriage.

14,533. What do you mean by 'Came of their own accord'?—We have a central headquarters—a kind of receiving house—where they know of us, and come and ask to be received. In other cases friends send them, or we have correspondence about them. Some of the girls who know of us speak to the other girls, and they come in that way to ask to be admitted without any one's help or introduction. I have brought information concerning one or two cases which I thought would be interesting for you to hear:—'W. L. had been living in immorality for ten years—aged 38—when late one night last winter she was spoken to near to King's Cross Station, and offered a home if she was willing to leave her sin and work for her living. All her relatives were dead; she had been a heavy drinker, and her case was one of the most interesting which ever came under our notice. From time to time during her stay in the home she had fits of the most terrible craving for drink; she fought bravely, but the physical and mental anguish involved in the battles left her completely prostrate, and it was necessary while the attack lasted for an officer to be with her night and day, pleading and praying; but she grew stronger and stronger, and is now earning her own livelihood, and living a happy and useful life.'

14,534. The moral of that is, that a large number of cases, if they had a kindly hand to help them, might be reclaimed and do well?—That is the whole of it. There are particulars of other cases, but I need not trouble you with them now.

14,535. You have, I see, a maternity hospital? How do you happen to have that? I thought there was ample hospital accommodation?—Yes; I believe there is. But it is in order to have a greater influence over them that we prefer to take them in. We only take in the most needy and the most deserving.

14,536. And a portion of these are cases, I suppose, you meet with in your rescue work?—About a half, I should think; the others apply themselves or are sent to us by their friends.

14,537. Tell us about your work in Edinburgh.—We have a women's shelter in Edinburgh, which was opened in December 1893 by the Lord Provost, and many of the leading people in Edinburgh have shown a great interest in it. The average nightly number is 90 per night. The place has accommodation for 100. Part of the building is provided with bunks, and a second part with cheap beds, and a third part cubicles or separate rooms. The people pay 2d., 4d., and 6d., according to the accommodation they wish. They can also buy cheap food, and are allowed to bring in and cook any food that they have provided for themselves. The women go out during the day and come in late in the afternoon or in the evening, and it has become a home to many. The door is open freely to any who wish to come. We have had several drunken women, of which the following are a few specimens:—Mrs. R.—. Father kept public-house 12 years. Three times, when he applied for a licence, she wrote letters opposing it, but he finally succeeded. For a few years she worked and lived away from home; but then she came back, and became a confirmed drunkard. Has lived in the shelter over six months, and has not once had the craving for drink, though it has been offered her many times when she has been out.

14,538. You attribute all these cases to moral influence?—We do. Any lasting impression we attribute entirely to that. I have here the figures of the attendance at the Edinburgh Shelter and Metropole from 1st January 1894 to 31st December 1894—Attendance

Col. Adelaide Cox. children, 1d., 2392; attendance, women, 2d., 12,529; Metropole attendances, 4d., 6100; Metropole attendances, 6d., 626.

30 Jan. 1895.

14,539. (By Miss Stevenson.) Of course the children you mention there would be with some guardian?—In nearly every case that would be so, but sometimes not.

14,540. Do you think you could give me the exact numbers that came without guardians?—I should have to get them. They are not many. But there are a few. Then the meetings held in the institution during the year were 308; sent to the Glasgow rescue homes, 8; to infirmaries, 4; helped to earn a living, 41; given temporary aid, 38; number of meals, 24,085; sent to situations, 29; interviews with friends, 1576; interviews with girls, 477. These interviews, I may say, are noted really to check the time of the officer, to find out how she is employing her time. I have some record here also of our work in Glasgow. We do not consider that our work in Glasgow has been so successful as the work in our other rescue homes has been, though run on the same lines. But we attribute the lower percentage of success to the effects of the disastrous drinking habits of the people, who don't merely stop at liquor, but weaken their intellects, and go to ruin by drinking methylated spirits and other disastrous poisons illegally sold to them very cheaply at shebeens.

14,540a. Do you speak of this from personal knowledge?—Partly from personal knowledge. I have never seen a shebeen myself, but I have seen women who told me they went there for these poisons.

14,541. Of course we have heard of 'finish' drinking, but that appears to be common everywhere, to a certain extent in England as well as in Scotland?—

(Mr D. C. Lamb.) 'Finish' drinking is only too prevalent in London.

14,542. (By the Chairman to Miss Cox.) Have you any definite facts on the subject. You say you have been told by women in Glasgow that there was much 'finish' drinking and much shebeening?—Personally I have not heard much about shebeens.

(By Dr Sutherland.) I might inform you that there were only six 'finish' drunkards in the whole prison.

(Mr D. C. Lamb.) Many don't like it to be known.

(Col. Adelaide Cox.) Mrs. Booth has had some experience of shebeens, and she wished me to mention them particularly to the Committee.

14,543. (By the Chairman.) Let us have your figures about Glasgow.—Of the 60 women who are recorded in our Glasgow statement book as drunk cases, some, but not all, have led immoral lives as well. We have left out of consideration all those who have taken drink for a period of less than two years, and have counted as habituals only those who have been drinkers for six years or over. Out of 33 habitual drunkards there are:—

Thoroughly unsatisfactory,	8
Probably satisfactory,	8
Really satisfactory,	12
Especially satisfactory,	5

The 'probably satisfactory' refer to those so far as our knowledge goes. The 'really satisfactory' are known at some time to have been doing well, and with every probability in their favour. Out of 27 women whose term of drinking extends over a period of from two to five years there are:—

Thoroughly unsatisfactory,	5
Probably satisfactory,	8
Really satisfactory,	11
Especially satisfactory,	3

14,544. How long do you keep girls in the Glasgow home?—About the same average as in London.

14,545. I ask you for this reason. In Glasgow, there is one rescue place where they are kept for twelve months, in another for two years. In one place they get nothing like wages, they get a certain allowance; they get an outfit in one place, and in another a few pounds extra. I should have thought that that would have determined a large number to go to the shorter term place—to your place, for instance, where you keep them four months?—Yes! Perhaps they do not know. We don't arrange with any girls beforehand how long they are to remain.

14,546. But don't they tell each other?—Yes. I don't know whether these other homes are full! Ours is quite full!

14,547. Do you get them good situations?—Yes. Here is one of our cases:—Maggie Kerr was a very rough character before she came here. Had been in prison almost countless times, principally for being rough and disorderly, though one imprisonment was for attempting to stab another girl. Every time she was arrested the real cause was drink. Had been in two other homes, and in the Lock Hospital. She came here a rough, dirty object. Maggie stayed here less than three months, and when she left, the officer in charge reported: 'Maggie thoroughly rewarded us; she became altogether changed, and her parents, finding that she was doing nicely, took her home.' She was heard from more than a year afterwards, and we have no reason to suspect that she is not still doing well. Last heard from in April 1894.

14,548. I see you have two cases in your statement—not fallen women?—That is so; they are not fallen women.

14,549. How did they come to go into the rescue home?—Well, they had no food, and no work.

14,550. Let us go on to juvenile offenders.—I had some figures prepared. I thought they would be interesting, especially as they touch Scotland. I have not complete figures of juvenile offenders, merely those of Glasgow. During the past three years there have been 16 juvenile offenders in the home, ages from 11 to 15 inclusive. Of these only one, a girl of 13, was not fallen. She was a drink case; results satisfactory. Out of the remaining 15 there have been:—Unsatisfactory, 4; satisfactory, 9; very satisfactory, 2. (a.) Out of this same 15, seven were drink cases combined with immorality, and of these 7 there were:—Unsatisfactory, 2; satisfactory, 5. (b.) Of the remaining 8, cases of immorality without drink, there were:—Unsatisfactory, 2; satisfactory, 6. That is, 71½ per cent. satisfactory in the first statement (a.), as against 75 per cent. in the second (b.) Out of the total number, 16, of juvenile offenders, there are 4 unsatisfactory, giving as the result:—Satisfactory, 75 per cent.

14,551. Give us one or two of these juvenile cases.—Lizzie Aird went into sin when very young, but did not take to drink. She was driven from home by starvation and ill-treatment, wandered about with circus people, and was finally found in a very low lodging-house. She stayed in the home just six months, and during that time altered and improved wonderfully. She has developed in almost every way, and has given evidence of being really saved.

14,552. What would be her age?—I do not know that. They are all between 11 and 15. Here is a case in which the age is mentioned:—Jeanie McKinnon came to this home when 15; had then been fallen for a year. Not a drink case. She remained with us just two months, her mother taking her home at the end of that time. Her conduct here was most satisfactory; she gave definite evidence of being saved, and did well. Hannah Davlin had a very sad life. She went into sin at 15: soon after that her father died, and she was left to the tender mercies of an aunt who had twelve children, and made Hannah the servant of all. She ran away, but was found by the aunt and taken back with her. Hannah left to come here, where she has done very well. She went from here to go into service; she was not a drink case. Maggie Lucas came to this home when 25, but fell when 15. Was also given to drinking. Stayed in the home four months, and while here a real change took place in her. With a few exceptions, has gone steadily forward in the right way, and has given evidence of being truly rescued. She was led astray in the first place by some girls who worked in the same warehouse, and who took her to a brothel.

Cox. —
30 Jan. 1895.
- 14,553. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you find in London prostitution is synonymous with drunkenness?—Usually we do.
- 14,554. Do you find much prostitution without the drink element?—Some, but very little.
- 14,555. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncreiff.) You don't care to keep women in rescue homes more than about four months?—From four to six months.
- 14,556. When you have an inebriate case you would not say that that was long enough time always to recover them?—We have had a good deal of evidence that it required a longer time to win inebriates from their vice. Would you turn them out?—We would not turn them out; we would let them take their chance like anyone else.
- 14,557. You risk them going back into vice or drink?—We never send any girl to a situation unless it be what we call a teetotal situation. We like to get them situations in houses in which there is no drink.
- 14,558. Still they would be exposed in the streets?—We rather they went out and took their chance than keep them in a packing case, as it were, for a longer time.
- 14,558a. In your homes, do you consider it any improvement to have a small number divided up, instead of taking in, say 100?—We object to that; we do not like to take more than 30 into one home. We have homes where they can take 35 or 36, and there are other homes where the accommodation is for not more than 25. We like to take 30, not more or less.
- 14,559. There is a certain percentage of children and babies among them?—We have a separate home for mothers and their children.
- 14,560. Among those who come to you are a proportion of poor married women?—Yes, a proportion are women who have been deserted by their husbands and gone to the streets for a living.
- 14,561. The women who come to you are all mixed up, whatever their antecedents have been?—Yes.
- 14,562. You don't find any harm in that?—We should if they were left alone, but we have a complete system of oversight; we never leave them alone. That prevents any conversation which would be hurtful.
- 14,563. (By Miss Stevenson.) Can you give us any idea in what proportions those women who have been with you only six months are received back again into the homes?—I should think we receive back again, sometime or other, about one quarter of them.
- 14,564. How many times would you receive a woman back?—That would entirely depend on the circumstances, and also upon the depth of her repentance. If she had persistently gone into wrong-doing, we perhaps should not receive her back again more than once; but if she was a poor weak thing, and did wrong under extraordinary circumstances, we should receive her back as many as four times.
- 14,565. Do you find that any proportion of these rescue cases are weak minded?—Yes, weak of intellect.
- 14,566. Any large proportion of them?—Speaking generally, I should say about one-fifth of the whole.
- 14,567. In regard to your Edinburgh shelter, do you take into that shelter your fallen cases as well as destitute cases?—We should, but its chief object is to shelter destitute people.
- 14,568. Do you find people coming to you over and over again who have been refused admittance into the innumerable shelters and refuges that there are in Edinburgh—who have been refused there as almost hopeless cases?—No.
- 14,569. Do you make any inquiry as to what previous help these women have received?—None whatever, so far as our shelters and metropolises are concerned.
- 14,570. You cannot tell how many of them have been in the various homes that already exist in Edinburgh?—I should think only a few of them. Although we receive those that are fallen, it is not a rescue home. People needing a rescue home would not come to us except occasionally. They would not come to it as a rescue home, but merely as wanting a bed.
- 14,571. You give rather a cheaper bed than some other homes?—Yes, the usual lodging-houses are 4d.; our prices range from 2d. to 6d.
- 14,572. You have a crèche in connection with your shelter at Whitechapel, have you not?—We had one, but we gave it up. The slum post officers work the crèches in London. (Mr. A. C. Lamb.)—Instead of having one large crèche, there is one attached now to each slum post. There are forty of them in London, with two or three children, instead of having twenty or thirty in one place.
- 14,573. I understood that this crèche I speak of was for the children of the women who were lodging next door?—There were a few of women who were lodging in the shelter. But the most of them were the children of women who went out to work and who brought them to the crèche to be looked after while they were away. But the crèche was given up. The slum post officers now do the work.
- 14,574. (By Colonel M'Hardy.) The shelter that exists in Edinburgh is not intended for people from the prison in particular?—No.
- 14,575. You have taken no steps to put the Army into correspondence with the prison, so as to receive people discharged from it?—At the present moment we have a request from the Lord Provost to do something in that direction. But we have not had time to put it into operation. They are pressing us very much to have a home where we could receive from Court those whom they want to discharge without sending to prison. In connection with rescue work at Cardiff, there is an officer appointed to the jails and to the Court, and they want us to do the same in Edinburgh as we do in Cardiff.
- 14,576. You have a section of the Society in London which looks after the prisoners more particularly?—In London we have the Prison Gate work. We are asked constantly to meet a girl from the prison, and we do that. If she is willing to come we bring her to one of the rescue homes in London. But we have no special home yet for discharged prisoners among women.
- 14,577. Is there any organisation for meeting discharged female prisoners in London?—Our male officers are there in uniform and meet prisoners, and if women are desirous to go to the Army they are passed on.
- 14,578. In regard to Glasgow, you have nothing of that kind there, though there are an immense number of unfortunate women, many of them young, found in prison?—Nothing. When they are discharged, if they come to us and wish to put themselves under our care in the rescue home, we receive them.
- 14,579. But you have no organisation for gathering them in?—No, we have not. (Mr. Lamb.) That is because our homes at present are taxed to their full capacity, and we have no means to increase their usefulness.
- 14,580. (By the Chairman.) Did I understand you to say that the Lord Provost had been in communication with you as to the committal to you of prisoners with short sentences?—I presume he meant that in Cardiff we have an officer every morning who appears in Court, and the magistrates very often refrain from giving a prisoner a short sentence if we or somebody else are willing to take them.
- 14,581. But if the prisoner does not wish to go to you?—There is nothing to bind her.
- 14,582. Does the Magistrate ever say to the prisoner, 'I call upon you to re-appear for sentence on a certain day,' and then give them under your charge?—That is frequently done in London. They ask them if they are willing to go with us, and if they are not they give them a sentence.
- 14,583. (By Col. M'Hardy.) I gather from what you have said that you have no Prison Gate Mission in Glasgow?—We have now under consideration the acquisition of a large building in Glasgow to extend our women's work. I could not say what may be embraced in that.

Colonel
Barker.

30 Jan. 1894.

COLONEL BARKER was next examined.

Colonel
Barker.

30 Jan. 1894.

14,584. (By the Chairman.) You are an officer in the Salvation Army, and have been out in Australia in connection with the Salvation Army?—I inaugurated the work on the Australian Continent.

14,585. During your stay there, three Acts of Parliament were passed affecting juvenile offenders—Neglected Children and Criminal Law Administration—which greatly facilitated your work among the poor, the criminal, and the vicious?—Yes.

14,586. You have told us that your organisation was recognised by the various Governments, and that you received and are still receiving Government Grants in certain of the Colonies?—Yes.

14,587. Tell us about those different Acts of Parliament that were passed.—I may say that I have given Mr Herbert Gladstone for Mr. Asquith full information regarding the working of these Acts. Under the Juvenile Offenders' Acts, boys and girls can be sent to the Salvation Army for certain petty offences, instead of being sent to prison, the Government subsidising us at so much per head. Section 62 says:—

'Any private person, and any institution founded 'by private persons, and managed on their behalf, 'desirous of taking charge of a neglected child or child- 'ren gratuitously, may be from time to time approved 'of by the Governor and Council as a person or in- 'stitution,' &c., under section 21 of the Neglected Children's Act. I hold a warrant at the hand of the Chief Secretary of the Colony of Victoria, on behalf of the Governor, empowering me to apprehend, without warrant, any child apparently under the age of 16 years found residing in a brothel, or associating or dwelling with a prostitute, whether the mother of the child or not. We had never arbitrarily to put that power of arrest into force, but it has acted as a deterrent.

14,588. Take the first part—'boys and girls can be 'sent to the Salvation Army for certain petty offences, 'instead of being sent to prison.' What clause is that under?—It is clause 64. 'Where, under the provisions 'of this Act, any Judge, Chairman of any Court, or any 'Justice may be empowered to commit any child to the 'care of the department for neglected children, such 'Judge, Chairman, or Justice may commit such child 'to the care of any person or institution for the time 'being approved by the Governor in Council.'

14,589. What is the name of the Act?—The Juvenile Offenders' Act, 1887, of the Colony of Victoria.

14,590. Then, under this Act, I see the Salvation Army officers attend the Melbourne Police Courts regularly, the Corporation paying you £100 a year for this work, and that, under this Act, you receive juvenile offenders who may be brought up for petty offences, such as pitch-and-toss, till-pilfering, begging, &c.?—Yes.

14,591. Pitch-and-toss is a more venial offence than pilfering?—Yes, but they are very much connected. Gambling is very common out there. The little shop-boys make what they call 'books' on the races.

14,592. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) Can a boy do that?—Yes, quite legally. A man keeps a shop, and a number of boys go in at the dinner hour and put so much upon horses that are going to run in the afternoon. I have letters here that will let the Committee see that for many years we have been officially recognised, and that the Salvation Army were dealing with this class of people, and with criminals as a whole in a practical fashion. One of these letters is from the Hon. Alfred Deakin, the late Chief Secretary.

14,593. You have powers—to go back to section 21 of the Neglected Children's Act—to apprehend any child found residing in a brothel, whether with its mother or not. Is there not a similar power in this country by recent legislation?—I never heard of anything of the kind here.

(By Miss Stevenson.) There is no doubt that power exists under a special Act.

Witness.—This Act is a deterrent. As I said, we have never arbitrarily put it in force; but the warrant was invaluable, as it gave me power to enter and search brothels for lost children whose parents had made application to us. We could also threaten to take proceedings against drunken fathers or mothers.

14,594. (By the Chairman.) You have received a great number of children under the section as to the transfer of guardianship?—Yes. That is section 62.

14,595. Tell us how it is done?—Well, it is under the section as to the transfer of guardianship. We have received, and continue to receive, a great many children under it.

14,596. The terms of committal are at the magistrate's discretion?—Yes.

14,597. Children are sometimes given back to parents when their character is redeemed?—Yes. I could tell you of one such case. W. C.'s father was a drunkard, who got married to a woman who had been a brothel-keeper, and whose child had been kept by the State for a considerable time. After they had been married the pair did well, and an application was made to the department for neglected children by the father and mother, and that was sent on to us. They satisfied themselves by their inspector that this man and woman were living good lives, and the child was handed back to them from the reformatory school, and put under the care of its mother.

14,598. From a reformatory school?—Yes. But since I have been home children, instead of being sent to a reformatory, are now sent to the Salvation Army, and the Government pays so much a head per week for each child, for it was found that a number of children who had been in a reformatory were afterwards traced inside a prison. We try to bridge over the gulf.

14,599. Have you any statistics on that point?—I have not them here, and I am afraid I could not give you late information.

14,600. But, as a matter of fact, you say that the number of reformatory children who were afterwards found in prison was great?—That is my experience. I had power, I may say, to enter every prison, hold meetings and converse with prisoners; and my experience was, that there is a great number of boys and girls who, after they passed through the reformatory, went back to prison for some offence.

14,601. When you get these children, what do you do with them?—They are sent, as the case may be, on to our farm and taught various trades.

14,602. You have got a farm?—Several farms there.

14,603. Your farm is, in fact, very like a reformatory or industrial school?—Well, of course, we have power to keep the children.

14,604. Well, a reformatory has that. Your population on that farm does not consist wholly of reformatory children?—No.

14,605. That is the chief difference. You mix them all up with all sorts of children?—Yes, the reformatory children lose their identity there.

14,606. How many cases have you had?—I have not the figures.

14,607. How long has the system of grants been in operation?—Since I have been home, so far as the children are concerned.

14,608. You have had no personal experience of receiving Government money?—Not of receiving money from the Government on behalf of children. Before we left the Colony, we received the following letter from the Department for Neglected Children and Reformatory School, Melbourne. It is dated October 31st, 1890. No. 4976:—Dear Colonel and Mrs. Barker,—Understanding from the public prints that your labours in this Colony will shortly terminate, I am anxious to express to you my great indebtedness for the valuable service you have often been enabled, and always been ready, to extend to the officers of this department in their important and difficult work. In the discovery, protection, and restoration of absconders, in the rescue and kind care of those lapsed, and sometimes in the tracing out of deserting parents, we have always felt and found that your great resources were, when needed, at our service. It was also with great pleasure I observed that you were one of the first to qualify for, and exercise, the important powers of guardianship over neglected children not sent to the care of this department, which, under our new 'Neglected Children's Act' No. 1121, part eight, can now be held by 'private' persons authorised on that behalf by His Excellency 'the Governor in Council.' Also to obtain and exercise similar authority under section 21 of that Act, to search for and rescue children of both sexes from houses of ill-fame. I trust your large experience in rescue work under the free institution and legislation of Australia will have a large and wide scope for its exercise in the mother country, or where hereafter your lot may be cast, and that yet more signal success may, by the Divine blessing, attend your labours and those of your fellow-helpers on behalf of the sinful and suffering.—I am, Dear Colonel and Mrs Barker, Yours most truly, (signed), GEO. GULLAUME.

Colonel Barker.
30 Jan. 1885.

14,609. Can you tell us what the Colonial Government give per child?—Ten shillings per week per head; and in addition to that, we received in 1886 £1000 for our rescue work, and in 1887 the first £1000 for our prison work.

14,610. What Act was that under?—There is no Act at all. It was granted to us by Parliament. It was a vote in the same way as the Legislative Assembly voted us a sum three or four years ago, when we dealt with the unemployed.

14,611. The next point is as to Prostitution. You say:—'In connection with our Police Court work already referred to, we have the privilege of visiting persons before coming up for trial, and in this way we come into contact with many prostitutes who had been committed to prison from time to time.' I suppose that could be done in this country?—I am sorry to say that, notwithstanding the information we have given, and our large experience, we have been shut out from the privilege. Instead of working as we have worked on the other side, in a co-operative way, with other kindred institutions, these institutions in England have not done so.

14,612. But the institutions have nothing to do with it if the prisoner wishes to have a visit. If a prisoner wishes to see some friend, is he not at liberty to do so?—Yes. But even then we are under a disadvantage. As I told Mr. H. Gladstone quite recently, it is impossible for us to see him, under the present system, without half-a-dozen or more being by him.

14,613. You say, 'When we found them willing to lead a new life, we appealed to the magistrates on their behalf, and they were frequently remanded to us, and passed into our rescue homes.' Was there any Act of Parliament under which that was done?—There was no Act of Parliament needed for that.

14,614. Had you any powers of detention in the rescue homes?—No. If a young woman was arrested for crime on the streets of Melbourne, an officer of the Army would see her on the night previous to her appearance before the magistrates. When she came up, the officer would say, 'We appear on behalf of this woman.' Then, after hearing evidence, the magistrate would say, 'Are you prepared to go with the Salvation Army?' and if the woman said 'Yes,' then he would send her to the rescue home for a period of perhaps six months.

14,615. That is exactly what I want to know. These cases would be under a certain age?—They would be under sixteen.

14,616. That is analogous to our reformatory business?—You could not deal, of course, with ordinary prostitutes in that way; but even these have often been handed over to us instead of being sent to prison.

14,617. In Glasgow they send people to these places in charge of policemen, but it is quite illegal.—(Mr. D. C. Lamb.) They take them in that way to our homes in London, and leave them, but we have no legal control over them.

14,618. Then as to vagrancy and begging, you say Colonel Barker. 'that in connection with our Police Court work we have received numbers of vagrants and beggars, and sent them to our workshops, and thence to our Farm Colonies.' That is in Australia?—Yes. 30 Jan. 1885.

14,619. Is there any peculiarity about the Australian vagrants?—They are all the same in principle, only you call them 'vagrants,' and we call them 'sundowners.'

14,620. Is there any difference between the management of your workshops and farm colonies abroad and at home?—None whatever. They are all managed on the same principle.

14,621. Do they get the same wages as they get at home?—The same principle is applied in all our institutions, but the relative value might be slightly different. In the Colonies they are very stringent with 'sundowners.' A man may get out of prison to-day, and to-morrow, walking down the streets, if he is a known character, he may be arrested as a vagabond, and sent in for twelve months.

14,622. Does that do any good?—I was going to say that we have jumped into the breach in several cases, have succeeded in getting the men off, and in passing them into our home in the next colony.

14,623. You mention the case of M—, what was that?—It was a very difficult case. It occurred in England fifteen years ago. He was a schoolmaster. He had a fine prospect, was married, and had one child. He lost his position through drink and took to the road. For fifteen years his wife never heard of him. Twice he attempted to commit suicide. He tramped all over England, and probably Scotland. He was one of those ingenious fellows, got a living where others would have starved, by making roasting forks and other things of that kind. He came into one of the metropolises to lodge. He had never heard about the Salvation Army, but by and by he came under the influence of the Gospel. He began to wonder than whether he would be able to find him his wife. That we very soon did, for we found that Mrs Bramwell Booth had found the woman a situation through the servants' register. The man and his wife met after all these years. She said that if the Salvation Army gave him a clean bill she would return to him. They were reconciled, and at the end of the term were reunited, and are now very happy together. The man is one of the most zealous workers in the East end of London, and with his education is a great blessing among the poor.

14,624. You make a suggestion here 'that your agencies and other agencies should be dealt with by a special Act of Parliament, giving the magistrates power to remand inebriates, &c., to the care of certain institutions, &c., where they would be specially treated in classes or sections, passing from one to another as the management may consider wise.' Please explain.—Previous to my leaving the Colonies I had some conversation with Mr. Justice Molesworth and late Chief-Justice Higinbotham and Sir Samuel Griffiths, in regard to dealing with a class of people that constitute the residue of all our efforts and that of other institutions, and even corrupt our prisons. The prison to them is no punishment. The result was that the Salvation Army suggested this—that a number of these drunkards who were not criminals, but whom you may make criminal by sending them constantly to prisons, should be treated in separate institutions, to which they might be remanded by the magistrates for a period of twelve months, with the alternative of other twelve months if the drink was not out of their system.

14,625. Remanded?—Yes, we do not want them committed. We think they should be treated in classes according to capacity. We think they should be made to work, and we think it would pay. Nos. 1 and 2 we reckon would earn £1 a week, and that their cost would be about 12s., and that would leave a surplus to put to the credit fund to support No. 6, who could not so well help themselves. Justice Molesworth thought the suggestion was a wise one, and that something sooner or later would have to be done for that class of people that really corrupt the inside of a prison; and, as a representative of the Charity Organization Society for some time in the Colony of Victoria, my own personal experience is this, that the sooner this class of people is grappled with by public men and institutions, it will be the better for the community at large.

14,626. (By Col. M'Hardy, to Mr. D. C. Lamb, who was examined by several Members of the Committee.) Have you any first-class workmen in your shelters?—A few.

14,627. How do they ever come to be there?—Sometimes through drink and sometimes through crime.

14,628. Have you ever any first-class respectable workmen, thoroughly well-behaved and good citizens?—Well, no, not as a rule. Occasionally such cases do come to us through misfortune and reverses in business, &c.

14,629. How do you sell the product of your labour that you go into the market with?—At the rates current in the district.

14,630. And have you any opposition?—Yes.

14,631. You have had some opposition—we heard of it in connection with matches?—Well, that was very extraordinary, seeing the facts are entirely the reverse of those attributed to us. We were charged with 'sweating' the match business, whereas, as a matter of fact, we pay higher wages in the match industry than any other English firm pays, and our price is practically the same for an English-made match. In one department we pay as much as 60 per cent. higher.

14,632. How do you sell your firewood—in what manner. Do you sell it through agents or contractors?—No. We do our own selling and our own distribution.

14,633. Then you have horses and carts for the purpose?—Yes.

14,634. And you send out these men who are under treatment in charge of horses and carts?—Sometimes. One reason that was forced upon us was this—that we had a large number of respectable commercial travellers who had come down through drinking, and we sent them out to solicit orders. In the same way we arrange for the collection of waste paper. That gives employment to them.

14,635. Is there a certain point at which a man may become too bad for even the Army to deal with?—Yes. Because, of course, we must study the interests of the bulk of the establishment.

14,636. And you have no system for the very reactionary cases?—No. We want that badly.

14,637. You said you had some thieves, I think, among the women in your home, and that the average residence was six months. What I want to know from you is, do you say that you can cure a man of thieving in six months by any process you can suggest?—We will cure him at once if he gets converted.

14,638. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Don't you watch him?—We trust him too; but we take care not to put temptation in his way. If a thief comes to us we do not put him into the cash-box or set him to collect money. At the same time, we do not put any premium on conversion in our social work.

14,639. Can you say the number of thieves you have to deal with, and the number out of which you get satisfactory results in six months' treatment?—In the general treatment I should say the average would be for men about the same as it is for women.

14,640. For thieves! That is something like 63 per cent. ?—Yes, the period runs about four to six months. The figures I am giving you refer to the Prison Gate Home; as a whole there is no classification of the cases. But I should say they are mostly thieves. I know thieving is a very persistent thing. (Colonel Barker.) Let me say this to the Committee, that what in my experience these people want is a helping hand. Here is a case in point, as to how criminals are manufactured. A boy at the age of 15 gets twelve months imprisonment for being in company with other bad boys. After he came out he got a situation in a Hackney Road coffee-house, and was doing well. One morning the master called him and said—'Look here,

'you have been in jail; you must clear out of this.' The lad had to go, drifted into crime again, and his last sentence was ten years, with a further term of police supervision.

14,641. (By Colonel M'Hardy.) You are not registered as a prison authority by the Secretary of State like the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society?—Yes and no. Mr. Asquith agreed to our being treated as the other Prisons Aid Societies, which had privileges that we had not. That is to say, that some of the other agencies had the privilege of going inside the prison gates, while we had to stay outside. We applied for permission to go inside, and the Home Secretary, as I say, agreed to give us the privilege enjoyed by other societies. But instead of levelling us up to them he levelled them down to us, so that all are now outside the gate.

14,642. Is that the present situation?—Yes, although I believe the point was brought up forcibly before the Royal Commission on Prisons.

14,643. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Do you exact any pledge from those joining the Army as regards drink?—Yes, when joining the Army, but not in connection with our social work. The men in the city colonies and workshops are not teetotalers. Those who go to the farm are supposed to sign the pledge.

14,644. Would that pledge be operative if they left the Army?—It is operative only so long as a man wishes to keep it.

14,645. I think you said that about 30 per cent. of those in the Army had been drunkards?—Yes; I mean those who had been known to be drunkards. I do not mean simply people who can take drink or leave it.

14,646. Do you get any bad cases of habitual drunkards and inebriates—people who are frequently up before the Police Courts?—Yes.

14,647. Do they rapidly improve in health and condition under treatment?—Yes. What we attribute the success of the Army with drunkards to is the employment it gives to men in the evenings. For instance, an ordinary workman who is converted from from drink. We give him some employment in the evenings at our meetings, so as to give him no inducement to go to the public-house. Our barracks are a regular rendezvous, and Sunday and Saturday alike our doors are open, and something for him to do.

14,648. You reclaim a good many, and fail with a certain number of cases?—Yes.

14,649. Do you consider it desirable that these failures of yours should be taken in hand and shut up?—Yes.

14,650. For a considerable period?—For any period that may be considered necessary. At the present moment they are a burden on society, and a source of loss and inconvenience all round.

14,651. You look upon farm work as of great importance in the reclamation of these people?—Yes. Apart from the personal benefit it would be to themselves as well.

14,652. Your farm is arable in the ordinary sense?—Yes; it had been under cultivation. It was all waste when we took it three years ago. But we are gradually bringing it under cultivation again.

14,653. It was land that had got out of cultivation?—Yes. It is very good land. It had lapsed out of cultivation during the agricultural depression.

14,654. What kind of soil has it?—A heavy clay soil.

14,655. On the whole your operations have been fairly reproductive. It has paid on the whole, taking it all over?—It has been extremely helpful. The last year was a half better than what it was the previous year, and the previous year was a half better than the one before it. We are in a fair way now to cover all expenses and pay a little on the capital outlay. During the last three years we have made no charge on the invested capital, the value of the improvements made on the land being in the opinion of the valuers equal to any legitimate charge that would have been made on the invested capital. This year we hope to pay all working expenses, and also contribute a little towards the invested capital.

Colonel
Barker.

30 Jan. 1895.

14,656. Do you mean on the £100,000 you got for the Darkest England scheme?—The capital invested in the farm is about £80,000. That is about the sum we put into the land down there. Part of the money was used for the city colonies and workshops.

14,657. That is of the £100,000?—Yes.

14,658. You got the land very cheap?—Yes, fairly. We are now trying to acquire certain other properties surrounding it.

14,659. Some of your special departments, you say, pay—such as the dairy?—Yes, and market gardening; they pay pretty well.

14,660. Do you think that your arable land ought to be productive as ordinary agricultural land throughout the country?—Yes.

14,661. Your labour cannot be so efficient—conducted as it is partly by amateurs to farm work?—That is one of the difficulties. While it is cheaper it is not so efficient, and in the end it is a mistake to think it is cheaper labour. If I were running this farm as a private business concern I would discharge all these men to-morrow. But then we are running the farm to help these men, and that is quite another matter.

14,662. The agricultural labourer's business must be learned like every other. It is not acquired very rapidly?—No. Although there is a certain amount of it that can be done by novices. The market gardening work, for instance. There you can concentrate your men, for instance, in one quarter; they are under skilled supervision, and you get better work out of them than when they are all scattered.

14,663. But you must have a number of men with weak constitutions. Broken-down clerks, for example?—That is quite true.

14,664. Do any agricultural labourers come to you who cannot find employment elsewhere?—A certain number.

14,665. (By the Chairman.) Do the agricultural labourers in the district ever come to you?—We employ a considerable number of them at ordinary rates.

14,666. Do you employ the agricultural labourers in the district five or ten miles round you when they are out of work?—Yes, that is so. But our chief idea has been to get people from the city.

14,667. What do you do with your men just now?—They are double trenching. I was there yesterday.

14,668. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Had you much expense on the houses for your people?—There were three farm steadings on the estate when we acquired it. We have built dormitories, &c. for the men. We have put up a large cow-shed for dairy-farming and other buildings.

14,669. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) In your experience, is there more difficulty in reclaiming women inebriates than men?—I believe that is the experience.

14,670. Have you noticed any difference in the cases of men, between the reformation of those who have been imprisoned for drink and those who have not been in prison? Which of the two classes is worse to reform, or is there any difference?—We have not watched that point very closely. My own impression is, that the man who has been in prison is the more difficult.

14,671. (By Miss Stevenson.) You have both poultry and dairy farming at your colony; from your experience of the work do you think women could be suitably employed that way?—Yes, I daresay they could, in certain branches of it.

14,672. The difficulty which has arisen is to suggest employment for women who are shut up for a lengthened period for inebriety and other things. So much of the farm-work in these departments must be done by men?—Yes, that is so.

14,673. Is the proportion of work falling to men very large?—Yes. Because from my experience the women of England are not so hardy as the women of Scotland, and would not care to do work that women in Scotland do.

14,674. Of course our inquiry applies to Scotland.

You think that Scotch women could undertake all the work in connection with a poultry farm, for instance?—Yes.

14,675. Not a dairy?—No, not a dairy. There is a certain portion of the work on a dairy farm that could not be done by women. I may say that our poultry section has not been any great success yet, and I believe that is a universal experience.

14,676. (Dr. Farquharson.) On what scale do you carry it on?—I cannot say the numbers we have.

14,677. Several hundreds or thousands?—Over one thousand.

14,678. And you have a sufficient run for them?—Oh, plenty of room for them.

(Dr. Farquharson.) It is the general impression that poultry farming on a large scale has never paid in this country.

14,679. (By Miss Stevenson.) At the shelter at Whitechapel, when I was there three or four years ago, you had a department then for discharged prisoners, I think. Have you that still for men?—Yes.

14,680. That is, you keep them apart from the metropole?—Yes.

14,681. Do you find as a rule that men who have been in prison are more helpless than men who come to you simply out of work?—Rather the reverse. The percentage of satisfactory cases amongst our criminals is higher than that amongst the ordinary class; because they are a better class of people that we have to deal with in the Prison Gate Home.

14,682. You mean they are men who have been in the habit of supporting themselves by industry, but who through falling into the hands of the police or into crime have been thrown out of work?—That is so. In the Prison Gate Home we do not take petty offenders, who are in and out of prison on account of drunkenness.

14,683. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) You have reclaimed the farm at Essex?—Mostly.

14,684. You have been employing in it consequently more hands than it will be necessary to employ when you have got the place reclaimed?—Yes. But on that we estimate that with a little industry, such as brick-making and joinery, which we can dispose of in the neighbourhood, about 1000 persons can be carried upon the land that we have acquired.

14,685. How many colonists have you got at present?—About 300 colonists.

14,686. Would you require to acquire more land than you have got just now when you have got this into a proper agricultural condition?—We estimate the present farm will carry about 1000, and we have got 300 on it just now. We have acquired land which is waste at present, but we do not want public-houses springing up around us. In a few years we may go in for buildings, as we have a good frontage to the road.

14,687. (By Dr. Sutherland.) To what do you attribute your main success in reforming inebriates?—Well, to two reasons. First, to religious influences; and secondly, to improving his surroundings. We have also got success through our social operations.

14,688. Do you give them any medicine at all?—Not particularly, although we have a doctor attached to our city colony's staff, and I myself am a chemist and know a little of the run of things.

14,689. To what do you attribute in the main your relapses?—As I pointed out, pensioners have been a great curse to us. If a man can go steadily, he gets on all right; but if any extraordinary influence comes upon him, then he is at a discount, and down he goes. When I was in Scotland, the New Year time was a very trying time to us with fellows who had been converted. If they got through one New Year we reckoned they were pretty safe to go on.

14,690. If you reform a man by twelve months' supervision, and restore him to a position in society, is there much danger of him falling back?—No.

14,691. You think he will stand firm?—Provided there is no extraordinary influence brought upon him.

14,692. (By Prof. Dove Wilson, to Col. Barker.)

Is it the case that you have a great many vagrants in Australia?—We have what is exactly his counterpart—the “sundowners” or tramps—who go from place to place.

14,693. Is he liable to any punishment?—Yes; he is liable to imprisonment if the police know that he has no lawful means of support; he can be arrested on the high road.

Mr. Henry
Rogers.

MR. HENRY ROGERS, Assistant-Inspector of Reformatory and Industrial Schools, Great Scotland Yard.

14,697. (By the Chairman.) I understand you are Assistant-Inspector of Reformatory and Industrial Schools?—I am.

14,698. And that you have special cognisance of the Scotch reformatory schools?—I have. I know them particularly.

14,699. Will you please tell us how many reformatories there are in Scotland?—There are nine reformatory schools and thirty-five industrial schools.

14,700. Would you give us the list?—You will find the list on pages 44 and 53 of the Inspector's report for 1893. They are as follows:—Reformatory Schools—Aberdeen, Oldmill Reformatory for Boys; Aberdeen Reformatory for Girls, Mount Street, Aberdeen. Edinburgh—Dalry Reformatory for Girls, Edinburgh; Wellington Farm School for Boys, Penicuik. Forfar—Rossie Reformatory for Boys, Montrose. Lanark—House of Refuge for Girls, East Chapelton, near Glasgow; Roman Catholic Reformatory for Boys, Parkhead, Glasgow. Renfrew—Kibble Reformatory for Boys, Paisley. Wigtown—Stranraer Reformatory School for Boys, Stranraer. Industrial Schools—Aberdeen Industrial School for Boys; Aberdeen Industrial School for Girls; Aberdeen Female School of Industry; Aberdeen Industrial School for Roman Catholic Girls, Nazareth House, Clarendon, Holburn; Ayr Industrial School for Boys; Ayr Industrial School for Girls; Kilmarnock Industrial School (mixed); Glasgow Industrial School Ship ‘Empress,’ off Row, near Helensburgh; Dumfries and Maxwelltown Industrial School, Dumfries. Edinburgh—Original Industrial School for Boys, Liberton, near Edinburgh; Original Industrial School for Girls, Leith Walk; United Industrial School for Boys, Blackfriars Street; Auxiliary Home, 52 Lauriston Place; Burghal Industrial School Poorhouse, Forrest Row; Leith Industrial School, Lochend Road; Victoria Industrial School for Girls, Restalrig Road, Leith; St. Joseph's Industrial School for Roman Catholic Boys, Tranent, near Edinburgh. 14,701. We will take the case of the day industrial schools. Under what educational authority are they? Under the Scottish Education Department or the Home Office?—Under the Home Office.

14,702. Can you give us the number of inmates in the Scotch reformatory schools?—We have about 775 in Scotch reformatory schools.

14,703. Could you differentiate between boys and 14,694. Have you any wandering children?—Not a great number.

14,695. Had you any difficulty when you did find a wandering and neglected child in getting it taken charge of?—No difficulty whatever.

14,696. There was none put in the way of that by the law?—On the contrary, it gave powers of guardianship. [The witnesses then withdrew.]

girls?—103 girls and 672 boys at the present time, up till 31st December 1894. In the industrial schools, up to 31st December 1894, there were 4600 children. Of these, 1132 were girls, and 3468 were boys. In the day industrial schools there were some 500 children.

14,704. We will take first the Reformatories. Can you give us any statistics as to the number of reformatory children that found their way subsequently into prisons?—You will find on page 20 of the Blue Book statistics of the number alive reported upon—doing well, doubtful, convicted, and unknown. There, taking the results for the years 1890, 1891, and 1892, you find out of 404 Protestant boys reported on, 82 per cent. are doing well, 15 per cent. convicted, 1 doubtful, and 3 unknown. Of 58 Protestant girls reported on, you have 71 per cent. doing well, 3 per cent. convicted, 5 doubtful, and 21 unknown. ‘Doubtful’ means this in regard to the girls, that many of those cases are not doing well.

14,705. I see that there are 21 per cent. reported upon as unknown. These Protestant girls appear to have escaped being reported on to a much greater extent than the English Protestant or Roman Catholic girls?—That is the case. They are not properly cared for. A number of our girls are lost. They go away, and pass beyond our ken altogether.

14,706. But that is a very important point. I find in the English Protestant schools there are only 9 per cent. of the girls reported as unknown, and in the English Catholic schools 8 per cent. returned as unknown; in the Scotch Protestant boy schools only 2 per cent. returned as unknown, and in the Roman Catholic boy schools only 1 per cent. returned as unknown; while in the Scotch Protestant girls' school they are returned as unknown to the extent of 21 per cent.—Witness—That shows some great default on the part of the schools, and it particularly points to two schools—Glasgow and Dalry—and of course, with so few schools, we know precisely where the fault lies.

14,707. Then what control have you as reporter, what power to come down on them?—Only to represent the fact to them that they are not doing their duty.

14,708. You can't cut off the grant?—There is no means of fining them in that way. There is only one alternative. If the school is not going on properly there is the withdrawal of the certificate. There is something clearly wrong. It lies between Glasgow and Edinburgh (Dalry). In Glasgow there has been a very great change of superintendents; that makes a very important difference. The old superintendent knows all her girls, but when a new superintendent springs up she does not know them, and they don't care for a new person.

14,709. The Committee visited Glasgow Reformatory for Girls, and I think the impression conveyed by everything we both saw and heard regarding the present superintendent was that the change made in her appointment was a very great improvement. Has that been your impression too?—Oh yes. She has brought up the school considerably. It is very soon done. These schools almost entirely depend upon the superintendent.

14,710. We have in Protestant schools 82 per cent. doing well. Do you think that these statistics are reliable so far as they go?—According to our information they are. It is in this way. If you take a list for three years—and we get a return from the school which is tested in some measure by ourselves—we get a return from the school year by year for three years after their discharge, of how the children are doing. We get that in their own handwriting, giving the addresses of the children, and stating whether they can be classified as doing thoroughly well, or doubtful, or unknown.

14,711. Then you get returns, I suppose, from the prisons also?—Yes; we get a check from every prison in Scotland, with the names of all the children who were convicted in the past year who formerly belonged to a reformatory. They are very carefully made out, and these reports of the managers of the schools are checked by those figures.

14,712. Are the Scotch prison figures published in your report?—I am not sure whether they are published every year, but they are producible.

14,713. In sending in their returns, do the prison authorities confine themselves to the cases of reformatory children who have been out of reformatories only three years, or do they give the whole lot?—They send in the whole of the children who have been in their prison in the last twelve months, who have been convicted, and who formerly were inmates of a Reformatory or Industrial School, no matter for what year. The whole of the children are sent.

14,714. You use the word children; I presume you mean prisoners?—Yes, I mean prisoners who have formerly been in reformatories.

14,715. In your report I see you speak of adults. What does 'adult' mean in your report?—Adult means over 16 years of age. That is a very important table indeed.

14,716. If you get the returns from the prisons embracing all ex-reformatory prisoners, it will let you know the number of our ex-reformatory population that is in prison every year, will it not?—Yes.

14,717. Can you tell us how many were in Scotland in 1893—how many ex-reformatory prisoners? My point is this. You have given us returns here which only apply to three years. That is to say, a boy or girl gets out of a reformatory, and for the next three years he or she is under the supervision of the reformatory authorities, and it is on their reports for three years, is it not, that these figures are based?—Yes.

14,718. But the prison authorities deal with ex-reformatory individuals, not as confined to a period of three years from their dismissal from the reformatories, but for their whole life?—Yes. On applying to the Prison Commissioners they give us year by year the prisoners in the prison who have been in reformatories. But that does not concern us. We are not concerned with adult crime, but with juvenile crime. When we ask the Prison Commissioners to send us a list of all their children who were formerly in Reformatory or Industrial Schools, and these returns are used to check the returns of the school managers, and to see how many of our children are year by year convicted and brought into prison. When one child is convicted in any of the three years he is reported on as convicted, and he is never regarded as anything else than a convicted child afterwards. If, in the first year of his dismissal from school, he gets into the prison, well, he is done for with regard to us. He is no longer regarded as discharged, or doubtful, or anything else; he's regarded as a convicted boy. It is not taken off our reports even if he is doing very well.

14,719. We understand that. But these returns of yours show that among the Protestant boys 15 per cent. were convicted within the three years; and among the Roman Catholic boys 38 per cent. were convicted within the three years. Are there any Reformatories, do you know, where the percentage of reclamations is much higher than 82 per cent.?—Hardly any. I think it would be overstating it in regard to most schools to put it at more than 35 per cent.

14,720. I think we were told that in certain Reformatories the number of successes amounted to something like 98 per cent., or over 90 per cent. Would that be a fair estimate in your opinion?—Oh no, it would not be a fair estimate of the case.

14,721. Of course the actual number of prisoners who have been in Reformatories, and who lapse into crime over a period of 10 years would be very much larger?—There might be an instance of a high percentage here and there. I have known a Reformatory School where there has been a particular set of three years, with 94 per cent. of reclamations. But you may take it as my opinion, and that of my predecessor, that a lower percentage than that is the rule. He said, 'I am very thankful to get 70 per cent. out of a Reformatory School, and I think it is a percentage we ought to be thoroughly well satisfied with. You may ask why there is not a larger percentage, but, taking the schools together, Protestant and Catholic, we don't expect a larger percentage.'

14,722. I told you that we had been told there were very high percentages in certain schools. One of them was Aberdeen Old Mill, and I find from your report, page 105, that the results of cases discharged after three years—1890–1892—were, that 62 were discharged, of whom 55 were doing well, and 7 were convicted of crime. That would be about 13 or 14 per cent. only convicted of crime, and the balance doing well, because there is nothing here about 'unknown,' or anything of that sort. Now, that is somewhere about 87 per cent., is it not?—I think that is quite possible for some years, not always.

14,723. On visiting the prison in Greenock I saw a lad, a young prisoner who had been in a Reformatory, named Patrick Doherty, and on talking with him—he had been a Greenock boy, and had been sent to the Aberdeen Reformatory,—but on asking him how he came there, he said that a number of Greenock boys were sent there. I asked him how many Greenock boys he knew when he was at that Reformatory, and how many had turned out well, and how many he knew in prison. He mentioned a number, a proportion of prisoners that quite astonished me; so I asked him to give a list of all the Reformatory boys he knew as having been in prison to the Governor, and I asked the Governor to check this list by his prison books. We have got the result contained in a letter from the Governor. Three of the lads named by this fellow as being known to him to be in prison were in prison in 1894, and he names a number of others. Have you got figures for that year?—We can certainly get those returns—the very boys.

14,724. That is quite right, but of course your report will not say anything about it?—No.

14,725. We were told, on the one side, that the number of reformations were close on 90 per cent., that is by some of the Reformatory witnesses in Scotland.—Witness—But if we take all those numbers reported from the prisons we should have to put against them the whole number sent out from that school. We don't take the whole population who have been at that school. We only take the three years. We say that, to take three years after they have been discharged is a sufficient guarantee of their doing well.

14,726. I am not at all wishing to imply that your department is not acting exactly as it should act, and doing everything it should do. I am only wishing to know whether we could get information in this direction. Can you tell us what the Reformatory population is? That is, you have 775 children in Reformatories in Scotland; how many do you discharge annually?—I daresay we have in England and Scotland 5000 of a permanent population in the schools.

14,727. I want the permanent population outside the schools. How many are discharged in Scotland per annum?—That is all given per annum, but the population goes on for so many years. Frequently we have returns from the prisons of boys who have been away ten or fifteen years.

14,728. If we can get the number of children discharged each year we can easily get an actuarial estimate as to the age they will live.—Witness—Taking the population going out within the last three years, we say that during that three years only a certain number have been convicted, and we think that shows pretty well if we are doing well or not, if a boy keeps straight for three years after leaving the Reformatory.

age do they leave the Reformatory?—At 17, 18, or 19 years of age.

14,730. (By the Chairman.) I want the number of discharges from Reformatories?—We can make that table out, but it is not in the report. But it gives you a very fair approximation—475.

14,731. This table on page 20 shows 646 reported on during three years. That would give an average of a third a year, which would give practically the discharges, would it not?—Yes.

14,732. That would give 215 discharges per annum. But if you turn to page 316 of your report you will find another table, an abstract table, which gives the number discharged, transferred, or died in 1893 in Scotland as 166. That does not tally with our calculation of 213, does it?—No.

14,733. The number who were discharged must be less than 166. Allow six for deaths and transfers—and that is under the mark—that would give you 160 discharged, whereas, if you turn to the table on page 20, you have a three years' population numbering 646. A third of that is 215, against 160, which would be about 70 different. That in a small number like this is a very large figure.—Witness—Some years are more, some years are less.

14,734. Then was 1893 an exceptionally small year?—The numbers in Scotch Reformatories are very much reduced in the last few years.

14,735. Well, they have been very much reduced, but they are going up again now, are they not?—Very slightly.

14,736. Well, we have got it that the number for 1893 was 775, have we not?—These figures are absolutely correct.

14,737. Then may we take the annual increment at about 160 or 170?—Something like that, or 200.

14,738. So you get discharges in three years at about 600?—Yes.

14,739. How long has the Reformatory system been in operation?—This is the 37th report of the Inspector appointed.

14,740. Now we come to expenses of Reformatories. Have you any tabular statement giving them for the whole country?—Yes. You will find a resumé of it here on page 23.

14,741. I find here on page 24, 'The average cost of maintenance, including rent and expenses of disposal, and allowing the usual set-off for the profits of the labours of the inmates, was for Boys' Reformatories in Scotland £18, 1s. 8d., and for Girls' Reformatories in Scotland £26, 7s. 4d., against £21, 2s. 3d. for Boys' Reformatories in England, and £20, 1s. 4d. for Girls' Reformatories in England.' Will you tell us how it is, that whereas the average cost for maintenance, including rent and expenses on disposal, in the case of boys is £3 more in England than it is in Scotland, the average cost in the case of girls is more than £6 less in England than it is in Scotland?—That is very easily explained. It is because there is so small a number to divide the main cost with. The abstract is made out by dividing the main cost by the number of inmates.

14,742. But the boys in England cost £21, 2s. 3d. against £18, 1s. 8d. in Scotland, do they not?—That is very easily explained. The boys in Scotland live on much less food than the boys in England. There is not so much meat food given as in England. They live cheaper, according to the wants and feeling of the country, than they do in England.

14,743. Scotch Boys' Reformatories are not so big as the English, I suppose?—There is a sufficient number in the Reformatories in England to divide out advantageously.

14,744. More advantageously than in Scotland?—Yes.

14,745. In the case of girls, on the other hand, the English girl costs only £20 as against £21 for the English boy, and £26 for the Scotch girl?—That is precisely so. There are only two of these small schools in Scotland. There are quite a few handfuls of children, and the same staff as for twice the number. Consequently they divide out for much more.

14,746. Can you fix the allowance per inmate?—Exactly the same for both the English and Scotch—6s. a-week.

14,747. And the Reformatory authorities are supposed, where it is possible, to recover the 6s. per week from the parents, are they not?—The Government take all the recovery from the parents.

14,748. But the Reformatory authorities collect it?—No; they collect nothing. The Government collect it all.

14,749. Then will you let me know what the Government allowance amounts to in Scotland. What is the actual expenditure—the total amount for Scotland?—I could supply that.

14,750. Could you tell us from the Civil Service Estimates?—Yes.

14,751. Sir Colin Scott Moncreiff (reading from the Estimates). The Scotch Reformatory Schools received £12,500.

14,752. (The Chairman, proceeding). And the amount received from parents of juvenile offenders in Reformatory Schools for 1893 were in Scotland what?—£297.

14,753. So that you practically expend £12,000 on the 6s. a-week, and recover only £297, or practically nothing?—It is very difficult to recover from parents in Scotland.

14,754. Is it much more difficult to recover from parents in Scotland than in England?—Yes, very much more.

14,755. What is the total English grant?—(Sir Colin Scott Moncreiff.) £63,000, of which £4337 is recovered.

14,756. (The Chairman.) Sir Colin tells me from the Estimates that the amount of the grant in England is only £63,080, which is five times the Scotch grant. Therefore the Reformatory system cannot be so largely developed in England as in Scotland. Of the £60,000 in England, you can recover £4,400, or a fifteenth, against less than £308 in Scotland, or less than a fortieth. Is there any reason for the difference of the amount recovered?—It is a much more difficult process in Scotland than it is in England. We can't appear in Court in the former country. In England we utilise the services of the police; our superintendent of police can appear. But one can't do that in Scotland. That makes a great deal of difference.

14,757. In Industrial Schools you make a grant. What do you pay there?—We pay 5s. a-week in the old schools, and in the new schools 3s. 6d. a-week.

14,758. I thought you paid 4s.?—Almost all the old schools get 5s. a-week, but it is slightly reduced after a few years, when the child has attained fifteen years of age. It is reduced to 3s., and we only pay 3s. at the age of 6, and from 5 to 8; but from 8 to 15 we pay 5s.

14,759. How is that recovered from parents?—By the same process.

14,760. It appears from the Estimates that in the case of Reformatory Schools there was recovered in England £4,400 for the last year against £338 in Scotland—that is to say, a mere fraction, less than a twelfth, of the amount recovered in England. In the case of Industrial Schools, on the other hand, against £10,700 recovered in England, there is £5289 recovered in Scotland, or more than a half. How is that difference to be accounted for?—That is partly owing to the allowances made by Parochial Boards to children sent to our Industrial Schools.

14,761. Doesn't that occur in England?—No. We deal very much more with the parent in England than in Scotland. All Industrial Schools in Scotland must be made pauper establishments, and the parochial authorities make a large use of them. They require to pay a certain sum for the children sent to those schools, which thus relieve the burdens of the country. We have had many struggles and fights to bring these on our list, but we managed to make a compromise, and they generally pay 2s. 6d. a-week if a good case is made out, and that 2s. 6d. a-week goes to swell the amount recovered.

14,762. How are the same class of children dealt with in England?—They are dealt with in the Industrial School in the ordinary way; there is no corresponding process of that kind in England.

14,763. Can you tell us exactly what the liability of

Mr. Henry
Rogers.

the Parochial Board is in respect to children?—It is contained in the clause of Industrial Schools Act which refers to Scotland—the Act of 1866. Section 38 says:—‘In Scotland, where a child sent to a Certified Industrial School under this Act is, at the time of his being so sent, or within three months then last past has been chargeable to any parish, the Parochial Board, and Inspector of Poor of the parish of settlement of such child, if the settlement of the child is in any parish in Scotland, shall, as long as he continues so chargeable, be liable to repay to the Commissioners of Her Majesty’s Treasury all expenses incurred in maintaining him at school under this Act to an amount not exceeding 5s. per week, and, in default of payment, those expenses may be recovered by the Inspector of Industrial Schools, or any agent of the Inspector of Industrial Schools, or any agent of the Inspector in a summary manner before a magistrate having jurisdiction in the place where the parish is situate.’

14,764. Is there anything of that sort in England?—No.

14,765. Is there any analogous case in regard to Reformatory Schools in either Scotland or England?—Nothing. That is an entirely criminal Act.

14,766. I see that the grant for Reformatory Schools is £12,500; for Industrial Schools, £57,000; and for Day Industrial Schools, £1,300. How do you pay in the case of the Day Industrial Schools?—We only pay 1s. a week; the whole cost of the food is only 1s. 3d.; and the School Boards contribute the rest, and they also have a lien on the parent.

14,767. Is there nothing whatever recovered on the Day Industrial Schools?—They get what they can out of the parent. We don’t touch that. The school is entitled to the parental contribution in the case of Day Industrial Schools.

14,768. Did you not mention that the Reformatory School system in Scotland was dying out largely?—It suffered greatly from the disinclination of magistrates to send a boy to the preliminary course of imprisonment, but that is now taken away, and the magistrate can send him right from the Court to the Reformatory. One is hopeful, therefore, that the system will be more largely utilised.

14,769. They can do that in England too, can they not?—Yes.

14,770. You have told us about young people who have been in Reformatory Schools and got into prison. Can you tell us anything about children who have been in Industrial Schools and got into prison? Have you a table of percentages analogous to those given us before?—I have some statistics of the number of children in Industrial Schools.

14,771. Well, what is the number of children in Industrial Schools?—4,600.

14,772. Do you follow them for any length of time?—In exactly the same manner as in the case of the Reformatory Schools—for a period of three years after their discharge.

14,773. Does that include the period of probation, or exclude it?—It does not include the period of probation.

14,774. Every child is let out on licence at fifteen. Is it then included under your term ‘discharged’?—No, it must be formally discharged before it comes under our term ‘discharged.’

14,775. Have you got a table of discharges similar to that you showed us in the case of Reformatory Schools?—On page 29 you will find the total discharges. You see we have got the total population there. The total discharges to the same date (December 31st, 1893) were—boys, 63,890; girls, 16,396; total, 80,286.

14,776. But that is for the United Kingdom, is it not?—Yes. On page 31, however, fuller details are given. Scotch schools—number reported on, 1873 Protestant boys, of whom there were doing well 1695, doubtful 41, convicted 65, and unknown 72. The percentages are given below, and show briefly—Protestant boys, 3 per cent. of convictions against 15 in Reformatory Schools; Protestant girls, 2 per cent. convictions against 3 in the case of Reformatory Schools; Roman Catholic boys, 12 per cent. convictions against 38 per cent. in the Reformatories; and Roman Catholic girls, 1 per cent. convictions, and no corresponding column in the Reformatories.

14,777. How do you account for the greater proportion of convictions in Roman Catholic ex-Industrial School girls than ex-Reformatory School girls?—The Roman Catholic girls are very little looked after when they are discharged.

14,778. I observe that the children appear to be very much better looked after on the whole from the Industrial Schools than from the Reformatory Schools, inasmuch as the number of unknown in this whole lot is only 4 per cent. Protestant boys, 3 per cent. Protestant girls, and 2 per cent. Roman Catholic girls. Can you explain that?—Well, they are more easily dealt with. There is a greater tie between the school and the boys, as naturally you could expect. The child is not so vicious and intractable, not so daring. Then the Reformatory boy or girl is older and goes away, and gets away altogether. He has been stamped as a criminal, and he wants to get out of observation.

14,779. I suppose you find there is a number of boys and girls outside these years who do find their way into prison?—A good many girls get into trouble when they leave, unless they are properly looked after. It is a very critical age at which they leave Industrial Schools.

14,780. In the Greenock prison I found 14 Industrial School children during the year; and a few of them have been imprisoned several times in 1894. Would that surprise you?—No, it would not surprise me.

14,781. It is not an abnormally large percentage then?—No, I think not, if you take the whole population. It’s a very large population from which they are taken. Many of those you would find had been some years away from the Industrial Schools. But we can’t very well apply our test in any other way than the present, because we lose sight of those children. It is very difficult for the managers of schools themselves to extend their enquiries, or keep in touch with those children.

14,782. You have given us the cost of boys and girls in Scotch and English Reformatories. Can you give it now in Scotch and English Industrial Schools?—On page 32 you will see that the average cost per head of maintenance, including rent and disposal expenses, is in mixed schools for boys and girls £14, 0s. 1d. in Scotland; as against £15, 9s. in England. In the schools for boys only it is £14, 8s. in Scotland, as against £19, 0s. 4d. in England. In the schools for girls only, it is £13, 10s. 0d. in Scotland, against £17, 10s. 5d. in England.

14,783. Now, would you please explain to us how Reformatories and Industrial Schools are supported. You give a grant of 6s. a week in the case of Reformatories, and 5s. or less in the Industrial Schools, do you not?—Yes, 5s. or 3s. 6d.

14,784. Then who contributes the balance?—The balance is made up in England by something which exists only to a very small extent in Scotland. No child is received from the committing authority without a guarantee of 1s. 6d., 2s., or 2s. 6d. a week in addition to the Government allowance. In the case of the Reformatories, a child would not be received without a guarantee from the committing authority of a supplementary grant of 2s. or 2s. 6d., as it may happen.

14,785. Who guarantees that then?—The County Council, or, in former times, the Quarter Sessions. The County Councils have the fullest statutory authority to contribute to the management of those schools.

14,786. Then can the County Councils recover that?—There is no recovery. It is an absolute grant.

14,787. Is there any other method by which they are supported?—The profit derived from industrial pursuits—what they make for themselves, of course—but nothing else. In England in the large schools the boys can go out and assist their neighbours in farm work, and so on; and in all the agricultural colonies the boys do go out freely whenever their labour is required or acceptable.

14,788. You speak of agricultural colonies. Do you mean Reformatories?—I mean Reformatories established right in the country.

30 Jan. 1895.

Mr. Henry
Rogers.

30 Jan. 1895.

14,789. Who has the control of the Reformatories?—The managers themselves of the different institutions. But we grant licences, and they satisfy our requirements. They carry on the institution at their own discretion, but in conformity with our regulations. They must not exceed the Home Office regulations.

14,790. Do you say in Scotland there are no grants by the County Councils?—Not to the same extent. The Prison Board in past times were accustomed to make an occasional grant, but no capitation grant like that in England. Hence the difference in the cost per head. The Scotch schools can't afford it, but the English schools have the money, and they spend it.

14,791. But take the case of certain Reformatories, for instance Aberdeen, where the County Council give, I think, £600 a-year. How is that?—Those schools got into pecuniary trouble, and applied to the County Council, and I think the agreement was to give them £600 or £800 a-year. But that is an unusual thing.

14,792. But has not the County Council here power to make this contribution of 1s. 6d. or 2s. as it is wanted?—That form of capitation grant is not adopted in Scotland.

14,793. Is there any difference in the statutory power of the English County Council and the Scotch County Council in that matter?—Yes, I think there would be some legal differences. Their powers are not stated in the same way. But I am not quite sure that there is anything to prevent the County Council in Scotland at present from providing capitation grants. It would be not be awarded quite in the same manner, but one has not found there is really any legal difficulty in the way of Scotch County Councils contributing.

14,794. What does your inspection of these schools consist of? Have you just one inspection? Are there Inspectors for the different branches, or does one Inspector do the whole work?—Our inspection is very comprehensive.

14,795. Oh yes. I merely ask what it is. You inspect yourself, I suppose?—Yes.

14,796. Then do you inspect the education as well as everything else?—We do. We inspect also the bedding and the domestic arrangements and everything in the house. We have to look into everything and see that the requirements and wants of the boys are properly looked after. Everything comes under our notice when we go; therefore I say it is a most comprehensive thing, and requires perfect knowledge of the whole of the schools to do it properly. Of late years, I am glad to say, we are trying to introduce a second, or surprise visit in addition to the annual regular inspection. I may say that nearly all the schools in Scotland have been subjected to a surprise visit in 1894.

14,797. You are the educational authority as well as everything?—Yes, we have to examine every child once a year.

14,798. And the code you use is the English code?—It is very much according to the necessities of the case. We can't come up to the English code in every particular, but we sail as close to the wind as we can. We are obliged to put the same test nearly to all children, but there is not very much difference.

14,799. Is there any practical reason why the educational inspector should not do the educational part of this inspection?—There is no reason in the world why he should not, except this—that it gives the Home Office Inspector a very close knowledge of the children being with them four or five hours in the school. When I sit down to make an inspection I mix with the children. They talk to me, and I see how they are made up and how they do their work. I gather there, too, what the real tone of the management is.

14,800. Have you any table in your report showing the educational status of the children in Scotch Schools?—In every case there is a full educational report of every school in the kingdom.

14,801. Have you no summary embracing the whole country?—Well, there's a very full educational report here on page 268: 'Educational state.—Order and 'attention in both schoolrooms very good. In the 'boys' schoolroom there were 20 in Standard V.; a 'very good class, good work, no failures. 25 in 'Standard IV.; reading writing, and arithmetic good; Mr. Henry Rogers

'dictation good, with one exception. In both these Rogers
'classes, the children had been taught mental arithmetic,
'and geography of Europe. 25 in Standard III.;
'reading good; writing generally good; 6 failures in
'dictation; two failures in arithmetic. 16 in Standard
'II.; reading, with one exception, good; writing very 'fair; five failures in dictation; four in arithmetic.
'Standard I. were receiving instructions with the 'girls. In the second schoolroom I found 12 girls
'in Standard IV.; a good class, all passed in all
'subjects. 12 girls in Standard III.; reading good;
'spelling indifferent; writing very fair; dictation
'good; one failure in arithmetic. 10 in Standard II.;
'one failure in arithmetic. 5 girls and 19 boys in 'Standard I.; coming on very well. 15 boys and
'5 girls in a preparatory class; mostly newcomers.'
Moreover, there is an individual examination of all the children. We take every child in every class, and every child reads to us, and does four or five sums on the slate, and does dictation, and gives answers in geography and also does a piece of recitation, &c.

14,802. How many schools are you able to overtake in the course of the year?—Our schools amount to about 140 in England and Scotland, of which 34 are in Scotland. There are three Inspectors at the present time.

14,803. This is the educational report on the Dundee Industrial School for Girls: 'The order and 'attention in the schoolroom were very good; but the 'girls scarcely so bright as I have seen them. But 'they passed a very fair examination. There were 20 'girls in Standard V.; very fair reading, very good 'writing; one failure in dictation; four failures 'in arithmetic. 12 in Standard IV.; very fair read- 'ing; very good writing; one failure in dictation, and 'one in arithmetic. 12 in Standard III.; no failures. '10 in Standard II.; no failures. 16 in Standard I.; 'one failure in arithmetic. Nine in a preparatory 'class; all very young or newcomers. The girls are 'exercised in musical drill, and are taught singing.' We visited that school, and were struck with the fact that a very large number of the girls in Standard V. had been through Standard V. before, once or twice, and one even three times. How was that?—Yes, we don't think it desirable to go beyond Standard V. in our Industrial Schools. We don't see the necessity of girls learning decimal fractions: I would rather see them learning the making of puddings.

14,804. But is the alternative of making puddings given?—There is the alternative given to every child. We only require them to keep up to a certain standard after reaching it, and then to perfect the industrial training of the child in sewing, machine work, and especially cooking, or laundry work, or whatever the girl is going in for. We think, and I am sure the ladies agree with us, that it is far better to do this than to go on cramming a quantity of stuff into their heads which they will forget after six months.

14,805. Are the girls freed from work at the class to do this industrial work?—They don't go every day to the school room, but we take care that they read every night, and we keep up the standard they have reached.

14,806. Then Standard V. is kept up all round?—Yes, we don't see any advantage in going beyond it. I give you my impression after long acquaintance with these schools. The children forget everything with the greatest ease. We sometimes have children coming back after a year, and they seem to forget everything. As for decimal fractions or mensuration, it is useless.

14,807. Can you tell us what standard of the Scotch Code Standard V. corresponds to?—Scotch reading and acquaintance with books is admirable, but they are always behind when we apply Standard V. arithmetic to Scotch schools, because the Scotch standard is a standard behind.

14,808. But are the other subjects of the Scotch standard the same? Does Standard V. of the English Code correspond with Standard V. of the Scotch in other respects?—It is very much the same as the Scotch Code. It is superior to the Scotch Code only in the matter of arithmetic.

14,809. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Do you expect the

Mr. Henry
Rogers.

30 Jan. 1895.

same standard of efficiency in the standards in Industrial Schools as you do in a public school?—Quite; there are not quite so many extra subjects, however. We can't quite keep up to the standard of public schools in those.

14,810. Then you are not so rigid in your examination of an Industrial School child as the Inspector of a public school would be?—Not quite in extra subjects, but in the rest we are quite as particular.

14,811. How about girls' work? Is that part of your Code?—That is quite a part of our Code.

14,812. And do you inspect that also?—Yes.

14,813. Is it satisfactory?—We always have very good knitting and, I may say, sewing too. I think our English sewing is superior to the Scotch sewing, but the Scotch knitting is superior to the English.

14,814. Now, I want to ask you this: A boy is committed, we will say, by a magistrate to a Reformatory for 5 years. That is considered, I suppose, as a sort of sentence more or less punitive; but we found cases in which, after a boy had been so sentenced, the Reformatories would not take him in, and he was discharged. Is that a common thing?—Not very common.

14,815. I give you an example. We found in Dundee prison a boy suffering from lupus of the face. He had been sentenced, the Governor told me, in the first place to a few days' imprisonment, and then to the Reformatory. The custom, the Governor told me, was to leave the name of the Reformatory blank until they found whether the Reformatory would take him. Is that so?—That is the custom.

14,816. No Reformatory would take this boy because he had lupus of the face, and at the end of ten days he walked about his business. He had been in gaol repeatedly since. What do you say to that?—Now you name that lupus of the face, I can tell you that you would not get a Reformatory in the kingdom that would take him in. We don't call ourselves infirmaries. There are not the means at the disposal of the Reformatories to deal with such a case. It would be a chronic case.

14,817. There's another case we came across—a boy in Glasgow prison who had been an inmate of a Reformatory, and who had had some operation performed on him there which brought about a certain form of paralysis that made him an undesirable inmate, and he was turned out at half his time. Have you anything to say in regard to that?—I may say at once no Reformatory could take such a case. It could not deal with it.

14,818. But this came on after he was in, and he was then turned out.—Witness.—The first thing they would do when they found it out—when they found a boy unfit for discipline or industrial work—would be to put him out. A boy unfit for discipline and an industrial occupation would not be received in our Industrial Schools. They have not means to deal with those cases.

14,819. There's another case I should like an explanation of. In visiting a Reformatory we were told of a girl who had been sent there, and was found to be suffering from a certain disease that compelled her being sent to a Lock Hospital. When she came back she was more or less obstreperous, and she was sent to a Magdalen Institution. I don't at all question that that may have been a very good place for her, but is there any provision of the law sanctioning such a thing?—We frequently have cases of the kind. We send them to the infirmary or the hospital of the place near to which the Reformatory is situated, and if we can deal with the case we take them in.

14,820. I am not questioning that. It is evident that you should be able to send them to a special hospital; but the point of this girl's case was that when she came back and was obstreperous—committed some breaches of discipline or something of that sort—she was sent to a Magdalen Institution. Was that legal?—Well, you may rely upon it that that child was something more than obstreperous; she was outrageous.

14,821. I am not questioning that, but what is the machinery under which that would be done?—A medical certificate must be sent to the Secretary of State, and he sends a discharge on the understanding that she would be sent to one of these penitentiaries.

14,822. Would the girl be discharged?—Entirely discharged. No manager has the power to send a boy or girl away without the concurrence and the special warrant of the Secretary of State.

14,823. So, was she discharged before going to the Magdalen Institution?—I don't say she was, but she ought to have been.

14,824. Then a girl being put in a Reformatory, if she had not been discharged, I suppose would be in the position of an inmate out on licence, still a prisoner of the place?—She would be regarded as an inmate out on licence, but we should not pay for her in one of those institutions—we should not pay it to the Reformatory.

14,825. You would not pay the grant, even if the girl was not discharged?—The moment she leaves the institution the Government grant is gone.

14,826. If she is out on probation is the grant gone?—Yes.

14,827. Would it be competent then to make use of the probational machinery to send her out to such a place as a Magdalen Institution?—Only on licence. We could not put her under the disciplinary charge of any other institution and pay for it.

14,828. What is the procedure in the case of transfers?—On application to the Secretary of State for a transfer from one school to another there is a warrant granted and sent to both schools, and the thing is done.

14,829. Is there any machinery for visiting Reformatories and Industrial Schools—apart, I mean, from the people who subscribe to them and take an interest in them?—On certain days they are always open. They are not closed places at all.

14,830. Is there visiting by Justices?—No visiting by Justices, because there is a committee of management, and Justices constitute those committees frequently.

14,831. Then, in the case of a Reformatory for instance, you might have a committee without any official member whatever, might you not?—Only a self-constituted committee, but, of course, they are respectable gentlemen.

14,832. What are your rules about corporal punishment?—These are all laid down by law.

14,833. What are the corporal punishments?—In a Reformatory, they consist in punishments up to 18 strokes of the birch; and in an Industrial School they are not to exceed 12 strokes. That is for very extreme punishments, of course. There are modified forms, and the discipline is mainly carried on after all by a system of rewards and punishments, and so the boys find if they commit an ordinary offence.

14,834. What about confinement?—Confinement to a cell is permitted up to three days.

14,835. A dark cell?—No, a light cell. No dark cell is allowed.

14,836. You don't allow flogging for girls, do you?—Certainly, if they are very obstreperous. Sometimes it is more necessary for girls than for boys, but it must be modified by circumstances. But there are cases and conditions under which corporal punishment must be inflicted on girls as well as boys, or we could not keep up discipline. I don't advocate any too severe control over girls, but there have been cases in my experience where nothing but a whipping will bring these children to their senses.

14,837. Up to what age does the official permission to whip girls extend?—I don't think there is any official rule; it is best perhaps not to have one on that point, but of course we generally recommend no application of corporal punishment to girls after the age of 14 or 15. It is for the young girls I advocate it.

14,838. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Are all punishments logged?—Every punishment is required to be recorded.

14,839. Should you inspect the punishment books when you make your inspection?—I do, and sign them.

14,840. Is it not the case that you have hospitals attached to every Industrial School and Industrial Training Ship?—We have in Training Ships, for moderate cases, but not for critical cases. We, as a general rule, send them to a public hospital.

14,841. And they are brought back, when cured, to the ship?—Yes.

14,842. If you cannot receive a boy into a Reformatory because he has got lupus on the face, have you any suggestion to make as to what should be done with that boy?—I can't make any suggestion in regard to that particular case. I see no difficulty, however, in this way of establishing an Industrial School or Reformatory in the country for the treatment of those cases.

14,843. What is done with the bed wetters?—Well we cure them as far as we can.

14,844. Is not a bed wetter quite as objectionable a boy as a boy with lupus on his nose?—No, we can deal with the one, not with the other. We can deal with the first class you speak of, because by careful management, kindness, attention, and vigilance we can cure the one, but the other case we could not deal with.

14,845. There was a boy suffering from that skin disease to which I have just referred, who was dismissed from a Reformatory and turned adrift; and we found him in Edinburgh prison because he was a disagreeable boy in school. What do you say to that?—Well, a little more enquiry would find other causes probably for that dismissal. It would be an incorrigible case, and the boy would be a dirty, idle fellow.

14,846. But you are aware that the officers and bigger boys have been known to bully these boys as being undesirable members of the school?—I can't allow that generally. An incapable man might be unkind to a boy like that, but a capable man would look after him.

14,847. Do you really think that a boy because he has lupus on his nose should be kept out of a school where there is a small hospital and a doctor attached?—Yes, I do.

14,848. Why is there a doctor on the staff?—To deal with the ordinary cases, not the extraordinary cases. We can't deal with those extreme cases, such as breaking out of diphtheria and typhoid fever. Such a case would require constant attention. You would require a nurse to deal with a case of lupus. This school is for discipline and improvement; it is not an infirmary.

14,849. But still you think those children ought to be dealt with some way?—Yes, certainly, but we can't do it with the present constitution of our schools.

14,850. Who decides what the diseases are which should exclude a boy or girl from any of these schools?—The medical officer would say, 'This is a chronic case, and would require a nurse and a special treatment'; and we are also afraid that the thing might spread. But our sick boys always meet with kind attention.

14,851. Do you think that an extra allowance would be given for such a case in a special institution?—I do so. I don't see that the Government should have any proper objection to the establishment of such a school, and to giving 8s. or even 10s. of a grant.

14,852. (By the Chairman.) Do I understand you to say that you think the Government would have no objection in the case of a special school for the reception of reformatory and industrial school children who were infirm and subject to some disease, such as has been referred to?—I quite believe that the Home Secretary, if the case were properly represented to him, would be most anxious to entertain a scheme and give some additional grant. I'll not say a double grant, but some additional grant.

14,853. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Who do you think should decide what the diseases are that should exclude a boy?—These have not been tabulated. A committee of medical men would soon give us reasonable advice on that point. They would exclude all those chronic cases and inveterate cases that you can't deal with except after a long course of treatment. Our medical men are anxious to receive cases, and would not refuse them except under such discouragement.

14,854. In the medical report filled in before the boy goes to the school you don't specify any complaints, and a boy may have a good physique and yet have lupus on the nose?—We don't expect him. We could not deal with him, mixing with other boys. Such a boy would go about and do what he liked because he knew he was not subject to any discipline.

14,855. But in prisons the existence of lupus on the nose is no excuse for escaping discipline?—In prison no conditions can be laid down. Here they can.

14,856. The same conditions in regard to punishments for breaches of discipline, &c., would apply, I should think, equally to a reformatory school as to a prison, in which there are a good many of the same age as is met with in a reformatory?—There is no necessity to receive any case in a reformatory, whereas in a prison you must receive every one. A reformatory is not a prison, but a school.

14,857. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) In cases near the border of England and Scotland, do Scotch boys always go to Scotch schools, and English to English?—Mostly; but some boys go over the border. We send boys to Stranraer Reformatory from the Mansion House here. There has been a communication between Stranraer and the Lord Mayor, and boys have been sent to Stranraer for many years.

14,858. Now, who settles the place where they are to go?—The authorities have the right under the Act of making agreement with the managers of the various schools as they think proper. Stranraer takes them because they get 2s. 6d. a week. The Stranraer people get nothing from the County Council or the Prison Board. They have to make the money or get it from those who send the children. But it is a self-contained school, and does a great deal of work.

14,859. In that case, how do they collect the money from the parents?—We collect the money from the parents in the spot they reside in, and they are mostly in London, so we collect it.

14,860. Suppose a boy or girl is sentenced to a reformatory, the child cannot go straight from the dock to the reformatory is at the other end of the country. What is done with it in the meantime? Where does it spend the night or two nights on the way?—Well, the department now pays for the transference of the child from one point to another. If the child were going to Stranraer, he would be put up at Carlisle most likely.

14,861. And where would he put up there?—He would be in charge of a police constable, who would be responsible.

14,862. Is that done straight away? Is there always a constable ready to take a child right away at Police Courts in England?—There are certainly men ready at once.

14,863. No delay?—No delay whatever. He is sent right away.

14,864. Suppose any child sentenced by a county magistrate, would there be any delay there?—There would not be much delay with county constables. They get the money back. There used to be a little difficulty at first, after the change. We had this arrangement in reformatory school procedure. A boy was sent to prison first, and then to the reformatory, and when there was a change it was a little disordered at first. But we're working all right now.

14,865. (By Miss Stevenson.) Is it not the case that in the licences to these reformatory and industrial schools the managers have power to refuse children, and that in the committing sections of the Act the phrase is used 'to a school of which the managers are willing to receive him'?—It is so.

14,866. Then, how do you find out when a boy is committed and before he is sent off to a particular school that the managers are willing to receive him?—In the main part of this business previous arrangements are made for the reception of boys from different localities whom they guarantee to receive.

14,867. Before the case is tried?—Whatever case you like to send them, if it satisfies their general conditions they will receive it.

14,868. But I have known cases where an industrial school and reformatory were full, and the boys have been going about after a term of imprisonment with no place to send them to. In the case of industrial schools, a child was going about with a warrant attached to him and no place ready to receive him. What would you say about that sort of case?—The industrial school boy can be sent to the Union workhouse, or he may be sent to the police cells. That difficulty, however, of where to keep a boy in the interval is not yet settled.

14,869. There was a very considerable contribution made by Parochial Boards in Scotland for children maintained in industrial schools. So far as I can make out the amount was somewhere about £150, was it not?—Oh, it is much larger than that.

14,870. Payments from parents and Parochial Boards?—It is mostly from Parochial Boards.

14,871. I should like to understand this table which gives the particulars of the receipts given to each school, beginning at page 432.—These Parochial Board payments are made under the 17th section of the Industrial Schools Act of 1866. The Parochial Boards pay the whole cost.

14,872. Oh, this is really what is paid to the managers of the schools and not to the Treasury?—Yes. When a child is insubordinate at the workhouse, they say to the industrial school, 'Will you take this boy?' The section runs as follows:—'Where the guardians of the poor of a Union, or of a parish wherein relief is administered by the Board of Guardians, or the Board of Management of a district pauper school, or the Parochial Board of a parish or combination, represent to two justices or a magistrate that any child apparently under the age of fourteen years maintained in a workhouse or pauper school of a union or parish, or in a district pauper school, or in the poorhouse of a parish or combination, is refractory, or is the child of parents either of whom has been convicted of a crime or offence punishable with penal servitude or imprisonment, and that it is desirable that he be sent to an industrial school under this Act, the justices or magistrate may, if satisfied that it is expedient to deal with the child under this Act, order him to be sent to a certified industrial school.'

14,873. With regard to the education given to children in industrial schools, you examine, as I understand it, according, roughly, to the provisions of the English Code?—Yes.

14,874. But in the schools under the Day Industrial Schools (Scotland) Act and the Juvenile Delinquency Act of Glasgow, do you apply the same standard to the children?—Pretty much the same. We require to keep rather nearer the Code in those two schools.

14,875. Is there not a difficulty arising in the case of those children sent there as truants, and who are only in the school for a few months? Doesn't it break the continuity of their education?—What we have to do with the children in those truant schools is so elementary that it doesn't make any difference. The Code we apply is not, at any rate, lower than the Scotch Code, so they accept our Code.

14,876. I understand personally you are very much in favour of the establishment of day industrial schools?—I think they are most useful schools, and I should be very glad to see a few more in Scotland. If you would allow me to express my opinion, I should like to see one or two in Dundee, and certainly in Greenock, and a couple, or one at any rate, in Aberdeen.

14,877. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Have you noticed that the proportion of boys in reformatories to the total population in Scotland is much larger than in England?—Yes.

14,878. I have worked the figures out here roughly, and I find that in Scotland there is a boy in a reformatory for every 5150 of the population, while in England there is only a boy in a reformatory for every 7270 of the population. What is the reason of the much larger proportion in Scotland? Is it explained by the fact Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff has just drawn attention to?—It is rather a difficult question to answer, but I think it is more because the centres of population are more concentrated in Scotland than England, consequently at such places as Dundee we have a very large number, and they come from a very dangerous class of children.

14,879. Would you be inclined to explain it, then, by the inferior character of the population of Scotland?—No; but I think these large towns are very bad. There is not a city in the world that presents so many formidable aspects as Glasgow and Dundee, and therefore I think you get a very large number from places such as that.

14,880. What would be the number of English boys at Stranraer?—They say there are about 80 cases at Stranraer, and I daresay some 50 or 60 English boys.

14,881. Are there any Scotch boys in English schools?—Oh yes, accidentally, by way of a large Scotch population. They send us a few, and from quite scattered parts; but Carlisle sends by design to Dumfries.

14,882. Do you think that the power of licensing boys out from reformatories is sufficiently used?—No, I don't think it is. I think it might be used to greater advantage.

14,883. Is there any great tendency on the part of the managers of some schools to keep the boys at home during the latter part of their time, when their work has become valuable?—There is rather a disposition in that direction, I must say. I think some more stringent regulation in that respect is required to insist upon the managers placing their boys out on licence. It is a most dangerous thing to keep a boy too long in a reformatory or industrial school.

14,884. Have you noticed that in Scotland they are much worse in that respect than in England?—In England about a fifth are out on licence, in Scotland only about a ninth. There is a tendency in this way, where a trade is carried on to a large extent, and is a thriving one. It does act prejudicially to the placing out of boys when they ought be placed out.

14,885. (By Colonel M'Hurly.) You said that in some cases boys and girls had been refused admission on account of their physical condition. How many would there be in a year?—It would be no evidence to say what the condition of things is now, because it is so well understood that the schools would not take these children that no application is made. The health question is on every paper of enquiry, and it is distinctly stated that no child unfit for discipline can be received.

14,886. You said it was dangerous to keep a boy or girl longer in the reformatory or industrial school than the proper time. How is the time arrived at, and what is the danger?—The danger is if you keep a boy too long—say in a reformatory school—he becomes thoroughly sick and tired of his detention. He thinks he might be just as well outside working for his own advantage as for the benefit of the managers inside. Then when he gets out he goes into a workshop and finds younger boys than himself making better wages than he can, because he is not accustomed to the ways of the shop, and he has to go as an improver. So he gets discouraged.

14,887. Would the case be the same with the girls?—Well, we always have domestic service for the girls. It does not matter so much with girls. We don't deal with them nearly so much.

14,888. The time in each case would have to be determined on its own merits, I suppose, according to the boy's temperament?—Yes; but if a boy gets on well, and is able to earn his own living after three and a-half years, he should be sent out.

14,889. How have three and a-half years come to be a proper time?—Suppose a boy goes in at fifteen, when he comes to eighteen he generally has more sense, and begins to see his way.

14,890. You find that the Prison Commissioners in Scotland had a good deal of trouble when the new Act was passed about the disposition of the child during the time that the reformatory was settled upon, where imprisonment was not made necessary, but was optional. The question, you say, has been settled in England by sending the boy to the Union workhouse?—Yes.

14,891. But in Scotland a great number of cases come to the knowledge of the Prison Commissioners, where, for convenience, and utterly against the spirit of the Act, the magistrate has committed a boy for two or three days to the prison, because then the Government would pay, and no one else. You say that question has not been settled. That is a very undesirable state of things, I suppose?—It is very undesirable. The question presents many difficulties.

14,892. Of course your department is one to which we look for action in the matter?—I think so—the Home Office.

14,893. And you say no action has been taken?—No action has been taken. There are many difficulties attached to the question. There is no place—the county authorities don't establish a place; and in many cases, perhaps, the police officer takes the boy to his own house, or puts him into the police cell.

14,894. It is a financial difficulty, is it not?—A good deal.

14,895. Can't your department get over it?—The only way we could do it is to establish a few places here and there.

14,896. (By Miss Stevenson.) Since this previous imprisonment has been done away with in committals to reformatories, have you had evidence as to there being any greater difficulty in maintaining discipline in the reformatory schools?—I have had some few remarks made to me on that subject, but I don't pay much attention to it.

14,897. My reason is that I saw in an Edinburgh paper yesterday, in the report of the Dalry Reformatory, that the managers there attributed the insubordination of some five girls during the past year to the fact that they had been sent direct from the Police Court to the reformatory without the previous discipline of imprisonment.—I don't think there is much in it. But of course they say at Dalry that the girls come to them much more unruly than they used to be. They were tamed down a little bit by the imprisonment, but I think the advantages are so great under the new system that we must get over these difficulties.

14,898. In the day industrial schools (Scotland) Act, 1894, there is a provision for children sent under section 4 of the Act as truants to an industrial school, that they must be let out on licence after three months. Do you approve of that?—Yes.

14,899. You think three months is quite sufficient time for a boy who is a truant to be under discipline?—I think it is quite enough to give him a lesson.

Rogers.

MR. C. S. LOCH, Secretary to the London Charity Organisation Society, and Member of the Royal Commission on Aged Poor, called in and examined by the Chairman.

Mr. C. S.
Loch.

14,900. You are Secretary to the London Charity Organisation Society and Member of the Royal Commission on Aged Poor, I believe?—Yes.

14,900A. You have been for a long time connected with the Charity Organisation Society?—Yes, I have.

14,900B. In connection with that society you have come across a large amount of vagrancy?—Yes; vagrancy connected more particularly with what I may call the homeless poor of London. But, also, I have had continually to study the question of vagrancy in the country, since the two are connected.

14,901. And, I suppose, in connection with vagrancy, you have come in contact with a good number of the poor who are not altogether homeless, but make a living, possibly a good living, by begging?—Yes, we have a good deal to do with the casual mendicant class too.

14,902. A good number of cases are referred to you by your subscribers, I suppose?—Quite so. We deal with a large number of cases every year.

14,903. I understand you have a chart showing the rise and fall of vagrancy?—Yes, this is for England and Wales. This particular chart is taken from the Local Government Board report so far as the statement of vagrants is concerned, and it gives the mean number of vagrants relieved in England and Wales each year since 1858 by the poor law authorities. The blue line represents the rise and fall. It rises in 1869 to 7400, and falls again to 2800 in 1872; rises again in 1881 to 7000, falls again to 4283, and then goes up again in 1888 and 1893. The interesting point in the chart is, that while general pauperism has, on the whole, decreased since 1870 or thereabouts, vagrancy apparently has kept up to its old level. Then, this red line is added simply to show the total number of persons proceeded against for begging. That is taken out of the judicial statistics.

14,904. I observe that, when vagrancy is not at its highest, in 1888, the prosecutions for begging reach a point far above that which they do even in 1869, when vagrancy was much higher?—That is so.

14,905. Is there any explanation of that?—I think it quite likely that at that time there was more stringency.

14,906. Do you think the Charity Organisation Society would have anything to do with it?—No.

14,907. Well, from the rise and fall shown in the chart, are we afforded any clue to the causes of vagrancy, or could you give any explanation of the different times about which the increase has been most manifest?—I should say, generally it had to do with industrial depression, up to 1873 at anyrate, but latterly it seems to me that, possibly owing to the low prices, it is more easy to turn vagrant than it used to be, and vagrancy may be due less directly to more industrial depression and more dissociated from pauperism than it used to be.

14,908. Of course, you are cognisant of the different organisations that obtain in different English counties for the assistance of vagrants, such as the Gloucester system, and different systems of that kind?—Yes, quite.

14,909. Could you give me any information regarding them and their success?—There are two systems more particularly noted—one called the Gloucester system, and the other the Dorset. The Dorset system is a system by which the county, as far as possible, is associated together in order to give to the vagrants only bread. Tickets are provided which are always interchangeable for bread, and for a certain quantity, no matter how many the tickets be. The Gloucestershire system tries to draw a distinction between the wayfarer and the vagrant or tramp. The words are a little difficult to define, but the better class are sometimes called tramps. These men are, as far as possible, passed on by a way ticket through the county, the idea being to keep them as far as possible on certain routes. The Gloucestershire people are very much in favour of their system, and it is a little difficult to say which of the two is the better, particularly because it is so difficult to get a comparison of the two counties which is absolute. What we lack in England is uniformity of system; and hence comparisons are often misleading.

Mr. O'S.
Loch.

30 Jan. 1898

We want more uniformity in the casual ward system. It ought to be uniform, in my opinion, throughout England. What happens now is that in many places there are sometimes very small and insufficient casual wards, sometimes what we call an open ward instead of a separate ward; and consequently, when the people apply for relief at the workhouse, there is not sufficient accommodation in the workhouse casual ward, and so people have to be put up in some other way. The consequence is, that the system only acts very unequally.

14,910. Before we leave these two particular systems, the Dorset and the Gloucester, I saw in the last few weeks an article in a paper that circulates in connection with the police, in which each was stigmatised as an absolute failure, and in which it was stated that the statistics of vagrancy in the adjoining county of Somerset, I think, where there is no form of relief, were quite as hopeful and encouraging as in either of the other two. Is that your experience?—I can only speak at the moment from my impression of a paper read by Colonel Curtis Hayward, who is an advocate of the Gloucester system; and I came to the conclusion, that, until, as I say, one casual ward system was adopted throughout, one could not really judge what the relative effect of the ticket systems upon the different counties might be.

14,911. Of course, you are aware we have no provision for the able-bodied poor in Scotland. There are no casual wards, and the able-bodied tramp or vagrant has no claim upon the parish; therefore, we are more interested in voluntary systems than in the prerequisite of the casual ward. I was anxious about this, because we hear that in Ayrshire they have adopted the Gloucester or the Dorset system, but without any very great success?—The Dorset, I think.

14,912. In the article I referred to, it was suggested that Gloucester complained of the vagrants being driven into them by other counties. That, I suppose, is a complaint?—Yes, it is a complaint. I think it is extremely hard to judge of its value in the different conditions of the counties. For instance, Gloucester is no doubt a county through which there is, and must be, a great track of vagrants, towards Cardiff and Wales; so to compare it with Somerset is difficult.

14,913. You have a list in your notes here on regulations?—Yes. I had in my mind, in that word regulations, our Poor Law Regulations, which you no doubt know. I said what I had to say about that in saying there ought to be more uniformity.

14,914. Your next note is number?—Yes. The question, I think, is rather exaggerated as to the number of these vagrants. Colonel Curtis Hayward would say there were about 10,000 or 11,000 in the country.*

14,915. You have no official statistics on the point?—Apparently, your Scottish night census is the best thing there is for a large area, so far as I know. In Wiltshire, they made a census twice on the 31st December, and they found the number varied from 79 in 1892 to 101 in 1893, showing the number is not very large, if you take the county. In Gloucestershire, the number varied between 1897 and 1893 from 74 to 103 in a single night.

14,916. But there must be something very defective according to that, because, according to our census, there are something like 10,000 in Scotland?—But I am speaking here solely of the county area.

14,917. That is true, but you embrace the towns in the county, do you not?—Yes; these are returns got up by the chief constable in Gloucester, and, I think, in Wiltshire. Your number in Scotland is 8000 odd.

14,918. And those include all the people in the casual wards?—Yes, and in the common lodging-houses.

14,919. Well, the number of people in the casual wards throughout the country would be known, I suppose?—Our maximum in a year on a day count is 7000. That is not very far out with your Scottish.

14,920. It is very far out, because Scotland has a sixth of the population of England, do you see?—True;

Mr. O'S.
Loch.
30 Jan. 1898.

but you must make some allowance for the fact that you take your night census in common lodging-houses and other places. This night census is only for the poor law.

14,921. Oh! only for the poor law? Then the deduction from that is that by far the larger number of tramps are not put up by the poor law authorities, but find shelter elsewhere?—The deduction which I understand Colonel Curtis Hayward to draw is this—that some 20 years ago there were about 8000 vagrants in the country; and that now, notwithstanding all the increase of tramps, there were not 10,000 in the whole of England. But that is nearly double your total in Scotland.

14,922. But it ought to be seven times our Scottish total?—What is 79 to 103?

14,923. Well, we have in Lanark, for instance, 315—(Mr. Loch, a very different county)—Dumbarton 204, and Fife 479. There are two classes of vagrants, as you have properly pointed out, and you have called honest working men in search of work tramps, as distinguished from vagrants. We have also our tramps and we have our vagrants, and they must be dealt with in different ways. You embrace both tramps and vagrants in this return, do you not?—The Gloucestershire people do the same.

14,924. Have you the population of Gloucestershire?—548,000.

14,925. Say 500,000. Well, the numbers I have here, from 1887 to 1893, are 74 to 103 on an April day count; but here we have Perth, with a population of 96,000, less than a fifth of Gloucestershire, showing upwards of 500. Can this be correct?—I think I have made a mistake in this way—I have not given the common lodging-houses. In 1886 the numbers in the casual wards in Gloucestershire were 111. Then, in the lodging-houses in 1886, there were 597.

14,926. Roughly, 700 tramps in a population of 300,000, at all events, excluding Bristol. That is three times the population of Perthshire, where we had 538, as against 700?—This table is all analysed into ages and classes, and I might bring it up to date. It is done by Admiral Christian, the chief constable.

14,927. I am afraid, Mr. Loch, we must be talking about different things, because this seems impossible. Is there any other county regarding which you have similar statistics?—I am afraid not. In fact, that return is rather special; it is not to be had generally.

14,928. Well, you state that you think the English system of casual wards discourages tramps, do you not?—I think it is a good system with uniformity.

14,929. Well, we have this experience in Roxburgh—the parochial authorities had instituted shelters. I think that they possibly stretched their powers, or acted illegally in doing so, but the number of vagrants who came to those shelters grew enormously; and wherever we have had shelters the complaint has been that the vagrant population has been increased. In one place, near Edinburgh, where some person left a bequest to furnish shelter and food for tramps, the trustees, I think, had to obtain an Act of Parliament to knock the bequest on the head. What do you think of shelters?—A shelter, it seems to me, is a most pernicious thing. The only possibility of managing it well is to have a separate ward or cell, and to have a labour test and uniform dietary.

14,930. It is complained, is it not, that that acts very hardly upon the working man in search of work?—I don't think it does act hardly. It is much better for them than a shelter. They are kept separate, and have not the conversation, which is one of the worst parts of shelter life. Nothing could be worse for increasing vagrancy than a shelter, in my mind.

14,931. The shelters generally consist of booths, with fires, and the inmates sleep along the floor. In some places they get some supper—porridge, probably—and the same for breakfast. Is that the same here?—That is like one of the Salvation Army shelters; for instance, in London, and nothing is more ruinous in my opinion. These places bring together people of the 14,932. dirtiest description, and they simply lie all night in an atmosphere that can hardly be called proper for human beings to breathe; and there is no cleanliness. Sometimes lavatory accommodation is very deficient. Now, all those difficulties are met with by our casual ward system; and, if I may venture to say so, if the members of this Commission would visit one or two casual wards here, they would see a very different state of things. In confirmation of that, I may say in America, where it is also voluntary—in New York and Boston particularly—they have been now planning their casual wards, if I may so call them, on the separate system, for these reasons.

14,932. Now, as to this difference between the systems in the two countries—that which renders it illegal in Scotland to give relief to an able-bodied person, and that which prevails in England, the theory of which is that no man should be allowed to starve. I think that is the statement of the principle underlying the English law, is it not?—Yes. I think the two are not so different, really.

14,933. Which, in your opinion, is the correct light to look at it in?—Do you think that the principle underlying the English law is too humanitarian, or that underlying the Scotch law is too severe?—Well, my own inclination is this: It seems to me a pity to bring in legislative action if you have trustworthy voluntary action. If, therefore, you can deal with your casuals in Scotland, say by a thoroughly good system of casual wards, with test labour, I should say, 'have that.' If that fails you, I am inclined to think that our English system is the better. If you take the whole group of the able-bodied, irrespective of these sections we have been considering, then, I think our system, on the whole, acts fairly well, if we act strictly on what is called the out-door relief test order. That is to say, no relief is available for an able-bodied man except in the workhouse, unless he does a task of work, according to which he gets relief for his family. That must be done under the immediate direction of the guardians, and treated entirely under the point of view of a test for relief. I think, myself, if that principle is adhered to, we may get over a great many of our chronic difficulties, and with very little friction.

14,934. Here is a sentence in this report—'As to the relative number of habitual vagrants among the wayfaring population, the following statements made by the late Barwick Baker, at a Poor Law Conference in 1882, are interesting. He said, the strange thing which surprised Admiral Christian, and also himself (the speaker), was that the number of statements believed to be true out of 553 was 424; and the number of men believed to belong to the tramp class was 129. This would make an important difference in their reckoning, if, instead of having to deal with 30,000, or 40,000, or 50,000 tramps and vagrants, such a proportion as in Gloucestershire was found of poor men travelling at their own cost, and with whom they had no more right or wish to interfere than with any of the members of the present meeting. They had a right to take notice of the 171 who lived on the public in workhouses, and of the 129 who lived by begging; but, judging by this county, there might be only 10,000 or 15,000 to deal with in all England.' Is that so?—Yes.

14,935. Did these numbers, 10,000 or 15,000, exclude the honest working men in search of work, and the 30,000, or 40,000, or 50,000?—Yes. I was speaking of Colonel Curtis Hayward's figures. The difficulty of the whole problem is—what is the number of the men in the common lodging-houses?

14,936. How would you classify men in the Salvation Army Shelters?—The shelter provides distinctly for the resident population in a particular district.

14,937. Yes; we were told that in shelters—notably, I think, Whitechapel—there are a number of resident men, working about the docks, who live there regularly. But, in the majority of cases, we were told it was a very fluctuating population, and, probably, people did not live there more than a week?—There is no doubt part of this population is very fluctuating, but the difficulty is to classify it quite as you would desire into tramps—using the word in its better sense—and non-tramps, vagrant.—(The Chairman.) We would call all those fluctuating people vagrants. They would come under what the police would return as vagrants.

14,938. (Mr. Loch.) That is to say, you take your common lodging-house population as a vagrant population.

14,939. (The Chairman.) The police do.—(Mr. Loch.) Then, that probably makes a difference.

14,940. At all events, it is evident that our census and your figures do not apply to the same thing, and that we can't start from the assumption that England is so much better off in the matter of tramps than we are in Scotland?—I should like to think that over a little.

14,941. I mean to say, our figures are not parallel. Are they?—No.

14,942. We now come to London statistics. Can you give us some of these?—Here is a night census on 16th January 1891, in nine refuges and in the casual wards. The total of men, women, and children was 1781, and the estimate that was made by our committee that went into the matter at that time was that the total homeless, as we say, on a single night, was amply estimated, and beyond the mark, if taken at 2500. These are homeless cases that would come to the casual ward and to the nine leading refuges.

14,943. And you make your estimate from your nine refuges and the casual wards?—It is an absolute count, not an estimate at all.

14,944. But, I thought you said, 'estimate of the total homeless'?—Yes; that is made from the count.

14,945. Here, again, you see, we have London, with a population as big as Scotland, with an estimated homeless population of 2500, against 10,000 vagrants shown in our figures?—We have simply worked out a night count from time to time. In the report of our Special Committee on the Homeless Poor of London you will find the data.

14,946. What class of people are these divided into? Have you any classification—artisans, labourers, women and children, &c.?—I am not sure it is classified like that. There is a classification according to age, to marriage, and as to being able-bodied. In the casual ward census we have only a published statement of the men, women, and children.

14,947. In the refuges, had you many men able-bodied?—The reply to the question, 'Whether able-bodied' was given in the affirmative in 649 cases.

14,948. Out of what number?—Taking them from 16 years upwards, the total is 712.

14,949. That makes no allowance for women?—No; they are separately accounted for. It is not a question of their being able-bodied.

14,950. How many women have you?—Altogether, 193.

14,951. Only 193! And the children?—Very few—33.

14,952. And a great majority of the men apparently were able-bodied?—Yes, that is the answer; a rather difficult point to answer.

14,953. What were the refuges?—Houseless Poor Asylum, Banner Street; Providence Row Night Refuge; Church Extension Association; Tenter Street Refuge; House of Shelter; Field Lane Refuge; Newport Market Refuge; Church Army Central Labour Home; Ham Yard Hospice; and House of Charity.

14,954. You have not got any Salvation Army place here, have you?—No, not included in that. We have a good deal of evidence about them in this report, but it is not in tabular form.

14,955. You have told us your opinion was that these shelters were of a very bad tendency?—Yes.

14,956. How are the shelters in London conducted? Are they some sort of thing, such as I have described to you—rooms, on the floors of which the people sleep?—Yes, certainly.

14,957. Is the shelter given for nothing, or charged for?—A small sum, 2d. or 3d., is charged. The Salvation Army people have twopenny shelters where the lodgers don't lie down, but sleep on chairs that have sort of rests in front of them. Above a penny or twopence they very often have some sort of board with a pillow provided. That is what used to be.

14,958. But are there no gratuitous shelters in London?—Oh, yes; these refuges, in a sense, are. They are all charities, pure and simple. There is generally no charge at them.

14,959. Then, are they much run after?—That depends on the management. Some of these are very carefully managed, indeed. The Newport Market Refuge, for instance; and there they, as far as possible, cross-examine and apply checks of knowledge and information. There is no question, as a rule, of getting in, unless you pass a small committee meeting that is held every evening.

14,960. And, in this refuge, they refuse any persons under the influence of drink?—Oh, yes, I think they would. Those would go to the casual ward.

14,960A. Casuals are taken in whether drunk or sober, are they?—Anyone would be admitted to the casual ward.

14,961. You have a note here about increase of shelters. What does that mean?—The increase in shelters is coincident with a decrease in common lodging-houses, proving to me that the shelter is simply a substitute for the common lodging-house.

14,962. But in the common lodging-house people have beds, do they not?—Yes; but the charge is less in a shelter. To be able to pay 2d. instead of 4d. is an enormous attraction.

14,963. Well, I think, we were informed that in some Scotch common lodging-houses, where they could get spring mattresses for an extra couple of pence, if the people had the extra couple of pence they went in for the spring mattress. That indicates rather a different feeling, does it not?—I don't know about that. You have this coincidence here of the fact that there has been this very marked decrease in the trade of the common lodging-house, while there has been an increase in the shelters.

14,964. Has not the London County Council started a model common lodging-house?—Yes, one.

14,965. On the model of those in Glasgow. Is it in operation yet?—Oh, yes, I think so.

14,966. Then, has it led to the establishment of any others?—No, I think not. You mean of the same type?

14,967. Of the same type. In Glasgow, for instance, the man who formerly managed the city model common lodging-house has started a number of model lodging-houses on the same principle throughout the town, and made a commercial work of that system of model lodging-houses of which the municipal authorities set the pattern. Has that not been noticed in London too?—No. I think it has not acted like that in London. The Guinness Trust have another lodging-house, I think, and that is all. Shelters of one sort or another occupy the ground.

14,968. Now, the society in common lodging-houses is not generally very refined, I suppose, and possibly the characters of a number of the men in them would not bear inspection? In fact, we have been again and again told by prison aid people that they send men on release from convict prison to common lodging-houses. You have nothing to say as to the demoralising effect of that?—No, I have not. It seems to me that men who are discharged would very naturally go to common lodging-houses. I think a great number of persons apply for poor law relief from the common lodging-houses, showing that the people there are on a very low grade in every way. I gave particulars about this before the Labour Commission—about the number of applications that came from common lodging-houses in certain unions to the guardians.

14,969. You have a note here as to these refuges or shelters being centres of infection. What have you to say on that point?—They are centres of infection. That is proved by the last report of the Metropolitan Asylums' Board. They made an elaborate inquiry into the question in its connection with small-pox in London, and they traced a considerable amount of that disease, as the figures here show, to the shelters.

14,970. Would you give us them?—Here is a table. Out of 325 cases, 31 come from Blackfriars; 32 from Lisson Street; 14 from Horesferry Road, Westminster; and 23 from other shelters of the Salvation Army; 16 from Medland Hall, Ratcliff; 179 from common lodging-houses generally; 20 from casual wards; and 10 from free shelters generally. In common lodging-houses they immediately report infectious cases, and that answers very well; in the shelters there is no such practice. I think it is a great blot. On reference to the chart, it will be seen that the curve of the attacks among the whole population follows the curve among the vagrants, and that, ever since the disease was stamped out amongst the latter, it has only smouldered amongst the community, and, even if it has got a start, as in the Portobello Road outbreak, it has been promptly stamped out. If it is true, then, we can't control the disease among the community generally, until we have controlled it amongst the vagrants. Our first efforts should be directed to preventing the spread of the disease amongst them. We can control some of these centres of vagrancy, but not others, as we stand.

14,971. Yes; but take the case of incipient small-pox, or mild small-pox when it has been nearly cured and is still infectious. The people in the common lodging-house would not know anything about it any more than they would in the shelter. And in the case of well-marked small-pox, the inmates of the common lodging-house would not have a small-pox patient among them, would they?—Yes; but, in the case of the common lodging-house, the master is under obligation to report at once.

14,972. And when he does report?—The case is immediately taken off to one of the infectious diseases hospitals.

14,973. You think these shelters do not reduce vagrancy?—No, I don't think they do. So far as one can judge from the figures, they have in no way reduced vagrancy. It was supposed, when they were started, we were to have some great change in these matters. I think, on the other hand, vagrants simply use them.

14,974. Now, what is the law in London as to vagrancy—as to the suppression of vagrancy? What are the crimes of vagrancy?—There is what we call the Vagrant Act. The chief clause of this Act (5 Geo. IV. chap. 83) is section 3, where vagrants are divided into three categories—'(1) Idle and disorderly persons; (2) rogues and vagabonds; (3) incorrigible rogues and 'vagabonds.' In the first category comes 'every person wandering abroad, or placing himself or herself in any public place, street, highway, court, or passage to beg or gather alms, or causing, or procuring, or encouraging any child or children (under 16) to do so.' The punishment for this is hard labour for any time not exceeding one calendar month. In the second category comes 'every person committing any of the offences hereinbefore mentioned, after having been convicted as an idle and disorderly person, or every person wandering abroad and endeavouring, by the exposure of wounds or deformities, to obtain or gather alms, or endeavouring to procure charitable contributions of any nature or kind under any false or fraudulent pretence.' The punishment in this case is hard labour for not more than three months. In the third category is placed 'every person committing an offence against this Act, which shall subject him or her to be dealt with as a rogue and vagabond, such person having been at some former time adjudged so to be, and duly convicted thereof.' The punishment is, in this case, committal to the House of Correction, with hard labour, till the next general or quarter sessions; and at quarter sessions he may be further imprisoned, with hard labour, for one year, and (if not a female) punished by whipping.

14,975. Does it hold good in London?—Yes.

14,976. So, practically, the only vagrancy crime here would be begging?—There's another clause which includes lying about in unsuitable places and so on.

Lock.

14,977. Here is a passage in your pamphlet on 'The Necessity for Repressing Vagrancy and Mendicancy,' page 10, which appears to be inconsistent with the statistics you have given us:—'The following statistics with regard to tramp, vagrants, and others, without visible means of subsistence, proceeded against summarily, or for indictable offences, are taken from the Judicial Statistics for England and Wales, published in 1889. Proceeded against summarily, 26,609 males and 4,323 females; apprehended for indictable offences, 5,216 males and 32 females, showing a total of 31,380 criminal vagrants wandering about the country.' What would you say to that?—But you don't know what the amount of overlapping there is between case and case.

14,978. The report goes on:—'In the same year there were no less than 30,368 persons charged with begging, or having no visible means of subsistence, resulting in 19,950 convictions for their offences.'—I have rather trusted myself to actual night counts.

14,979. The law as to vagrancy in England has not been altered for very many years?—No.

14,980. Your society has a great deal to do with investigating cases of begging-letter writers and beggars who go about from house to house with false stories and so forth, has it not?—Yes.

14,981. In your investigations do you find many genuine cases among the multitudes who must be referred to you?—You were speaking now of the begging-letter-writer class?

14,982. Yes; and of the begging-writer class—the man who comes and tells you he is a workman out of employment?—Of course, I think you may say the large proportion of those are unsatisfactory; but, at the same time, if you take the whole number that comes to us in the course of the year, say 20,000, the proportion that you can't help, purely on account of their fraud, is not very large.

14,983. I presume, in cases that are vitiated by fraud, the people think twice before coming to the Charity Organisation Society?—Those cases would be referred to as very largely by persons to whom they applied.

14,984. Do you think that among the houseless poor the honest workman in search of work constitutes a large proportion?—I am inclined to think that it constitutes a larger proportion just now than it has at certain periods in the past.

14,985. And, I suppose, it is very difficult to believe stories told by tramps?—Oh, entirely; absolutely impossible. I think that is proven. Quite recently, this last year, a Mr. Paul, a workhouse master, has made an elaborate investigation on that point, and it is absolutely proven. His statement was published at a Poor Law Conference.

14,986. Now we come to the question of relief schemes. You mention here 'limitations in England as to poor law'?—I have already mentioned that incidentally in regard to the other matter.

14,987. Do you mean that a person must perform work?—The outdoor relief test for the able-bodied.

14,988. You mention here the German system?—I simply put down that at hazard. I don't know whether you wish me to go into that.

14,989. Well, we have heard a good deal about it, but I must say in a very vague fashion. We have heard about labour colonies, but chiefly about those into which the men enter compulsorily. But we have been told that there are other labour colonies to which men have been committed. Is that so?—That is in Holland.

14,990. We know about the beggar places in Holland and Belgium; but we are told that in Germany, as supplementary to the labour colonies, there are colonies to which admission is made compulsory. Is that the case?—The Arbeiter Colonien system is a purely voluntary system; and, if they are committed in the way you have described, they are committed to what is called the Arbeitshaus, and they might possibly have attached to them land where the men are put to work. But that that is in any way comparable to the well-known German system is, I think, unlikely.

14,991. You have spoken of the Arbeitshaus. As men have is what they generally term it, is it not?—House of Correction, I think, is the way we should interpret it.

14,992. But they might be sent to the Arbeitshaus for offences in the colonies, might they not?—For offences under the General Vagrancy Act, but that is a police affair, purely.

14,993. Your next note is, 'in and out, summer and winter.' What has that reference to?—It is really from Mr. Mayor's article, published in the report of the Labour Department of the Board of Trade on the unemployed.

14,994. But, unfortunately, Mr. Mayor was one of a deputation who went over to Germany to report on the system, and there were three members of his commission before us; but we found, after reading their report, that we knew more about the affair than themselves. Mr. Mayor was abroad at the time, unfortunately. In these German colonies they have some legal powers of detention to make the men work, have they not?—Not in the colonies. They are purely voluntary.

14,995. Well, it did not state so in the report. It gave some peculiarities of the German law applicable to those cases which, they said, enabled labour to be extracted out of the inhabitants of the colonies, which are not possible here. Have you been at the Dutch and Belgian labour colonies?—I have not visited them.

14,996. Do you know anything of the financial results?—No. I have only second-hand information, which you could easily get in books.

14,997. What is this note of yours—'summer and winter'?—The three points which struck me off-hand about the German system is that the vagrants use it in the winter and go out in the summer; and I thought it was no check on vagrancy from that point of view. Next, the large number of persons who have been in some way convicted is remarkable in the German labour colonies. Thirdly, the growing difficulty of getting work for men who have been in the colonies; and, also, there is a great desire on the part of several to be very much more stringent. Of course, if they were to stop the system of free admissions, they would altogether upset the system itself.

14,998. In connection with the Dutch colonies, I think it was Sir John McKinnell, formerly connected with the Board of Supervision, who sent in an official report, which has been published, and in which he said, I think, that it took sixteen of the colonists to do the labour of one man. From what you saw in Germany, did it appear to be equally successful in shirking work?—I could not bring it down to that point of precision. In Berlin, where I saw them in a kind of colony-house that they work in, it seemed to me quite possible the work would be very lightly done; but, I could not bring it down to that precision.

14,999. There have been some very interesting experiments recently in London on the subject of relief works, have there not?—Yes. There is an analysis at the end of this paper of all that was done in the winter of 1893.

15,000. Yes; but, since then, has there not been a society, a report of whose labours was published in the Times about Christmas time?—That was the Mansion House Relief Conference. Well, this paper refers to the first year of the same work.

15,001. Would you give us the figures of that?—This refers to 1892-93:—'The Mansion House Conference commenced work about the middle of January. Its special object was to assist the casual dock labourers, who were excluded from the docks, owing to the classification of the labour. The area covered by the Conference included Stepney Poor Law Union, Poplar, St George's in the East, and a portion of Mile End. The work was, in the main, confined to married casual dock labourers under 55 years of age. A piece of land was secured at Stamford for the purpose of setting men and the men whose characters proved satisfactory, after investigation, were sent there to work under strict supervision. After about ten days' work (eight hours a day, at 6d. an hour—five hours on Saturdays), the men came before the Committee, with a view to permanent help. Some 200 men have been thus seen. It is not likely that a large proportion of them will prove capable of being raised permanently above the ranks of the unemployed. 716 applications have been received, and of these 365 were inquired into. The rest were rejected at once, for various reasons, e.g., that they were not dock labourers, or were single men, or were too old, or did not live in the parish, or were living in common lodging-houses, &c.

15,002. Or were living in common lodging-houses?—Yes. That we should consider a very fair rule, in this part of London certainly. Then, there was a further inquiry made into this on behalf of the Board of Trade. The cases were selected by Mr. Llewellyn-Smith on behalf of the Labour Department of the Board of Trade. The total number of applications was 716; of cases investigated, 365; set to work at Abbey Mills, 253.

Of these, says the report, 29 were dismissed for misconduct or incompetence, and 16 failed to attend before the Committee after the conclusion of their work. The total number seen by the Committee was 208. The number of cases selected for special inquiry was 92. Of these, 13 were emigrated, and a separate report upon them will be furnished by Captain Geston, who is at present visiting Canada; and 3 were sent to other parts of England, where there was a seeming prospect of work. This reduces the number to 76. The inquiry officer's report has been in each instance attached to the case papers, which have been returned to the Labour Department of the Board of Trade. It will be seen that 12 of the men have disappeared; 1 died insane in the workhouse infirmary; 1 was an inmate of the workhouse; 40 appeared to be in no better position than in the winter, having had only the most casual and broken employment since their discharge from Abbey Mills; the remaining 22 were fairly regular work, and seemed to be better off. To determine to what extent the improvement in these cases can be connected, directly or indirectly, with the assistance afforded to them by the Mansion House Conference on the Unemployed, a closer examination is required. It takes first, the cases in which some material assistance was given over and above the spell of work at Abbey Mills. In 20 instances men were placed upon the books of a trade society by the payment of the necessary fees. 12 appear still to remain on the societies, though some are certainly in arrears, while 8 seem to have lapsed. 3 out of the 20 have not been traced; 10 are as badly off as ever; the remaining 7 are in a better position. Of these, 1 has gone to America at the expense of his own relatives out there, and 2 have gone to sea. The restoration to the trade society was of no advantage to these 3, and it is doubtful whether it made any difference in 2 of the remaining 4 cases. 3 men misapplied money given them to pay their trades union fees. 7 men were given B tickets, on the recommendation of the Committee; 1 has disappeared; the other 6 have had only the most casual employment. At present the depression of trade has prevented these men getting any advantage from their technical promotion to the B class. Even had it been otherwise, it is obvious that the net result of the intervention of the Committee would have been to transfer work from one set of individuals to another set. 5 men were set up as hawkers or dealers. 4 have failed, and returned to casual labour. The fifth is reported to be making a very poor living. 15 were furnished with clothes, tools, or equipment, to enable them to start work of one kind or another; 3 have not been traced; 1 is in the workhouse; 6 are no better off; 5 are in regular work, and appear to be fairly well. 1 of the 5 was provided with clothes to take up canvassing for a life assurance society. It did not answer, and he subsequently went to sea as a coal trimmer. 2 men were set up in partnership with a boat, at a cost of £5. It produced about 20s a week. One of them, fortunately, got regular work as a lighter-man, and is doing fairly well. Consequently, he has temporarily, he says, abandoned his share in the boat. The other has changed his address frequently, leaving debts behind. He could not be found, but his partner assured us that he was still plying the boat, and that he himself reckoned to fall back upon his share of it, if he were out of work. In 6 other cases some temporary relief was given. 1 has not been traced; 1 has gone to sea as a coal trimmer; 4 have had very casual employment during the summer; but 2 of these, at the date of the inquiry, had obtained more regular work. 2 men obtained direct employment—1 under the vestry, and the other under the London County Council, through the personal influence of members of the Committee. 1 of these has been already counted on the list of those who were supplied with tools. The remaining 19 received no direct assistance from the Committee, beyond the temporary employment at Abbey Mills. Of these, 4 have not been traced; 7 have died; 5, including one man selected as ganger, or foreman, at Abbey Mills, are in regular work. The rest are apparently no better off. The total number who have had poor law relief since their discharge from Abbey Mills is 7. The number is made up as follows:—relieving officer's order, for wife's confinement, 3; medical order, 1; in workhouse or infirmary, 3. Only 4 have applied for relief to the Charity Organisation Society.

That gives an analysis that, so far as I know, has never been made in any other instance.

15,003. But you have an analysis of another year's work in the Times, I understand?—An analysis of another year's work has not been made in this form; but, so far as the results of the second year's work are concerned, they are very similar.

15,004. But I think they claim, do they not, to have effected a permanent improvement in the case of some 30 per. cent.?—I think that the figures are worse than for the year I have given.

15,005. Well, that does not seem a very encouraging result, does it?—I'm afraid not.

15,006. You have got another labour colony established here—that of the Salvation Army, in Essex. Do you know anything about it?—I think I could hardly speak about it. My information is only second-hand.

15,007. Is it the impression of your society that it is likely to be successful?—Our society is certainly not of opinion that these are good methods.

15,008. Could you inform us what you would think the most hopeful method of dealing with vagrants, taking first the irreclaimable, ordinary vagrant; and, secondly, the genuine working-man, on the tramp, whom, I suppose, we all of us wish to deal with differently from the professional vagrant? We will take the professional vagrant first. What of him?—Our poor law system—and, of course, to some extent we must fall back on that—is certainly on the line of what you might call restrictive toleration. It makes it comparatively easy for a man to move on certain not very pleasant conditions. I think, myself, that is the result of a great deal of experience, and is, on the whole, a good system. If, then, you come to the better class, it might be dealt with in some—

15,009. But before leaving that, have you, in the English law, the right to confine the professional tramp longer than is necessary for him to perform his spell of work? You can't say, can you? If you come in here, and get a night's shelter, you must stay two or three nights?—He is detained, if he turns up in the same union—and London is taken as one place for this purpose—a longer period than on the first occasion. The rule is this—subject to discretionary power in the hands of the guardians—a casual pauper cannot discharge himself before nine o'clock on the morning following his admission, nor before he has performed the work prescribed for him. If he has been admitted before to any workhouse in the same union, he is not entitled to discharge himself before the fourth day from the date of admission. Then there is a further order, guiding the discretion of the guardians somewhat in the matter.

15,010. Well, but London is a very big place, and any professional tramp who comes here, and relies on the accommodation in the ward of one of the work-houses, must almost, in crossing London, be compelled to put up a second night in the same union. Is that not so?—I don't think so. I think these people who apply go to a casual ward, or a shelter, or a common lodging-house, as they arrange. They know the ropes.

15,011. That is quite true, but that does away with the advantage of the casual ward. London is a very big place, and extends over many miles; and a tramp going, say, north or south, through London, would almost require, if he did not get out till perhaps 10 or 11 o'clock, after he had picked his oakum or broken his stones, he would almost require to put up again in London, would he not?—I think your hours are too late. A man who has got his task done can start earlier, and can easily get through London on the same day. I am speaking of the metropolitan area. If he's at Woolwich one day, and wishes to get to Chiswick, he can very well walk across.

15,012. If he knows the roads he could do that?—Oh, I think you may take it they know that. I think the working man is better treated in a casual ward on these conditions than he is in any other way, provided he can't pay anything.

15,013. What does the labour test consist in?—Generally, breaking stone.

15,014. And for women?—Generally, I think, in picking oakum.

15,015. Now, we will come to the working men—the better class of vagrants. What of them?—With regard to them, the difficulty, of course is, that they are on the look out for work. Our system, I think, facilitates their seeking it, if they desire to do so; but I don't think any system of employment will do aught but mischief to them. It will keep them in a particular place. I am speaking, of course, of artificial employment, and it is better that they should be left to their own resources. What I think is best, speaking generally of those who come to casual wards or refuges, is that volunteers should try to deal with particular cases. I know, in the case of young people, that is something very effective. The Church Army have, in certain unions, the permission of the guardians to visit casual wards for these cases. In that way you can pick out particular cases. I think the problem resolves itself to that.

15,016. Does the Church Army visit the London casual wards?—I don't think it visits all; it visits some.

15,017. Are there any other volunteer agencies working in connection with vagrancy in the way you have described?—Well, several refuges—Newport Market Refuge. It deals very well with the cases that come before it.

15,018. But that is outside the poor law?—Yes.

15,019. Would you explain that Newport Market Refuge?—The committee are very careful in discriminating between those who come to them. They choose the better class cases.

15,020. Is it supported by subscribers?—By subscribers almost entirely. I think it owns the Refuge premises.

15,021. Does it deal with a large number of cases?—Yes; a good many in the year. They have accommodation for 30 on a single night.

15,022. Have you had any other experience of relief works?—Yes. I think I have been engaged in almost every large experiment of relief works in London in the last 12 or 15 years.

15,023. Then, has the result in other cases been more hopeful?—I am convinced the other way myself. I don't think it is a good system at all. It is purely a matter of experience, so far as I am concerned.

15,024. Have you any substitute for it in your own mind?—I don't think it is wanted. I would rather charity, co-operated with the poor law, in different cases.

15,025. But if a large number of people are out of work?—The very exceptional instances where there is something quite unusual may, I think, be provided for by exceptional arrangements, but the poor law, I think, as it stands, is quite able to bear the pressure of ordinary winters.

15,026. And you think that the English poor law system works well; that it is sufficiently humanitarian; and, in respect of its power of relief to the able-bodied, it is superior and more in accordance with the spirit of the age than the Scotch, which does not afford that right?—As to the first part of the question, I should say simply yes. In regard to the second, I should say it is a very serious thing to introduce a system of poor relief for the able-bodied. But, on the other hand, I should say our system, where thoroughly well administered, works well.

15,027. And you think it is thoroughly well administered?—Well: I think the standard of administration has certainly improved very greatly in the last 10 or 15 years.

15,028. (By Col. McHardy.)—Mr. Loch, you, as I understand, call vagrants professional vagrants, as we would understand it in Scotland, distinct from the working men?—One is in this difficulty. The word vagrant is the ordinary poor law term, and may include or not the working man.

15,029. I suppose it is a fact that a large number of men in search of work do march about independently altogether of the professional vagrant class?—Entirely.

15,030. From this report it seems that in Gloucester alone 50,000 men, or something like that, cross the county in the year?—It is quite possible.

15,031. So the numbers are very large. The man in search of work would not be a tramp if he could afford to pay his railway fare, so he's therefore a poor man?—I look upon him as a man who is often trying to get a higher wage by going elsewhere, and sometimes also in difficulty and want of work.

15,032. But, if he were searching for a higher wage, he would not be marching across country, would he?—I think the counties of England are very closely connected in this way in the matter of demand and supply. For instance, Cardiff and Yorkshire would play into one another's hands in this matter. But these large numbers seem hardly to get their night shelter in the casual ward. So far as one can make out from the numbers, they are able to pay their way, and there is no necessity for it.

15,033. You think they have all got sufficient funds to take them from where they start to the place they go to?—I can't say all; but, I think, the majority.

15,034. But it is that particular class we have here in Scotland, and they are possibly in greater numbers; certainly so at certain times. Do you think it would be right to help those men in giving them food, if they were needy, and shelter?—I should certainly not. I should let them go about the country from common lodging-house to common lodging-house.

15,035. But if you had a man who was not a professional vagrant—a workman who wanted to get somewhere—would you be prepared to help him along? Would that be a right thing to do?—I think he ought to go to the casual ward.

15,036. And that there is ample accommodation for him?—I think, in London, it is so in the main; and, if it is not, I think it ought to be provided.

15,037. You say there is a test. Would you apply the test in every case?—If this man—I am simply holding on to this honest working-man—is in search of work, is not it desirable that he should get work as soon as he can, rather than be detained breaking stones for the night's shelter, if the police or the parochial authorities were satisfied of the honesty of the case?—The discretion allowed to the guardians is very large, and I don't think that the test of work, such as it is, is really a great hindrance to a good man.

15,038. And it might be omitted by a master of a workhouse, if he thought it right. Is that so?—This is the rule about it:—

'(1) The guardians may give any directions to the Loch.

'master of the workhouse, or to the superintendent of the casual ward, with respect to the discharge of any class, or classes, of casual paupers before the expiration of the respective periods specified in the section above cited, and such directions shall be followed by the master or superintendent.'

'(2) If, in the opinion of the master of the workhouse, or the superintendent of the casual ward, any special circumstances shall require that a casual pauper shall be discharged before the expiration of the periods mentioned, . . . he may discharge such pauper accordingly, and report the facts of the case to the guardians at their next meeting.'

'(3) A casual pauper, who has been detained for more than one night, and who represents to the master of the workhouse, or the superintendent of the casual ward, that he is desirous of seeking work, shall, if he has, to the best of his ability, performed the prescribed task of work, be allowed to discharge himself at 5 o'clock a.m. in summer, and 6.30 a.m. in winter.'

15,039. So, as a rule, the test would be asked for?—I think the test is, in many places, a very light one, and the man's being a good man is distinctly considered.

15,040. I rather think I understand Admiral Christian to say that, in a case where they were satisfied a man was an honest man, they would not detain him. Is that so?—Yes.

15,041. (By Dr. Farquharson.) Do you think there are really a very large number of workmen in the country who want work and can't get it. We have been told there are a million?—Oh, no; I don't think so. I don't think it is possible to put the matter statistically. Of course, the increase of vagrancy makes one think there is an increase in the number, but what increase we do not know.

15,042. Of course, there are a certain number of honest, able-bodied workmen for whom there is no work. What are we to do with them? Is the State to provide occupation for them?—On no account, I think.

15,043. What is to happen to them?—I think they should apply to the poor law in the ordinary way.

15,044. Then, these respectable men must drift into pauperism from circumstances over which they had no control?—So far, that may be true; but I don't think, myself, that a very large number do so drift. I think, taking an ordinary winter, the poor law guardians would open their stone-yard, or something of that sort; for these men would push through that winter, and would not return.

14,045. Do you say a considerable number of so-called unemployed are brought into that condition through drink?—I think the causes of what is called want of employment are infinite; and a great deal of what is called want of employment is not due to drink, but to physical weakness and physical infirmities. There is much want that is alleged to be due to want of employment, which, when you examine the cause, does not turn out to be so.

15,046. But what would you do to check the present condition of vagrancy, so long as the agricultural classes and other people give relief to those people freely, and apparently gladly?—I am afraid you can't. You can't check the voluntary giver. The idea of the Dorset and the Gloucester system both is that you should be able to check them in some way, and, as you have seen, the result is not conspicuous.

15,047. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Do you think that the alleged increase of vagrancy is proved?—Well, I personally would take, as a very fair test, the poor law figures. In that case, the alleged increase of vagrancy is only proved so far, that it is equal to what it was in bad years, about 1869 or 1870.

15,048. (By Miss Stevenson.) In reference to the Salvation Army Shelters, you said they really were common lodging-houses?—I think that is what they come to be.

15,049. Then, have you found, since these shelters have been opened, that they have interfered with the existing common lodging-houses?—The common lodging-houses have decreased in number.

15,050. In speaking of the relief works, you said that, in selecting the men who were to receive this employment, you excluded those who were living in common lodging-houses?—Yes.

15,051. Why did you do that?—Because the common lodging-house men in that district, as a class, are distinctly not the men to be put on relief works.

15,052. Then you made an exception because of the locality where this work is being given?—Well, there are common lodging-houses and common lodging-houses. Some are quite different in type. Common lodging-house men in that district would not be men from whom you would expect a fair day's work.

15,053. In reply to Colonel M'Hardy, you said you would leave the honest working man, who was out of work, to go on from one common lodging-house to another, did you not?—That is not inconsistent; because, as I say, common lodging-houses vary very much, and there are many decent places.

15,054. You spoke of the assistance given by the Church Army in many cases. Does your association consider that their work is on better economical lines than that of the Salvation Army?—We think they try to deal well with a few cases, and to select them well; and to us it seems that the whole problem, from the charity side, is to do that.

15,055. And let the others slide?—It is not quite a case of letting the others slide. The difficulty is this, that you may let the whole slide, if you do not take care; and that is what has happened. If you don't concentrate where you can help, you probably would not concentrate at all.

15,056. In the case of a man who gets casual relief—the case of a man in search of work—does he, by receiving that relief, become a pauper, with a pauper's disabilities?—Certainly.

15,057. In reference to the numbers of homeless people found in London, I see there were only 33 children. That seems to be an entire contradiction of the statements one sees in the applications one gets from Dr. Barnardo, and others who look after children, as to the number of children who go without proper refuge in London. Do you believe there are children sleeping out under railway arches, and in barrels, and that sort of thing?—One can only speak from casual experience. I don't think that the evil prevails to the extent represented. I think that the number may be larger in summer, when it is not so disagreeable; but I think these figures are a good test, because it is generally known that people can go to the refuge, and there they are received with open arms. There is nothing to keep them away.

15,058. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncreiff.) I understood you to say you thought the refuge system of the Salvation Army wrong in principle. That is, I presume, from not requiring a test?—Well, it seems to me what happens is this: A large crowd of casual people are accumulated. They simply come and go. I don't see how it differs from a common lodging-house. By crowding a large number together, you interfere with the chances of a permanent result; for permanent results always follow from individual treatment.

15,059. But, then, would it be better to have no such places at all?—Certainly.

15,060. (By Dr. Sutherland.) I thought these shelters belonging to the Salvation Army were the filters through which the hopefuls are passed on to the factories, and the labour colony?—I don't think that holds.

15,061. Is not that what the army claims?—Yes; but, then, the large number that is collected is altogether too large for the purpose of any reasonable filter; and, as a matter of fact, very few who enter these common lodging-houses do pass through.

15,062. Is the feeling in England, at the present moment, in favour of the poor law system, which enacts that an able-bodied man, who, up to the moment he gets out of work, has been a sober and industrious citizen, shall register as a pauper before he can obtain relief? Is that feeling gaining ground?—Of course, when addressing oneself to a matter of feeling, one can only generalise. If you polled the reasonable guardians who had had experience; or if you waited a year or two and then polled the men who now have been elected, and will then have experience—I don't think their feeling will be in favour of a radical alteration in our law by which able-bodied men should be able to get out-door relief allowances, irrespective of a work test.

15,066. You are speaking now of the feelings of guardians?—I am speaking of the feeling of those who have served in office.

15,064. Of course, you are not in any way representing the feeling of those who receive relief?—I don't know that anything represents their feeling, very definitely.

15,065. Oh; yes; I think public opinion and parliament represent their feelings very fairly. There is a growing public opinion that an honest man out of work should not, in order to obtain relief, be registered as a pauper, or compelled to enter the casual ward?—The able-bodied paupers in England are a very small number, and can hardly, therefore, be said to be represented in parliament. There is no doubt a certain weakening of feeling, in the matter of independence that has prevailed in the last ten or fifteen years. England has, at different periods, had these gusts of sentiment, but these have passed over. I look upon this as one that is passing over. The leading politicians of the last ten or fifteen years have been in favour of our adherence to the poor law system.

15,066. But with the view of removing the pauper stigma, isn't the feeling in England, at the present time, in favour of something, in the nature of an old age pension, such as has been sketched by Mr. Chamberlain, which implies the maintenance of the honest poor out with the workhouse?—I refer to those who are definitely able-bodied, and are so returned in poor law returns.

15,067. Well, among the tramps who go through the country, there's the honest tramp, I suppose, and the dishonest one, and both need relief, don't they?—Presumably.

15,068. Then, your opinion is that the poor law is the proper source of relief, and not private or mendicity societies?—I think that the poor law is the main source of relief. For the exceptional cases, you should have voluntary intervention, and, if you will, refuges.

15,069. Then, do you find now in England that the poor houses are sufficiently numerous and near each other to accommodate and shelter these men for the night or two?—I think, in the main, it is so.

15,070. And that the relieving officers, who correspond to our inspectors of poor, are numerous enough all over England to deal with the cases of vagrancy which march through the country?—I should have said for cases of vagrancy, yes. The question is, whether they are numerous enough for the residents. That is the greater difficulty.

15,071. Supposing you had in England two workhouses within thirty miles of each other, and half a dozen people get stranded at night midway between—able-bodied men in search of work—where do you propose to shelter them?—Well, of course, if you are to become the travelling father of a travelling population, you will want some sort of shelter at every interval. If, on the other hand, you believe, as I do, that these people have a certain amount of knowledge of the road, they will accommodate themselves to the conditions they find. If those conditions are reasonable, if the accommodation is within a fair day's march, that is all you need think about. If the accommodation is beyond a fair day's march, then the matter may be serious. I think it is not possible to meet every eventuality; and the only way is, as we have done in London, to have the stations on the main routes.

15,072. We may take it, may we not, that if the poor law does not provide relief for such people, they will provide it for themselves by masterful begging, or theft?—I don't think so.

15,073. But isn't the experience in every country in Europe in that direction?—A man must get through somehow. There's no doubt that the vagrant accumulates by begging—I am speaking of the vagrant in the ordinary sense. Stories are rife of his often having in his possession a large amount of coppers, which, it is clear, have been got in that way. As I understand your problem—taking your better class man—it is, how is he to be provided for? If he goes to the casual ward he is well provided for, and he gets that for nothing, and he need not beg.

15,074. That is, presuming the casual wards are near enough; but assume there are not sufficient casual wards in England between a fair day's march, and that the relieving officers are in many cases 10, 15, or 20 miles apart, would you consider, these things being the case, that the poor law is the proper source of relief not only for honest men tramping in search of work, but for the dishonest vagrants?—I say, that the poor law is the proper source of relief under those circumstances.

15,075. That is to say, when the relieving officers are, it may be, 10, 15, or 20 miles apart, and the casual wards the same?—I beg your pardon. If you make the conditions such that you cannot expand your system or remedy its defects, there is an end of it, and you must provide for your vagrants in some other way. But if you take England, and find that there are too few of these casual wards, then it is open to the poor law guardians to increase the number.

15,076. In Scotland, we have been told by witnesses, that poor houses are far apart, and inspectors of poor are correspondingly far apart, and it is impossible even to deal with cases of vagrancy in sparsely populated districts of Scotland; and it has been suggested to us that the police, who are much more numerous—in the proportion of 6 to 1—are the proper parties to dispense temporary relief, and the best parties to discriminate as between the honest and the dishonest. What do you think of that?—I should prefer treating it as a poor law question. I should modify the poor law arrangements so as to meet the dilemma.

15,077. (By the Chairman.) One question about labour bureaux. What do you think about them as a means of assisting the honest workman?—I think very ill of them. I think they are quite useless.

15,078. There have been some established in London, I understand, both by the Salvation Army people and some of the Vestries?—Yes, a few; one or two. Where there has been a man of great energy they have partially succeeded as long as his influence was at work. But, in the main, I think they have been unsuccessful. The truth is, it is very difficult, at a time of pressure, to provide work, when want of work is the chief difficulty.

15,079. And I suppose, as a matter of fact, the chief work they can provide is spasmodic, and for very unskilled men?—Quite true; and the employers do not necessarily rally round a labour bureau when they can get unskilled labour elsewhere.

15,080. Do you know how many vestries in London have bureaux?—I could not tell you offhand; but it would not be difficult to find out.

15,081. Is there any organisation for co-operation among them?—We were told it was of the utmost importance they should have some common centre, so as to have the demand and supply in each district brought under some governing eye. Do you know if anything of that sort has been done?—I think not.

Sir James
Crichton-
Brown.

SIR JAMES CRICHTON-BROWNE, M.D., LL.D., Lord Chamberlain's Visitor in Lunacy, called in and examined by the Chairman.

Sir James
Crichton-
Brown.

15,082. Sir James, you have had as long connection with lunacy matters, I believe?—For thirty years.

15,083. You were for a long time superintendent of the West Riding Asylum?—I was at the West Riding Asylum for ten years.

Sir James
Crichton-
Browne.

15,084. You are now in London?—I have been in London for the last twenty years.

15,085. You are the Lord Chancellor's Visitor in Lunacy?—Yes.

15,086. We desire to have your opinions on the subject of the connection between habitual drunkenness and diseased conditions of the mind. In the first place, what is your idea of the influence of heredity on habitual drunkenness?—It is very considerable. I could not give any statistical or numerical estimate on the spur of the moment as to the amount, but it is very large. One sees hereditary predisposition incontestably coming out in the children of a man who has been insane. One of these, perhaps, is subject to epileptic fits; two others are habitual drunkards; one is insane. Cases of that sort are frequently presenting themselves.

15,087. So you think it is to be referred to the influence of heredity?—I also believe that drunkenness, contracted as a vice, carried on, and becoming habitual, may set up a condition of the nervous system which will be transmitted to the child, and appear as hereditary drunkenness. That, however, I should say, is contrary to the modern physiological theory that acquired habit cannot be transmitted. But we see it constantly in practice nevertheless. I believe that drunkenness, originally adopted as a vice, socially, or from any special reason, may reappear as disease in descendants.

15,088. Well, you have made some very minute investigations into the connection between drunkenness and insanity, and found a very large amount of insanity caused at all events, have you not?—I found that 15 per cent. of insanity was attributable to drunkenness, directly and indirectly. I should say that, in about 10 per cent. of the cases, it was the direct toxic action of the alcohol on the nervous system. Then, in about 5 per cent. of cases, the insanity was indirectly due to alcohol—a man, when drunk, fell and broke his head and set up disease of the brain, or starved his wife, having spent his money on drink, and she became insane from poverty of blood. These, and similar cases, were the indirect results of drink.

15,089. Your experience is, that different effects are produced by beer drinking and whisky drinking?—I am still inclined to think that whisky produces fiercer and more violent forms of intoxication.

15,090. But I refer to the curious fact you mentioned in your evidence to a committee that among the insane in England there is a much larger proportion of epileptics; that epilepsy and general paralysis are more frequent in England than Scotland; and that this may be connected with the whisky drinking in the latter country?—Yes. I believed then, that there was a considerable adulteration of beer by Cocculus Indicus, the active principle of which is Picrotoxin. I knew this, that a man having beer in one public-house could get drunk on sixpence; whereas, in another public-house, it would take a shilling. I know Cocculus Indicus does set up epileptic condition in the lower animals certainly, and that general paralysis and epilepsy are more prevalent in England than in Scotland. But, of course, there is a racial difference behind all that.

15,091. That would go to show, would it not, that whisky is a more wholesome, as well as a cheaper, intoxicant than beer; because the evidence brought before us is that, in certain shebeens, a man can get drunk on a couple of pence?—Whisky, we know, is more wholesome for those subject to certain diseases. It is less pernicious in some cases than beer; but, upon the whole, I should say that a drink is pernicious in proportion to the amount of alcohol it contains. And, then, there are other conditions to be taken into account—the ethers or essential oils, with which the alcohol is blended, have a certain effect upon the nervous system.

15,092. Does the drinking of methylated spirits exist in England?—I know nothing of it here; but in Scotland, I remember, a medical man reported to me three cases of death from methylated spirit that he had had to deal with. I know men in England have told me that, when they could not get good drink, they took methylated spirits. It used to be a tradition, too, that in the dissecting rooms, the porters took the methylated spirits there used. But I never came across a case in the West Riding Asylum.

15,093. Have you had any case of ether drinking?—That is, I believe, entirely limited to Ireland. Regular ether drinking, I have never heard of in this country.

15,094. In your asylum, I suppose, you had dipsomaniacs?—Yes.

15,095. Would you please explain exactly your meaning of the word dipsomaniac?—I take it to be a disease of the nervous system, manifested by paroxysmal or persistent inebriety. You cannot, however, draw the line between habitual drunkenness and dipsomania.

15,096. And you treated this as a form of insanity?—Cases were sent to the asylum to be treated. Usually they were labouring under the immediate effects of a drinking bout—delirium tremens or mania à potu—and, when they recovered, they proved to be dipsomaniacs. In my professional work I have come across numerous cases of pure dipsomania.

15,097. Well, in these cases in the asylum, has a very short time sufficed to cure a person who has come in labouring under mania à potu or delirium tremens; has it been a few weeks' business?—A few days or weeks might effect a cure of the acute phase of the disease, in such cases. Often they recover from the immediate effects very quickly.

15,098. Well, under the English law, can a person be considered insane when he has recovered from the immediate effects?—No; he could not be long detained as a lunatic. He could claim his discharge.

15,099. So you are no better off than in Scotland, in that respect?—No.

15,100. Do you consider lunatic asylums suitable places for dipsomaniacs?—No. My idea is, that for dipsomaniacs of the poorer classes, who could only pay a small amount, institutions, if they are to be established in England, would have to be in connection in many instances with the county asylums. There would be so much expense involved in organising separate institutions that I should think the county councils would not care to encounter it. They would have to be under the management of the county councils, I should say; but in separate buildings from the asylums, although under the same administration. Of course, for the affluent classes, certain retreats are now in existence.

15,101. Have you any experience regarding these retreats?—I have. I have visited one or two private ones in past days, and I have seen a number of patients who have passed through them; and I am bound to say my experiences have not been altogether favourable. When I gave my evidence before a Committee some years ago, I looked forward to them as the best possible mode of dealing with the habitual drunkard, but I have somewhat modified my views.

15,102. To what extent?—Well, I do not think now, in regard to the affluent classes, that it is the best possible way to treat persons afflicted by dipsomania,—to send them to mix with a number of other persons similarly afflicted; to make a caste of them, and to put them into the midst of what may prove demoralising conditions. Then, practically, I do not think they have been as successful as it was anticipated they would be. I have no doubt some of them have been admirably managed, and have secured good results; but in some of them I know drunkenness has gone on practically unchecked, and that patients have occasionally come out more demoralised than when they went in.

15,103. As to the segregation of the habitual drunkard—how would you accomplish that?—With the affluent class there is no difficulty in carrying out treatment, provided the acquiescence of the patient can be secured, and with reference to dipsomaniacs of this class I take a more favourable view of the prospects of recovery than I formerly did. I have known a number of cases of complete and permanent recovery. I know of men and women now filling important social and public positions, who have been dipsomaniacs. But they have not been segregated; it has been by private and individual treatment—by voyages on teetotal ships, or by travelling under medical care, by residence with refined and well-regulated families, by moral influences sedulously and wisely exercised, and by therapeutical treatment that recovery has been secured in such cases—never by destroying the self-respect of these victims of a distressing disease, and branding them as members of a pariah class. I am sure branding dipsomaniacs as outcasts or a class apart tends to destroy what self-respect and moral control they have, and is apt to render their condition hopeless. My hopefulness about the cure of dipsomaniacs is in regard to the young—men and women not forty years of age. I have not, I think, seen a permanent cure after that age.

15,104. One of the institutions that will occur to you as well managed, I suppose, will be that of Rickmansworth?—I have no personal knowledge of that establishment.

15,105. Dr. Norman Kerr gave us statistics showing us that some 30 per cent. of the total cases had done well?—I should think there must be great difficulty in tracing out the subsequent histories in the case of places of that kind, and therefore in saying that permanent good has been done. At the same time, I do not doubt that the establishment at Rickmansworth has done much useful work.

15,106. That was so; but do you think his estimate agrees with your experience, or have you a higher or a lower percentage of recoveries or reclamations than Dr. Kerr by the method of treatment you speak of?—I should think that would be a good record of recovery for the class of cases sent to an inebriate home like Rickmansworth. I take it, they must be a very bad class of cases, and it would scarcely be fair to contrast them with cases taken in early life and in an early stage.

15,107. Where you have no legislation for habitual drunkards, you have the habitual drunkard congregated in homes. For instance, in Scotland, you have homes, and in certain cases for habitual drunkards only; in other cases, for a society comprising a large number of habitual drunkards. Do you think an effective inspection of such places is desirable, or do you think that the system that we have of inspecting only places licensed, and leaving all others uninspected, is good?—I should insist upon the most rigid inspection of all homes for habitual drunkards. I believe they are extremely liable to abuse.

15,108. Do you think the inspection would require the sole attention of an officer appointed for the purpose? You are aware that, as conducted in England, the inspection is in the hands of a gentleman whose chief salary and duty is in connection with another work, which doubtless occupies a great deal of his time, Dr. Hoffman?—On general principles, I should be inclined to put these institutions under the Commissioners of Lunacy; and to strengthen the Commissioners' Board, so that special inspection of them might be carried out, but I can see objections to that course.

15,109. Lord Shaftesbury was very much against that, was not he?—Yes; the Commissioners did not wish to undertake such work, and feared that to do so would interfere with their present functions. It would be impossible that the Commissioners should do the work without having their Board strengthened; but they would do it most efficiently, because the disease of habitual drunkenness is a kindred condition to mental disease and is indeed but one variety of insanity. Might I say, in regard to retreats, to do them justice, that one of their advantages, it seems to me, beyond the treatment they confer upon the unfortunate dipsomaniacs themselves, is the comfort and relief they give to their families. That is the real difficulty—what are you to do with these wretched drunkards, who are breaking up so many homes and wrecking so many lives. I have not so much hope of the benefit retreats may be to dipsomaniacs, as I have a sure conviction that they will be a source of comfort, and give rest for a time, to families afflicted with dipsomaniacs in their midst.

15,110. You know that there is a large number of retreats in Scotland?—I know in Scotland there used to be small private retreats in Lismore and Skye and other parts. But I know cases in which the result of seclusion in such isolated retreats was not encouraging. Patients sent to them were relegated to a desolate, miserable life, and that is not the way to cure them. I can recall cases that came out worse than they were when they went in. Their time was spent in devising expedients to evade the rules of the establishment, and procure drink, or in anticipating the debauch which would follow emancipation.

15,111. But I am speaking of the homes for the poorer classes. You have never seen such places as Queensberry House, in Edinburgh, have you?—I visited it many years ago; but it was a place of refuge for all sorts of dilapidated persons, I think. I am speaking of 20 years ago; I know nothing of it for the last 20 years.

15,112. Do you know anything of the English inebriate retreats not under the Act? There are a number inspected and licensed, and a number not licensed, I believe?—Some of these private homes, I believe, have been occasionally conducted as lunatic asylums without license. I have heard of lunatics actually being detained in them and mixing with the dipsomaniacs.

15,113. That is a very important point; and that, I think, would emphasise the necessity of applying inspection all round, would it not?—Certainly. There are a large number of people anxious to escape the provisions of the Lunacy Act, and I have heard of discharged dipsomaniacs complaining of the wretchedness of being shut up with lunatics de facto although not de jure. If houses for dipsomaniacs are not inspected you may have cruelty—harshness of treatment or neglect. It is found, even with the very close system of inspection lunatic asylums are subjected to in England, that it is difficult to avoid abuse.

15,114. And, in the case of lunatic asylums, if you allow a man to set up a lunatic asylum to escape inspection altogether, I suppose it would be putting a premium upon men starting unlicensed houses?—Certainly.

15,115. Well, that is practically what is done in the case of retreats at the present time. Any man who chooses to take out a license puts himself under inspection; whereas, any man is able to set up a retreat, and manage it as he likes, if he does not ask for a license.—(Witness.) I should draw the line at a retreat where two or three are boarded; where a patient can have pleasant family life, and associate with wholesome, pure-minded people, but such small retreats, although not licensed, should be subject to inspection.

15,116. But you have a distinction of number by the Lunacy Act, have you not?—The Lunacy Act number is one.

15,117. Would you put it, in the case of inebriate homes, at half-a-dozen?—I should put it at two. For more than two a license should be required.
